

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

[IN THE COMMON PLEAS.]

(Appeal from Revising Barrister's Court.)

Nov. 21, 1865.

DODDS, appellant, v. THOMPSON, respondent.

35 L. J. C.P. 97; 1 H. & R. 319; H. & P. 285; L. R. 1 C.P. 133;
14 W. R. 476; 12 Jur. N.S. 625.

Parliament—County Vote—Freehold Tenement, 8 Hen. 6. c. 7.—Rent charged on Lands without express Power to Distrain.

ELECTION LAW.—The grant of a rentcharge in fee of 40s. a year issuing out of land of sufficient value to pay the same confers a county qualification as a freehold tenement under 8 Hen. 6. c. 7, though there be no power of distress contained in the deed granting such rentcharge.

Consolidated appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the Northern Division of the county of Northumberland. William Thompson, on the register of voters for the township of Morpeth, in the said division, duly objected to the names of Robert Dodds, junior, and of several other persons stated in the case, being retained on the Alnwick list of voters for the said division.

The qualifications of the persons so objected to appeared on the register as "freehold rent issuing out of freehold dwelling-houses."

The several persons so objected to claimed to be entitled to vote under or by virtue of certain deeds which were produced and proved before the Revising Barrister. A copy of one of the deeds was as follows: "This indenture, made the 22nd day of January, 1851, between Robert Dodds the elder, of Alnwick, in the county of Northumberland, blacksmith, of the one part, and Robert Dodds the younger, of Alnwick, aforesaid blacksmith, and Adam Dodds, of the same place, grocer and tobacconist, sons of the said Robert Dodds the elder, of the other part, witnesseth, that in consideration of the natural love and affection which the said Robert Dodds the elder bears towards the said Robert Dodds the younger and Adam Dodds, he, the said Robert Dodds the elder doth hereby give and grant unto the said Robert Dodds the younger and Adam Dodds, their heirs and assigns, one annual sum, or yearly rentcharge of 4l. 4s. of sterling money, to be charged, and chargeable upon and yearly issuing and payable out of all those messuages, burgages, or tenements, situate, standing and being in Clayport-street, in Alnwick aforesaid, late in the occupation of William Gibb and Henry Fairbairn " [describing the messuages by bounds.] " To have, hold, receive, take, and enjoy the said annual sum or yearly rentcharge of 4l. 4s. unto and by them, the said Robert Dodds the younger and Adam Dodds, their heirs and assigns for ever, in equal shares as tenants in common, and to be paid on the 25th day of January in every year free and clear from all deductions whatsoever, the first payment thereof to begin and be made on the 25th day of January now instant. In witness," &c.

All the other deeds were to the same effect, and were to be taken mutatis mutandis as if stated as part of this case. It was proved that each of the grantors named in the several deeds was seised in demesne as of fee of and in the lands and tenements in those deeds respectively described, and out of which respectively the annual sums, or rentcharges therein respectively mentioned, were therein respectively expressed to be issuing; that the same annual sums had been received by the several grantees, and that the annual value of the lands and tenements out of which the same annual sums or rentcharges respectively were to issue, was sufficient to answer and pay the same annual sums or rentcharges respectively.

It was contended, on the part of the objector, that there was no power of distress, and that therefore there was no sufficient qualification. On the other hand, the claimants contended that these deeds were quite sufficient without any power of distress being contained in them to confer a qualification to vote for a county; that the statute, 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 5, gives the grantees a power of distress.

The Revising Barrister decided that without a power of distress the grants were respectively insufficient to confer a qualification to vote, and that there was no power of distress; and he therefore disallowed the claims of the said several persons so objected to, and erased their names from the said list of voters.

If this Court should be of opinion that the deeds, in the absence of an express power of distress, were respectively sufficient to confer a qualification to vote, the names of the several persons therein mentioned, and who were those who had been so objected to, were to be restored, and the register to be altered accordingly.

Joshua Williams, for the appellant.—The words of the statute, 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 5, are very plain; it gives to every person the like remedy by distress in case of rent-seck as in case of rent reserved upon lease. It was admitted by the Court in Bradbury v. Wright (Doug. 627) that the distress might have been supported for rent-seck if the case had been brought within this statute. So, in Saward v. Anstey (2 Bing. 521), Best, C.J. said that, " that statute has now given a distress to the owners of rents-seck," and in Buttery v. Robinson (3 Ibid. 392) the distress made by the annuitant was expressly supported by the Court, though the will creating the annuity gave no power to distrain. It is stated in Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 43, and vol. 3, p. 6, that the statute 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. has, in effect, abolished the distinction between rent service, rentcharge and rent-seck, and that persons now may have the like remedy for all these rents. Stephen's Commentaries, 5th edit. vol. 3, p. 356, contains a passage to the like effect, with this remark by the author: " So that now we may lay it down as an universal principle that a distress may be taken for any kind of rent in arrear the detaining whereof beyond the day of payment is an injury to him that is entitled to receive it." Probably the case of West v. Robson (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 422; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 262) has given rise to the present decision of the Revising Barrister. There the claimants, who were fellows of a college, claimed to vote as the owners of a rentcharge of 10l. a year issuing out of certain lands in different counties, and the Court said that it was not a rentcharge, there being no power of distress. In that case there was merely a trust to pay the yearly sum to each of the fellows of the college, and the decision, moreover, turned on another point, because the whole profits of the lands in the county for which the votes were claimed were insufficient to pay 10l. a year to each of the claimants.

Manisty, for the respondent.—There is no case exactly in point. The question really is, whether, looking to the deed and the language used in it, the claimant had a freehold tenement to the annual value of 40s. within the meaning of the statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 7. It is submitted that what is claimed here is not a freehold tenement, but only a rent-seck—Co. Litt., 143, b., where the difference is pointed out between a rentcharge and a rent-seck. It was not a tenement in the nature of land, or which could have been enforced on the land.

[ERLE, C.J.—There is nothing in the passage in Co. Litt. which shews that it is not a freehold tenement because it is a rent-seck. BYLES, J.—What were the remedies at common law to recover rent-seck?]

It is not clear that there would be any means of enforcing it against the land, and probably the only remedy would be a personal one by action on the covenant.

[WILLES, J. referred to Webb v. Jiggs (4 M. & S. 113), where it was held that debt did not lie at common law for arrears of an annuity for life devised payable out of lands, so long as the estate of freehold continued, because of the higher remedy by writ of assise.]

But the remedy by assise is now gone; all real actions (except writ of right of dower, and quare impedit) having been abolished by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 36. Therefore, if the statute of 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. had never been passed, the deed in the present case would have created only a dry rent-seck, not enforceable by entry on the land, and the only remedy for the recovery of it would have been by personal action on the covenant, express or implied. The appellant relies on this statute of 4 Geo. 2. c. 28, which he says has made the rent a rentcharge. It is not denied that the rent is within that statute, and therefore recoverable by distress; but that is a collateral remedy given by that statute, and does not make the interest which the party claiming here took under the deed, that of a freehold tenement, and the question therefore still remains whether the deed created such a tenement and conferred the qualification claimed for the voter. It is submitted that it did not do so, and that it is not because that statute gave a right to distrain that therefore this was a tenement.

Williams was not heard in reply.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister should be reversed. The claim is a qualification of a freehold tenement, namely, a rent of 40s. charged on freehold land, and in the grant of such rent there is no mention of a remedy to the grantee for enforcing payment; and, therefore, before the statute of the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. I take it it would have been a rent-seck, and at the time of the passing the statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 7. it would have been a rent-seck of 40s. per annum. I have not been convinced by Mr. Manisty that for enforcing the payment of a rent-seck charged on land, there would be no remedy, for upon looking at the passage in Co. Litt. 160, a, sec. 236, to which my Brother Willes has drawn my attention, it seems to be clear that there was a remedy by real action for a rent-seck at the time when the statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 7. created the qualification. Then, the remedy by real action having been taken away by statute, and no other remedy provided, it seems to me that it would have been incumbent to have found a remedy for the enforcement of the right either in Chancery or in the Queen's Bench; but one need not now resort to such ultimate remedy, because the statute 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. has provided a remedy by distress for rent-seck. That statute applies to the rent in question, which is, therefore, capable of being enforced by distress on the land, and, consequently, there is every requisite to make it a valid qualification.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not agree with Mr. Williams that this case was not reserved for our opinion after much consideration, for I believe it to be that sort of question which one would not answer without consideration, seeing that it raises some nice points, especially that connected with the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, which abolished real actions; still a personal action will not lie against the terre-tenant, and I have no doubt that these cases were in the mind of the Revising Barrister, and that he felt this difficulty, that whereas the remedy by real action had been done away with, there was a doubt whether there was a remedy ex necessitate rei. This knot has, however, been cut by the statute of the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28, which gives a remedy out of the land. I own, therefore, that the opinion of the Revising Barrister cannot be sustained, and that his decision must be reversed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is clear that before the abolition of real actions the rent in this case would have been a freehold tenement, and would have been payable out of the land. The difficulty which has been raised is, that apart from the statute of 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. there was no remedy by distress. At common law the remedy was only by real action; whether any remedy could be obtained in equity, or whether, as my Lord has suggested, the Court of Queen's Bench might possibly interfere by mandamus, it is not necessary to say, for the statute 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. applies (and mandamus would only be applicable if there were no other remedy), and then we have here a freehold tenement issuing out of the land.

KEATING, J.—I also am of the same opinion. This was a freehold tenement within the meaning of the statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 7, and though real actions have been abolished by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, it remains still a freehold tenement, and the effect of that statute in doing away with real remedies has no application to such tenements by reason of the statute 4 Geo. 2. c. 28, which gave the remedy by distress. I, therefore, think that the Revising Barrister was wrong, and that his decision should be reversed.

Decision reversed.

14 W. R. 479; 12 Jur. N.S. 627.

Parliament—Borough Vote—"Building"—2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

ELECTION LAW.—As far as the purpose for which a structure may be used in order to constitute "a building," within the statute 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, there is no distinction between agricultural and commercial industry, and a building really used for warehousing manure, kept there for the purposes of the land, is sufficient to qualify, as far as its use is concerned.

When the amount required for a borough qualification, under section 27. of the Reform Act, is made up partly by building and partly by land, there is nothing to define the proportion which the building must bear to the value of the land; and it is therefore sufficient to give such qualification, so far as the value of the building is concerned, if the building bona fide add to the land's real annual value to let, though in a small degree.

NORRISH, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Totnes.

The facts of the case were as follows: The voter occupied a piece of land, at the rent of more than 10l. per annum, with a stone building roofed upon it; the building had four walls and a door, which was kept locked. The voter kept in the building guano and other manures, which he used for the purposes of the land. The building was full. It was objected that the building was not a building within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 45.

The Revising Barrister held that it was not a building within the meaning of the said section, and expunged the voter's name.

If the Court was of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister was wrong, the name of the said John Norrish was to be restored to the list of voters for the parish of Totnes, in the said borough of Totnes.

Mellish (Kingdon with him), for the appellant.—The building in this case is not like a shed erected by an electioneering agent for the purpose of creating a vote, and to which the landlord had never assented, as was the case in Powell v. Boraston (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 175; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 73). The building here is a substantial one, adapted for the agricultural purposes of storing guano, for which it was erected, and it ought fairly to be considered as a "building" within the meaning of section 27. of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45). It would not be consistent with the decision of this Court in Whitmore v. the Town Clerk of Wenlock (5 Man. & G. 9; s. c. 1 Lutw. 10; 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 55) if a distinction were drawn between a building used for agricultural and a building used for commercial purposes. The purpose for which the building is used is immaterial. It was capable of being used for commercial purposes, and was very much like a warehouse. The case of Powell v. Farmer (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 168; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 71) is precisely in point, and the only distinction between that case and the present one is, that there the claimant was a market-gardener, and the building was used by him for storing potatoes and other things connected with his business of a market-gardener; whereas, here, he is a farmer, and the building is used by him for warehousing guano and manure for the purposes of his farm.

W. H. Cook, for the respondent.—This structure was not a "building" within the meaning of the act, and the decision of the Revising Barrister was right. "The legislature intended," says Erle, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court in Powell v. Boraston (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 175; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 73), "that 'building' should give the primary qualification, and that 'land' should be a secondary resort, if the building was not worth 10l. per annum. But land would become the primary qualification if a shed of no value added to land of the required value was held to qualify." Here the building is only an adjunct to the land, which is here the primary qualification. Moreover, the legislature intended by "other building" something similar to those previously described in the 27th section, and consequently such as would be used for commercial, and not merely agricultural purposes.

Mellish replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

ERLE, C.J., now (Jan. 18) delivered the following judgment.—According to the statement of this case, the building now in question was not deficient in respect of form and durability, and it was used for the purpose of keeping guano. It was suggested on the argument that the Revising Barrister decided against the qualification, because the guano was to be applied to the claimant's own farm, and the building was used solely for an agricultural purpose, and that, in thus deciding, he intended to follow an opinion of this Court, supposed to have been expressed in the case of Powell v. Boraston (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 175; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 73). In that case we held that a few boards nailed to some posts, for the sole purpose of pretending to the Revising Barrister that it was a shed, did not qualify; and we dissented from the opinion expressed in Lutwyche, p. 58¹: "That any building, however slight and unsubstantial, would be sufficient to qualify, provided it had a roof, and was capable of holding any articles." We drew attention to the words of the statute to which we and the Revising Barristers have to give effect, and under which we are bound as much to prevent lawful votes from being neutralized by fictitious pretences, as to support the franchise where the legislature has given it; and we came to the conclusion "that the pretence of a shed was not a building within the residentiary class, or in the class connected with commercial industry to which the statute related." In this language we did not mean to contradistinguish commercial from agricultural industry, so as to exclude agriculture. On the contrary, in applying this statute, we consider that an agriculturist carries on at the same time what may be termed a commercial business, using the word commercial in its widest extension, and taking all products of industry having value to be subjects of commerce, and that a building really used or intended to be really used for the purpose of keeping such products may qualify, whether they are intended for home consumption or for exchange: see Whitmore v. the Town Clerk of Wenlock (5 Man. & G. 9; s. c. 1 Lutw. 10; 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 55). Then as the building now in question appears to have been really used for warehousing guano, we are of opinion that it was sufficient to qualify, as far as its use was concerned, and the decision to the contrary is reversed.

With respect to the other cases, from the borough of Totnes, we are unable, without further information, to come to a decision. We therefore send them back to the Revising Barrister, and would thank him to answer the following question at his earliest convenience: "Is the land with the building of more real value to let than it would be without the building?" In answering this question, all notions of value for a vote are to be excluded. The descriptions of the buildings are not the same in each of these cases; and the Revising Barrister may adapt his answer accordingly, if he thinks there is any substantial difference between them in respect of value.

The other cases were accordingly sent back to the Revising Barrister, who afterwards returned them amended by inserting in each case the value of the building, and as so amended they were as follows:

GILLHAM, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

The facts of this case were as follows: The voter occupied during the electoral year a piece of land at the rent of more than 10*l.* per annum, on which he grazed a cow and other cattle, with a stone building roofed upon it, which he used for the purpose of milking his cow in, and for keeping hay. The building had three sides, was open in front, and had a loft over it, which was not used except for fowls to roost in. The voter was a dairyman. The building was worth about 10*s.* a year to the tenant. It was objected that the building was not a "building" within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45). The Revising Barrister held that it was not a building within the meaning of the said section, and expunged the voter's name.

(1) Watson v. Cotton; see that case also reported 5 Com. B. Rep. 55; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 58.

MASON, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

The facts of this case were as follows: The voter occupied a piece of land at the rent of more than 10*l.*, on which there was a stone building, roofed. The building was a linhay, open to the field; there was a crib in it; one side of the linhay was prolonged, and formed the back of a large tank, which contained from 60 to 80 hogsheads of water. The roof of the tank was lower than that of the linhay; the water flowed from the roof of the linhay into the tank. There was an internal communication between the linhay and the tank; the water was used to water the cattle which fed upon the land, and was drawn from the tank by means of a ball. The linhay was worth to the tenant about 5*s.* a year. The value of the tank was not proved before the Revising Barrister, but was worth something. It was objected that the building was not a "building" within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45). The Revising Barrister held it was not a "building" within the meaning of the said section, and expunged the voter's name.

ADAMS, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

The facts of this case were as follows: The voter occupied a piece of land of the value of more than 10*l.* per annum, with a stone building, roofed, upon it; the building had three walls, and was open in front; there was a loft over the building for the purpose of keeping hay; the land was used for depasturing the voter's own cattle, and the lower part of the building was useful as affording shade and shelter to the cattle. The building was worth to the tenant about 5*s.* a year. It was objected that the building was not a "building" within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45). The Revising Barrister held that it was not a "building" within the meaning of the said section, and expunged the voter's name.

PROUT, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

The facts of this case were as follows: The voter occupied a piece of land with a stone building upon it, roofed, of the value of more than 10*l.* per annum. The building had three walls and was open in front, with a loft over for the purpose of keeping hay; the land was used by the voter for the purpose of depasturing other people's cattle, and the lower part of the building was useful as affording shade and shelter to them. The building was worth about 5*s.* a year to the tenant. It was objected that the building was not a "building" within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act. The Revising Barrister held that it was not a building within the meaning of the said section, and expunged the voter's name.

BERRY, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

The facts of this case were as follows: The voter occupied a piece of land, at the rent of more than 10*l.* per annum, with a building upon it. The building had three stone walls, and a roof, and was open in front; the land was used for grazing the voter's cattle, and the building was useful as affording shade and shelter to them. It was objected the building was not a "building" under the 27th section of the Reform Act. The Revising Barrister held it was not, and expunged the voter's name. In this case, the building was worth about 5*s.* a year to the tenant.

HODGES, appellant, v. HARRIS, respondent.

The facts of this case were as follows: The voter occupied a piece of land, with a building on it, at the rent of more than 10*l.* per annum. The building had three stone walls and a roof, but was open in front; the land was used by the voter for the purpose of taking in other people's cattle to graze, and the building was useful as affording shade and shelter to them. The building was worth about 5s. a year to the tenant. It was objected that the building was not a "building" within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act. The Revising Barrister held that it was not a "building" within the meaning of the said section, and expunged the voter's name.

In each of these cases—

Mellish (Kingdon with him) was for the appellant, and
W. H. Cook for the respondent.

KEATING, J., now (Jan. 31) delivered the following judgment of the Court (Erle, C.J., Willes, J., Byles, J., and Keating, J.).—In the remaining registration cases from the borough of Totnes, we have had considerable difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory decision. The statute describing the qualification for a vote for a borough, according to our construction, requires, amongst other things, that there should be a building having some permanence, some utility, and some real value; but does not define either the form or materials essential for permanence, or the kind of utility intended; nor does it specify the proportion which the value of the building should bear to the value of the land when the amount of 10*l.* is made up partly by building and partly by land. Looking to the statements in the several cases, and the return of the Revising Barrister to the question put to him, it appears that the buildings in question are of a permanent nature; that they are useful for the occupation of the land on which they are placed, and bona fide add to its real annual value to let, though in a small degree. If under these circumstances we held they were insufficient, it seems to us that we should be defining what the legislature has left indefinite, and should be doing an act of legislation when the powers intrusted to us authorize interpretation only. We feel ourselves therefore constrained to hold that the qualification in each case was sufficient, and that consequently the decision of the Revising Barrister must be reversed. We think it right, however, to add, in justice to him, that the consideration of this question has caused much discussion amongst us, and that the opinion of more than one member of the Court has undergone a change upon the true construction of the statute. In pronouncing this decision we do not intend to interfere with the discretion of the Revising Barrister in deciding whether a building by means of which it is sought to qualify fulfils the requisites which we think the statute requires, namely, permanence, utility, and as contributing to the beneficial occupation of the land, and thereby increasing its real and annual value to let; nor do we mean to lay down as a rule that all buildings of the present value as returned by the Revising Barrister necessarily give a qualification, unless that value be bona fide combined with permanence and utility, and thereby add to the real annual value of the whole.

Decisions reversed.

BULLEN AND ANOTHER v. SHARP.*

Partnership, What constitutes — Annuity out of Profits — Underwriting Business.

PARTNERSHIP.—The defendant's son having been elected a member at Lloyd's, on a representation made to the committee with the defendant's sanction, that the defendant would place 5,000l. at the disposal of F. (an underwriter), and would never let his son stand in want of further aid, if needed, the son entered into an arrangement with F., whereby the latter was to manage the underwriting business in his, the son's, name, and was to be paid a salary for doing so. The son, in consideration of the defendant so guaranteeing him to the extent of 5,000l., agreed to pay the defendant an annuity of 500l., which, on a given state of the profits, was to be increased to a yearly sum equal to one-fourth of the profits; but it was stipulated that the defendant should not be considered as a partner in the said business. The son afterwards married, and by the marriage settlement all the monies and profits of the business were assigned to the defendant and one D. upon certain trusts, the first being to pay the said annuity to the defendant. The son kept no banking account, but paid such cheques as F. gave him to the defendant's bankers, on whom he was allowed to draw, until the defendant put a stop to it:—Held, by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that, assuming the above arrangements to be real and not colourable, the defendant was not liable as a partner with his son in the underwriting business.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, giving judgment for the plaintiffs upon a special case stated for the opinion of that Court, and which is set out in the report below—*34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 174.*¹

The question raised was, whether the defendant was liable as a partner with his son on a marine policy of assurance effected by the plaintiffs, and which had been underwritten for 100l. in the name of the defendant's son by a Mr. Fenn, who managed the son's underwriting business and had the son's authority to subscribe policies in his name. The facts were shortly these:

In March, 1857, the defendant's son was elected a member at Lloyd's, on a representation made to the committee by Mr. Fenn, with the defendant's sanction, that the defendant would place 5,000l. at Fenn's disposal, and would never let his son stand in want of further aid, if needed. At the same time an agreement was entered into between Fenn and Sharp the younger, by which an underwriting account was to be carried on, in the name of Sharp the younger, under the management of Fenn, who was to receive for this a salary of 300l. a year, which was afterwards, by a fresh agreement in November, 1858, increased to 350l.

On the 1st of January, 1859, Sharp the younger wrote to his father, the defendant, a letter, by which, in consideration of the defendant guaranteeing him to the extent of 5,000l., he agreed to pay to the defendant during their joint lives an annuity of 500l., to be increased at the end of the first three years to a yearly sum equal to one-fourth of the average profits, in case that amount of profits should, during those years, exceed 500l. The letter also contained a statement that the defendant was in no case to be considered as a partner with his son in the said business of an underwriter.

On the marriage of Sharp the younger, which took place in August, 1859, a deed of settlement was executed between him, his intended wife, the defendant and one Donnison. By this deed, after reciting the said agreement between Sharp the younger and Fenn for carrying on the underwriting business, and the said letter of the 1st of January, 1859, from Sharp the younger to the defendant, Sharp the younger assigned to the defendant and Donnison all monies, earnings and profits then in Fenn's hands, or which should thereafter come into his hands on account of the business, with a power of attorney to sue for, receive and give discharges for the same, and with a direction to Fenn and the other agent for the time being in the business, to pay all the monies to the defendant and Donnison, upon trust, first, to pay the defendant his said annuity; next, to pay Sharp the younger an annuity of 500*l.*, to be increased to 750*l.* if the accumulated profits at the end of two years should amount to 3,500*l.*; next, to accumulate the surplus profits until they should amount to 8,500*l.* and remain at that amount for two years; and then upon trust to re-assign the monies to Sharp the younger. The deed contained a power to the trustees, upon the request of Sharp the younger or his manager for the time being, to raise out of the assigned property monies required to meet emergencies in the underwriting business, and a covenant by Sharp the younger that he would, in the event of Fenn's death, appoint another competent person to act as manager of the business.

After the marriage Sharp the younger kept no banking account; but Fenn, who received and paid all monies, gave him cheques from time to time, which he paid into the defendant's banking account with Messrs. Hankey, on whom the defendant allowed his son to draw until November, 1859, when the defendant put a stop to his doing so.

On the 22nd of December, 1859, the plaintiffs' policy was effected at Lloyd's in the usual way, and underwritten in the name of Sharp the younger. On the 19th of February, 1860, Sharp the younger stopped payment, and he was made bankrupt on the 29th of March following.

There being a total loss under the policy, the question was, whether the defendant was liable thereon as a partner with his son, and the case stated that the Court were to be at liberty to draw any reasonable inferences of fact.

The case on appeal was argued in Trinity Term last, by—

Lush (Mellish and Sir G. Honyman with him), for the plaintiff in error (the defendant in the action), and by—

J. Brown (Bovill with him), for the defendants in error (the plaintiffs in the action).

Cur. adv. vult.

There being a difference of opinion amongst the learned Judges, they now (Nov. 29) delivered their judgments seriatim as follows:

SHEE, J.—The question in this case is, whether, when the policy on which the action is brought was effected, the underwriting business carried on in the name of William Sharp the younger was, in fact, the business of the defendant, or of the defendant in partnership with William Sharp the younger; in other words, whether the policy underwritten by William Sharp the younger was underwritten by him, acting on behalf of the defendant and as his agent. The establishment of William Sharp the younger in his underwriting business at Lloyd's was permitted by the committee at Lloyd's, on an assurance given to them by Fenn, acting as agent for William Sharp the younger, but with the authority of the defendant, who had refused to give a formal guarantee, that the defendant would advance to William Sharp the younger a capital of 5,000*l.*, and never let him stand in want of further aid, if needed.

The committee, after William Sharp the younger had on that assurance been admitted a member, inquired of Fenn, by their secretary's letter of the 20th of May, 1857, if the money had been advanced, and Fenn, in answer to that inquiry, by the use, in his letter of the 22nd of May, 1857, of language more studiously than scrupulously chosen, had led them to believe that the 5,000*l.* had, in fact, been advanced, and was in his hands. The defendant William Sharp the younger and Fenn seem to have considered that the assurance given to the committee at Lloyd's was, although the defendant had refused a guarantie, an engagement binding in honour upon him; and virtually, as between him and the committee, an undertaking, to the extent of 5,000*l.*, for the underwriting losses of William Sharp the younger. Treating apparently this assurance of the defendant to the committee that he would advance 5,000*l.* as equivalent to, or good security for, the actual advance of it, William Sharp the younger had agreed to pay to the defendant, during their joint lives, 10*l.* per cent. per annum upon that amount; and in lieu of it, after the expiration of three years, one-fourth of the average profits realized by the business during those three years, should that fourth amount to more than 500*l.* Thus far we have the defendant establishing his son in a business to be carried on by his son or his son's agent, Fenn, for his son's benefit—the defendant guarding himself, should the business become unprosperous, against eventual loss, under his promise to advance 5,000*l.*, by a stipulation that he should receive a fixed annuity of 500*l.*, to commence immediately, and to be increased contingently to a fourth of the annual profits, should they average during the next three years more than that sum. There is nothing before us which points to any source other than the underwriting business, out of which this 500*l.* annuity could flow; but it was to be payable half-yearly, and at the expiration of the first half-year after the date of the agreement to pay it, whether profits were made or not, in consideration of the defendant's promise to advance 5,000*l.*, to be applied, should need be, to the discharge of debts which might be incurred in the underwriting business. Though, fixed therefore, apparently on an estimate of the probable amount of profits, and to increase with an increase of profits, it was not necessarily, or even probably, in the first instance, payable out of profits; and regard being had to the consideration for it, was not within, or was barely within, the mischief to prevent which the sharing of the profits of a business has been considered in many cases cogent, though not conclusive, evidence of a partnership liability for its debts. Whether the 500*l.* annuity was in fact paid to the defendant out of the profits of the business, or not, he would not, rebus sic stantibus, have been liable for its debts. The definition of a partnership "contractus consensualis de re vel operis communiandis lucri in commune faciendi causa"—L. 63 pr. ff. 'De Societate,' was not satisfied by the relation between him and his son. They did not intend to be partners, and the business was not carried on by the defendant, or by any person on his behalf, in partnership or not in partnership with him.

This state of things, however, was materially altered under the marriage settlement after the marriage of Sharp the younger. Fenn, who, up to that time, had carried on the business as agent of Sharp the younger, accounting to him for its proceeds, at a salary payable by him, became, in my judgment, the agent to hold the proceeds of and the means of carrying on the underwriting business, and the agent to carry on the business for the defendant and John Donnison, to whom, besides other property of Sharp the younger, all monies belonging to him in the hands of Fenn, and all monies, earnings, profits and emoluments thereafter to come into Fenn's hands, on account or in respect of the underwriting business, including, as I read it, any claim Sharp the younger might have had on the 5,000*l.* advanced, were, with full power and authority to ask, demand, sue for, recover and receive, and give effectual receipts and discharges for the said monies, proceeds and premises, assigned in trust for Sharp the younger until his marriage; on trust after his marriage, primarily and solely, should the profits not exceed 500*l.*, to pay that sum annually out of the proceeds of the underwriting business to the defendant; on further trust, but without prejudice to the defendant's annuity, to pay Sharp the younger an annuity of 500*l.*, and after the continuance for two years of an accumulation of profits of the extent of 3,500*l.*, an annuity of 750*l.*, together with interest on the sum accumulated, and the proceeds and dividends of other the property assigned; on further trust, when the accumulation of profits should have arrived, and for two years continued, at 8,500*l.*, to apply that accumulation to the emergencies of the underwriting business, and the repayment of the defendant of any monies he might have advanced under his guarantee of the 21st of May, 1857; on further trust for all the purposes of a family settlement, and to provide for the intended wife of Sharp the younger, and for his and her children. Previously to the date of the marriage, unless we assume, which there seems no ground for doing, the whole scheme to have been illusory and collusive from its inception, the defendant had no more to do with the carrying on, by himself or his agent, of the underwriting business than Cox or Wheatcroft, in the case of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), had in the carrying on of the business of the new firm of "the Stanton Iron Company," for the benefit of the creditors of the old firm of Smith & Co. After the date of the marriage, the defendant had as much to do with the carrying on of the underwriting business as the trustees in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125) had in carrying on, by any agents they might employ, the business of the Stanton Iron Company, for the benefit of the creditors of Smith & Co. The business of the Stanton Iron Company, in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), was the business of the trustees, carried on by them, for objects with which the parties dealing with them had no concern; the trustees were therefore held liable for its debts. In this case the underwriting business had become the business of the defendant and John Donnison, and they, as I think, had become liable for its debts, not because they shared the profits, which one of them did not share, but because it was their business, carried on for them with their funds by Fenn as their agent, in the name of William Sharp the younger, at a salary to be paid to Fenn by himself out of their capital which he held, or out of the profits which he made for them. That the business was carried on in the name of William Sharp the younger, and partly by him, and probably for his ultimate benefit, is, as respects the liability of the defendant, a circumstance wholly immaterial; the material and governing circumstance is, that the business, which before the marriage was carried on by Fenn as agent for William Sharp the younger, he being the owner of all the monies, earnings, profits and emoluments derived from it, was after the marriage carried on by Fenn as agent for and on behalf of the defendant and John Donnison, to whom, by the marriage settlement, all the monies belonging to the business in Fenn's hands, and all the earnings, profits and emoluments of it thereafter to come into his hands, and all the benefit of antecedent arrangements between the defendant Fenn and William Sharp the younger were assigned. The mode of conducting the business and the relation between Fenn who, in fact, conducted it, and William Sharp the younger, were in other respects much changed after his marriage. Before his marriage William Sharp the younger had, or, if he had not (as to which some doubt may arise on the terms of the case), was entitled, under his agreement with Fenn of the 17th of March, 1857, to have an account with a banker, into which the premiums and other monies received by Fenn in respect of the underwriting business were to be paid, William Sharp the younger supplying Fenn with the necessary funds to make all payments and advances in respect thereof. After his marriage William Sharp the younger kept no banking account, Fenn giving him cheques from time to time for the sums which he was allowed to draw i. e., which were drawn for his purposes out of the business, such cheques being paid by Sharp the younger into the defendant's banking account with Messrs. Hankey, on whom the defendant permitted William

Sharp the younger to draw cheques until November, 1859, when the defendant put a stop to his son's drawing cheques. Before the marriage, under the agreement of the 17th of March, 1857, the salary of Fenn was to be paid by Sharp the younger, who alone, under that agreement, was liable to Fenn for it. After the marriage Fenn drew his salary out of the funds of the underwriting business with the sanction and authority of the defendant and Donnison, to whom those funds had been assigned, and to whom Fenn was accountable for them. Add these facts to the fact of the original restriction, which was never relaxed, upon Sharp the younger's taking any risk without the consent of Fenn, and to the fact that Fenn, who before the marriage settlement had held all the monies, earnings, profits and emoluments of the underwriting business which came to his hands as agent for Sharp the younger, held them after the marriage settlement for the trustees of it, and the absolute nullity of Sharp the younger as a principal, though held out as such in the carrying on of the business from the date of his marriage and at the date of the policy sued on will be manifest. His position as between him, the defendant and Fenn was little better than that of an under clerk whose part it was to pretend to be a principal at Lloyd's, and underwrite such policies as Fenn told him to underwrite. We must look at the substance of the new arrangement, and it seems to me impossible, though there was no formal attornment to dispute, that a man who, holding as manager of the business and agent for the owner of it the funds of the business, consents under an arrangement to which the owner of the business is a party to continue to manage the business and to hold the funds of the business in his hands, and which may thereafter come into his hands for a third person as the assignee of the former owner of them, and to take his salary for the future out of those funds, becomes the agent of such third person. There is nothing in the statement before us which renders it necessary, if we affirm the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, to impute any greater blame to the defendant than the blame which may be thought, under such circumstances to attach to the fact of his defending this action. He had entered into an honourable engagement with the Committee at Lloyd's to supply his son with funds, to meet any losses he might sustain, to the extent of 5,000*l.*, with a promise that he would never let his son stand in want of further aid, if needed; and up to the date of his son's bankruptcy he does not appear to have departed from the spirit and intention of that engagement. If he did not revoke it when the marriage settlement was executed, or give notice to the Committee at Lloyd's of the new arrangement then made, it may be fairly taken to have been because he intended at that time to assume the entire responsibility of the business. He has probably, since his son's bankruptcy, been induced to hope that because the defendants in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), though they shared in an indirect and exceptional way (as the only means open to them of mitigating a loss already sustained) the profits of "the Stanton Iron Company" were held not liable for its debts—the defendant here, though he shared under a voluntary and express agreement to share, and in the plain and ordinary sense of sharing, and with the advantage of an absolute preference and priority, the profits of the underwriting business, might also escape liability. His advisers have not adverted to the fact that the defendants in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125) did not, and that he, the defendant, in this case did, through an agent appointed and paid by him, carry on the business out of the profits which he shared, and which in a very probable state of things, he was entitled to engross when made. In the course of the argument much, as it seems to me, of undeserved disparagement was bestowed upon the case of Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235) and other cases, decided by learned Judges of the highest authority, in which persons shewn to have been participators in the profits of a business, have, in the absence of counter-vailing evidence, on account of the great improbability that they to whom a business does not belong should be allowed, by those who have the active management of it, to take its profits, been held liable for its losses. The judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125) was treated as an unexpected manifestation of a concealed or forgotten principle, at length happily discovered and invoked for the correction of an obstinate error. But in the cases which have been thus decried, the doctrine in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), that the law of partnership is but a branch of the law of principal and agent, does not appear to have been overlooked, nor, as is well explained in that case by Lord Cranworth, has a participation of profits, in determining the question of partnership liability as respects third parties, ever been relied upon except for the purpose of assisting in the inquiry, whether the person benefiting by the profits of a business was, in truth, though not ostensibly, a principal, on whose behalf, by an agent, it was carried on. That the defendant, after his son's marriage, did, in his son's name carry on the underwriting business is, I think, the right inference to be drawn from the facts before us. In this view of them, the case of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), expressly recognized as sound by the Court of Common Pleas in the judgment appealed against, is in favour of the plaintiffs, and that judgment ought, in my opinion, to be affirmed.

PIGOTT, B.—This case comes before the court of error by way of appeal from the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas; and the question raised by it is, whether the defendant is liable on a policy as a partner with his son, in whose name it was underwritten for 100l. The facts are stated, and the Court is at liberty to draw any reasonable inferences from them. The effect of them seems to be as follows: On the 17th of March, 1857, the defendant, through Fenn, an underwriter, got his son admitted as a member at Lloyds', upon a promise made to Fenn, to place at Fenn's disposal 5,000l., and further aid, if necessary. In May in the same year there was an agreement made between Sharp junior and Fenn as to the mode of carrying on the business. It contained ten heads of agreement, the material effect being that policies were to be subscribed in the name of Sharp junior, but the entire business was to be transacted by Fenn at his counting-house in the same way, and to the same extent only, as he acts on his own account. For these services Fenn was to be paid 300l. a year, and Sharp junior stipulated that no risk was to be taken by him without the consent of Fenn. In May, 1857, three letters passed between Lloyd's Committee, Fenn and Sharp senior. They shew that Lloyd's Committee were anxious to be assured that Sharp junior really had the 5,000l. Thereupon the defendant agreed with Fenn "to hold" that sum for his son, as "freely available for his underwriting account"; and Fenn informed the Committee that "he had the 5,000l. for the use of the son, with a further assurance of more funds, if necessary." And in November, 1858, it was agreed by Fenn and Sharp junior to extend the business by "writing double." "In consequence of this arrangement" (it is said) Sharp junior wrote to Sharp senior (the defendant) a letter, dated the 1st of January, 1859, agreeing, in consideration of his guarantee of 5,000l., to pay him an annuity of 500l. (with a possible increase at the end of three years in case the business proved profitable to an extent mentioned), and stating, in conclusion, that in no case is Sharp senior to be considered a partner. On the 2nd of July, 1859, there was a further agreement between Sharp junior and Fenn, whereby Fenn's agency was to be continued till December, 1870, with power reserved to Sharp junior to put an end to it after December, 1864, by six months' notice. In August, 1859, on the marriage of Sharp junior, there was a deed of settlement executed, of which the defendant and John Donnison were made trustees. It recites the before-named agreement, and provides that "all the earnings, profits and emoluments now in Fenn's hands, or which should thereafter come into them, are thereby assigned to the trustees; a power of attorney to them to sue and give discharges for the same being added." And Sharp junior thereby also directs and orders Fenn and other his agents for the time being in the business to pay all the monies, earnings and profits to the trustees. The trusts are, first, to pay Sharp senior's annuity under the agreement of the 1st of January, 1859, and next to pay Sharp junior an annuity of 500*l.*; then to invest the profits till they amount to 3,500*l.*, and remain at that for two years; then to pay Sharp junior 750*l.* instead of 500*l.* per annum; and, further, to accumulate the profits till they amount to 8,500*l.*, and remain at that amount for two years; then to re-assign the profits to Sharp junior. There is also a power to pay off the 5,000*l.*, with further trusts for the benefit of Sharp junior's family. Sharp junior covenants also with the trustees, in case Fenn should die, to appoint immediately another competent person to act in the same capacity; after this Fenn continued to act as agent in carrying on the business. Sharp junior had no banker; Fenn, in fact, received and paid, all monies, giving Sharp junior cheques from time to time, which were taken by him, and paid into the defendant's banking account at Messrs. Hankey & Co.'s, defendant allowing him to draw cheques on his bankers till November, 1859, when he put a stop to his son's power of drawing cheques. On the 22nd of December, 1859, the plaintiffs' policy was underwritten by Fenn's clerk in Sharp junior's name, and in February, 1860, he stopped payment. The case does not state whether any part of the guaranteed 5,000*l.* still remains in the hands of Sharp senior.

Upon these facts, we are asked if the defendant is liable on this policy as a partner with his son. The principle of law applicable to the case is stated in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), in the very clear judgment of Lord Cranworth, thus: "The real ground of liability (as a partner) is, that the trade has been carried on by persons acting on his behalf (that is, of the person sought to be made liable), so that he would stand in the relation of principal towards the persons acting ostensibly as the traders, by whom the liabilities have been incurred, and under whose management the profits have been made." Now, applying the exposition of the law of partnership to the facts of the present case, I find that the contract in question is made by Fenn in Sharp junior's name; and the question therefore is, whose agent was Fenn; or, in other words, although apparently acting for Sharp junior alone, was he really acting for both the Sharps? Now, the facts shew that the machinery was originally designed by Sharp senior; that he set Fenn in motion to treat with Lloyd's Committee for the son's admission there; that he found the whole capital, and was to provide more if necessary; that he tied up the actions of Sharp junior by the agreement between himself and Fenn, so that the son might be truly said to be in leading-strings as regards any management of the business. So far the defendant had planned only the future conduct of the business. But then in the course of it we find that he is actively taking some, though it may be a slight, part. For instance, it would be necessary that application should be from time to time made to him, as capital was wanted by Fenn. He would have to satisfy himself of the necessity of these advances, and to make them. Then, as he is expressly to receive all the proceeds under the settlement, and did so, in fact, at his bankers' from the commencement, this would necessarily involve him to some extent in the accounts of the business. But beyond this it is clear to my mind that the effect of the indefinite promise to give further aid beyond the 5,000*l.* would be to keep in his own power a large control over the business and the agent; for, having regard to the large profits which were calculated upon in the settlement, it is manifest that further capital would be required, and the defendant's promise of further aid, being of the very vaguest kind, would be of no real binding obligation in law. When, therefore, further capital was wanted, it would rest with the defendant to advance it or stop the business. But beyond all these facts the defendant, by the marriage settlement, is the first (after deducting the agent's salary) to be paid out of the profits, and by possibility might engross them all. Now this, though alone not the perfect test of partnership, yet it is still to be taken into consideration as one circumstance with others; and in Lord Cranworth's judgment he says on this subject, "A right to participate in profits affords cogent, often conclusive, evidence that the trade in which the profits have been made was carried on in part for and on behalf of the person setting up such a claim." What, then, is the fair inference to draw from the foregoing facts? I think it is clearly that the defendant is not a mere mortgagee of the profits, but a large sharer in them, with a control over the business, and, as I think, having a further interest,—that he had, in fact, a twofold interest, one consisting in the capital embarked and the return of 10*l.* (and possibly more) per cent. thereon; the other the object of advancing his son by establishing a business as underwriter, ultimately for the son's benefit, without incurring in course of doing so a risk of loss through his son's inexperience. Further, it seems to me that the son's position throughout points to the same conclusion. For if the defendant is not a partner, it follows that the son is the only principal, a supposition very difficult to reconcile with the following facts, viz., he would be a sole principal yet not intrusted with either possession or disposition of a shilling of the entire capital of his business. Then, even assuming that he had nominated the agent Fenn, he is bound to him for a long term of years without the power of displacing him. He contracts with his own agent that he will not incur a risk in his own business without that agent's consent, a term evidently imposed upon him by his father, it not being for the benefit of the other contracting party. The result of the whole seems to me to be that by a circuitous mode Fenn has been placed by the defendant in a position to carry on this business with an intention on the defendant's part, doubtless, to allow his son to participate in the profits of it for a term, and ultimately, when established, and himself repaid, then for the benefit of his son altogether. I do not in coming to this conclusion find it necessary to impute fraud to the defendant. The utmost to be urged against him is, that he has endeavoured (if the law will permit it) to carry on a business without making himself responsible for its losses as a partner. But (invoking again the language of Lord Cranworth) "this is no reason for holding him not to be liable, if on strict principles of mercantile law he is so." The difficulty mainly consists in the nature of the business and the form in which the question is presented to the Court. But on the whole it seems to be only a proper use of the power of drawing reasonable inferences to say, as a matter of fact, that this business does appear to have been carried on on behalf of both the defendant and Sharp junior, and consequently that there is a partnership, with all the ordinary consequences of that relationship. I therefore think that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas should be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action on a policy of insurance against the defendant as underwriter. The policy was actually underwritten in the name of the defendant's son. The question in the cause is, whether the defendant was a partner in the underwriting business carried on in his son's name, so as to make him liable to third persons on contracts made in the course of that business. On the trial a verdict was taken by consent for the plaintiffs, subject to a special case, as part of which it was agreed that the Court might draw any reasonable inferences of fact. The Court below have determined the question in favour of the plaintiffs. The case is brought before the Court of Exchequer Chamber under the 32nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, by which this Court is required to give the same judgment as ought to have been given in the Court below, and to draw any inferences of fact which the Court below ought to have drawn. And in the fulfilment of this duty I have come to the conclusion that the judgment below ought to be reversed, as I think that the defendant is not shewn to have been a partner in the business carried on in his son's name. The case of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; c. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125), being a decision of the House of Lords, the ultimate Court of appeal, overrules all earlier authorities inconsistent with that decision, and so far as the judgment goes fixes the law in this country. We are not bound by all that is said in the course of a judgment of the House of Lords, but that which appears to be the rule established by the decision of that tribunal is binding not only on all inferior tribunals in this country, but even on that House itself when sitting judicially. In Kilshaw v. Jukes (3 Best & S. 847; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 217) there was a difference of opinion in the Court of Queen's Bench as to the effect of the decision of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 125); Wightman, J. expressing an opinion that the circumstances of that case were so peculiar that the decision was hardly applicable to any other, whilst my Brother Mellor and I thought that the decision of the House of Lords was of general application. This case was referred to in the argument in the Court below, but does not seem to have been much considered in any of the judgments. It seems, however, so far as we can collect from the reasons given by the different Judges below, that they rather agreed with Wightman, J. than with the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The first point, therefore, to be determined in the present case is what really was the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 125)? Prior to that decision the dictum of De Grey, C.J., in Grace v. Smith (2 W. Black, 998), that "every man who has a share of the profits of a trade ought also to bear a share of the loss," had been adopted as the ground of the judgment in Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235), where it was laid down "that he who takes a moiety of all profits indefinitely shall, by operation of law, be made liable to losses if losses arise, upon the principle that by taking a part of the profits he takes from the creditors a part of that fund which is the proper security to them for the payment of their debts." This decision had never been overruled. The reasoning on which it proceeds seems to have been generally acquiesced in at the time, and when more recently it was disputed, it was a common opinion, in which I for one participated, that the doctrine had become so inveterately part of the law of England, that it would require legislation to reverse it. In Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 125) the creditors of a trader had agreed that their debtor's trade should be carried on for the purpose of paying them their debts out of the profits; and the composition-deed, to which they were parties, secured to them a property in the profits. The rule laid down in Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235), if logically followed out, led to the conclusion that all the creditors who assented to this deed, and by so doing agreed to take the profits, were individually liable as partners; but when it was sought to apply the rule to such an extreme case it was questioned whether the rule itself was really established. There was a very great difference of opinion amongst the Judges who decided the case in its various stages below, and also amongst those consulted in the House of Lords. In the result, the House of Lords (consisting of Lord Campbell, Chancellor, Lords Brougham, Cranworth, Wensleydale and Chelmsford,) unanimously decided that the creditors were not partners.

The judgments of Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale bear internal evidence of having been written. Lord Campbell and Lords Brougham and Chelmsford said a few words expressing their concurrence. It is, therefore, in the written judgments, and more especially in the elaborate judgment of Lord Cranworth, that we must look for the ratio decidendi. Now, we find Lord Cranworth says, "It was argued that as they would be interested in the profits therefore they would be partners. But this is a fallacy. It is often said that the test, or one of the tests, whether a person not ostensibly a partner, is nevertheless in contemplation of law a partner, is, whether he is entitled to participate in the profits. This, no doubt, is in general a sufficiently accurate test, for a right to participate in profits affords cogent, often conclusive, evidence that the trade in which the profits have been made was carried on in part for or on behalf of the person setting up such a claim. But the real ground of the liability is, that the trade has been carried on by persons acting on his behalf. When that is the case he is liable to the trade obligations, and entitled to its profits, or to a share of them. It is not strictly correct to say that his right to share in the profits makes him liable to the debts of the trade. The correct mode of stating the proposition is to say, that the same thing which entitles him to the one makes him liable to the other, namely, the fact that the trade has been carried on on his behalf, that is to say, that he stood in the relation of principal towards the persons acting ostensibly as the traders by whom the liabilities have been incurred, and under whose management the profits have been made. Taking this to be the ground of liability as a partner, it seems to me to follow that the mere concurrence of creditors in an arrangement under which they permit their debtor, or trustee for their debtor to continue his trade, applying the profits in discharge of their demands, does not make them partners with their debtor or the trustees. The debtor is still the person solely interested in the profits, save only that he has mortgaged them to his creditors. He receives the benefits of the profits as they accrue, though he has precluded himself from applying them to any other purpose than the discharge of his debts. The trade is not carried on by or on account of the creditors; though their consent is necessary in such a case, for without it all the property might be seized by them in execution. But the trade still remains the trade of the debtor or his trustees; the debtor or the trustees are the persons by or on behalf of whom it is carried on." He afterwards adds, "The authorities cited in argument did not throw much light upon the subject. I can find no case in which a person has been made liable as a dormant or sleeping partner, where the trade might not fairly be said to have been carried on for him, together with those ostensibly conducting it, and when, therefore, he would stand in the position of principal towards the ostensible members of the firm as his agents."

And Lord Wensleydale says, "A man who allows another to carry on trade, whether in his own name or not, to buy and sell, and to pay over all the profits to him, is undoubtedly the principal, and the person so employed is the agent; and the principal is liable for the agent's contracts in the course of his employment. So if two or more agree that they should carry on a trade and share the profits of it, each is a principal and each is an agent for the other, and each is bound by the other's contract in carrying on the trade, as much as a single principal would be by the act of an agent who was to give the whole of the profits to his employer. Hence it becomes a test of the liability of one for the contract of another, that he is to receive the whole or a part of the profits arising from that contract, by virtue of the agreement made at the time of the employment. I believe this is the true principle of partnership liability. Perhaps the maxim that he who partakes the advantage ought to bear the loss, often stated in the earlier cases on this subject, is only the consequence, not the cause, why a man is made liable as a partner. Can we then collect from the trust deed that each of the subscribing creditors is a partner with the trustees, and by the mere signature of the deed constitutes them his agents for carrying on the business on the account of himself and the rest of the creditors? I think not." And he afterwards gives us the reason of his decision, that in the particular case there was not "such a participation of profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the creditors (the defendants) and the trustees," who actually made the contract sued on.

I think that the ratio decidendi is, that the proposition laid down in Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235), viz., that a participation in the profits of a business does of itself, by operation of law, constitute a partnership, is not a correct statement of the law of England, but that the true question is, as stated by Lord Cranworth, whether the trade is carried on on behalf of the person sought to be charged as a partner, the participation in the profits being a most important element in determining that question, but not being in itself decisive; the test being, in the language of Lord Wensleydale, whether it is such a participation of profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the person taking the profits and those actually carrying on the business. I do not think it is proper for us to inquire, whether this rule of law is more or less expedient than the rule laid down in Waugh v. Carter (2 H. Black. 235). That is a question for the legislature, who may alter the law as to them seems right. We have only to administer it, and to proceed to apply what we consider to be the judgment of the House of Lords to the facts in the present case. The case contains a power to draw inferences of fact, and therefore it is open to the plaintiff to contend that we should draw the inference, that the transactions stated in the case were not really what they appear to be. I shall afterwards deal with the question how far I think such inferences ought to be drawn; at present I shall consider the case on the supposition that the various transactions between the parties really were what they purport to be.

It appears, then, that in March, 1857, the son of the defendant entered into a written agreement with Mr. Fenn, an underwriter, which is set out in the case. By this agreement the son was to be an underwriter, but the management of the business was to be confided to Fenn, who, in consideration of a salary of 300*l.* a year, was to act for the son. On the same day on which this agreement was made, the defendant authorized Mr. Fenn to state to the committee of Lloyd's that he, the defendant, had placed at Mr. Fenn's disposal 5,000*l.*, and intended to give his son further aid if needed. In November, 1858, it was resolved to extend the business carried on by Fenn, in the name of the son, and by an agreement between them Fenn's salary was raised to 350*l.* On the 1st of January, 1859, the son signed a letter addressed to the defendant, which is set out in the case. By it, in consideration of the defendant's guaranteeing the son to the extent of 5,000*l.* in his business of underwriter, until by such business he should acquire the clear sum of 5,000*l.*, the son promised to pay during their joint lives an annuity of 500*l.* a year, to be increased in case one-fourth of the son's average annual net profits during the first three years should exceed 500*l.*, to a sum equal to one-fourth of such net average annual profits. This arrangement, as worded, would not increase the annuity unless the son's average net profits during the first three years exceeded 2,000*l.* a year, so that it would seem the parties contemplated carrying on a business much more extensive than was justified by a capital of 5,000*l.*, and it is not very surprising to find, that before the three years' end the son was a bankrupt. It was expressly stipulated in the letter, that the defendant should not be a partner with his son in his business. This last stipulation is binding between them, but does not affect third parties; and consequently, the first question we have to determine is, whether this agreement did constitute a partnership as to third parties. And I think that, assuming it to represent the real transaction, it did not constitute a partnership. It is not an arrangement by which the defendant agrees to carry on the trade in the name of his son, nor even one in which he stipulates for a portion of the profits of that trade; but it is a purchase of an annuity, secured only by the personal promise of the son; the consideration being, that the defendant binds himself to make advances to the son, to the extent of 5,000*l.*, when required in the business.

In August, 1859, the son married, and prior to his marriage he executed a deed of settlement, which is made part of this case. This deed was between the son of the first part, the intended wife of the second part, and two trustees (of whom the defendant was one) of the third part. It recites the agreements between the son and Fenn, for carrying on the son's business under the management of Fenn, and also the agreements between the son and the defendant, by which the son bound himself to pay the defendant an annuity, and an agreement in contemplation of the marriage, by which the son engaged to convey some railway shares and other property, and also all the proceeds of his underwriting business, to trustees on certain trusts; and then the son does, by the deed, assign over to the trustees (one of whom is the defendant) all monies, the proceeds of the underwriting business, then in the hands of Fenn, or any other person who might be substituted as manager of the son's business, or thereafter so to be, and gave them a power of attorney to recover such monies from the manager. And then the indenture declares the trusts on which the monies are to be held: these are, in the first place, to pay the annuity to the defendant; next to pay the son an allowance of 500*l.* a year, to be increased if the business prospered, to 750*l.*; then to accumulate the surplus until it amounted to 8,500*l.* and so remained for two years without reduction, when the engagement to pay over the future proceeds of the business to the trustees was to cease. There is a proviso, that at any time during the continuance of the engagement the trustees were, upon the request of the son, or his manager for the time being, to raise out of the property assigned by the son and the accumulated fund, any sum required to meet emergencies occurring in the underwriting business. The ultimate trusts of the accumulated fund, when it should have remained two years without reduction at the sum of 8,500*l.*, were to repay any advances made by the defendant under his guarantie, and, subject thereto, for the benefit of the wife and children.

Such a settlement as this would be very inconvenient in most trades, but when the peculiar nature of an underwriting business, as carried on at Lloyd's, is borne in mind, it seems a prudent enough arrangement. The course of business was stated in Xenos v. Wickham (14 Com. B. Rep. (n.s.) 460; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104), and we were informed during the course of the argument that it was stated accurately. The premiums are received by the broker, and out of those, losses and returns of premium are paid by him, the balance being paid over to the underwriter at stated intervals. So long, therefore, as the losses do not exceed the ordinary and expected average, the underwriter only receives money. But if the losses exceed the average, so that the whole premiums in the hands of the broker are absorbed by these losses, the underwriter has to find the funds to meet the excess, and it is to be anticipated, that at irregular intervals such extraordinary losses will occur. The underwriter, therefore, ought not to spend the annual proceeds of his trade, as if they were clear gain, but should keep a considerable reserve fund. Now, if by a settlement, an underwriter binds himself to his trustees to limit his personal expenditure, and to put the residue of the proceeds of the trade in their hands as a reserve fund, to meet the emergencies of his trade, and, subject to meeting those emergencies, to form a fund for the benefit of his family, he does not bind himself to do that which a prudent man ought to do of his own accord. It is true that by entering into this agreement, the trustees do take the profits of the trade; and whilst Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235), was considered as unqualified law, it would have been difficult to say, that they did not thereby, by operation of law, make themselves partners in the trade and personally responsible, though it may be observed, that they do not by this arrangement withdraw the profits from the reach of the creditors, but rather secure that the trader should not spend them, and that they should remain as a fund to meet emergencies. But when we find the object of their taking the profits of the trade is to keep them as a reserve fund to meet the emergencies of the business, I think it becomes clear, that though they take the profits, they do not cause the business to be carried on for them; that the participation is not such as to constitute the relation of principal and surety between the trustees of the settlement and the underwriter; and that, according to Cox v. Hickman (8 H. L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104), is the true question. I think, therefore, that such a settlement does not of itself make the trustees partners in the business.

In the present case, the first trust was to pay the defendant his annuity, and it was argued that, though his co-trustee, Mr. Donnison, might not be a partner or a principal in the underwriting business of the son, yet that the defendant, being not only a trustee, but also beneficially interested in the profits when received by him, and his co-trustee, was a partner. But if the previous arrangement between the defendant and his son was really what it purported to be, and the defendant really was an annuity creditor of his son, this arrangement goes no further than that did in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104). There is only one creditor instead of many, but in every other respect the words of Lord Cranworth, already cited, are strictly applicable: "The debtor" (in this case the son) "is still the person solely interested in the profits, save only that he has transferred them" (or in this case a part of them) to his creditor, the defendant. The son receives the benefit of the profits as they accrue, though he has precluded himself from applying this portion of them to any other purpose than the payment of this annuity, for which he was already liable. The trade is not carried on by or on account of the annuitant creditor. I think therefore, that assuming that the transactions were what they really purport to be, the defendant was not liable as a partner in the business carried on in his son's name.

We have now to consider whether, in the exercise of the power to draw reasonable inferences of fact, we ought to draw the inference that in reality the transactions were not such as they purport to be, but that they were a cloak for a scheme, by which the defendant really carried on the business for himself. This seems to have been the view of the matter taken by Mr. Justice Byles in the Court below, and to have to some extent influenced the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice Erle. And I think that there was evidence, which, had the case gone to the jury, must have been submitted to them in support of this view of the matter. The son was not intrusted with the management of his own business, which was confided entirely to Fenn; and the 5,000*l.*, which the defendant had stated was placed at Fenn's disposal, was kept in the hands of the defendant; and the arrangement by which the father was to receive an annuity of 500*l.* a year, is based on what seems to me a very exaggerated estimate of the probable profits of the business; and all this is evidence tending to shew that the original intention was that the business should be the father's, carried on for him and under his control. But these facts are also quite consistent with the supposition that there was a distrust of the son's steadiness and experience, and that therefore, though he was started in business on his own account, it was judged prudent to prevent his having for a time the full control of his business and his funds. And on the point which presses more strongly against the defendant, namely, the taking what seems to me so large a return for his advances to the business, we are left in ignorance as to what are the usual rates of interest allowed for money employed in the business of an underwriter, or what profits might honestly be expected to arise from the business. On these points, a jury would themselves probably have had some personal knowledge—we have none. They would also have had the benefit of hearing the evidence of the two Sharps and of Fenn, who might have been examined and cross-examined, and, no doubt, would have been so had the case gone to the jury. It was urged, by Mr. Lush, on the argument before us, that when the parties, instead of going to a jury, agree that the facts shall be stated for the Court, they do impliedly admit that there is no fraud or deceit in the matter, and that the power reserved to the Court to draw inferences of fact should be understood as qualified by that implied admission. There is much force in this argument, and without going so far as to say that the Court should never draw an inference of fact, that transactions stated in a special case were a colour and a cloak to conceal something really different, I certainly think that no such inference should be drawn unless it is very clearly made out. In the present case, I think we are not justified in drawing any such inference. For these reasons, I think that the judgment should be reversed.

The Lord Chief Baron requests me to say that he concurs in this judgment, and it is to be considered as his as well as mine.

CHANNELL, B.—The question for our decision in this case is, whether the defendant is liable on a policy of insurance. The policy was not subscribed by him or in his name, and the defendant can only be liable upon it on the ground that the policy was subscribed by some person acting as his agent by authority, either express or to be implied from the defendant's conduct. If it were subscribed in the due course of the business of a partnership, of which the defendant was a member, then the person subscribing would be the defendant's agent, and would derive his authority by operation of law from the existence of the partnership. In all the cases the reason why a man is held to be liable as being a partner in a business, for contracts not personally entered into by him, is to be found in the fact of the relation of principal and agent being assumed to exist between partners. Whatever doubt the cases of Grace v. Smith (2 W. Black. 998) and Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235) may have given rise to must be taken, I think, to be set at rest by the case of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104) in the House of Lords. I agree with my Brother Blackburn in his remarks on that case, that we are not bound by every reason given by the learned Lords in delivering their opinions. Of course, we are bound by the ratio decidendi in that case. It is to be collected principally from the judgments of Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale, with whose opinions, however, the other learned Lords who took part in the decision entirely agree. As my Brother Blackburn has cited at length the more important passages from the elaborate judgment of Lord Cranworth, and as I agree with my Brother Blackburn as to the ratio decidendi in that case, I content myself with saying that I adopt, without repeating at length, his views as to the effect of that decision. I think that, henceforth we may take it that the true test, where a person is sought to be made liable on the ground of his being a partner, is to see whether he has constituted the other alleged partner his agent in respect of the partnership business, and that taking a part in the profits, though cogent evidence of this, is not conclusive. Mere participation in the profits is not sufficient to make a man bound by alleged partnership contracts, if the facts shew that he had not constituted the others his agents. Now, in the present case, taking the facts stated in the case to be the actual facts, I cannot see any agency constituted. It is clear, in the first place, that care was expressly taken that it should not be done, and certainly none can be implied from the conduct of the defendant on the ground of his having held himself out as a partner, for it is stated that the plaintiff did not at the time of the insurance know the facts upon which it is now sought to make the defendant liable. In what other way, then, could authority be conferred? Only, as it seems to me, if the facts shewed that the business was really the business of the defendant, carried on for the benefit of himself, and not of his son, or for his benefit together with his son. In that case, having accepted the benefit of contracts made on his behalf where beneficial, he would be precluded from repudiating the authority of the person making them, where they proved unprofitable. Such a state of things does not, however, appear from the case as the facts are there stated. It was the business of the defendant's son. The defendant received an annuity of 500*l.*, in consideration of his guarantie or advance of 5,000*l.* If the business had prospered, the surplus would have gone to the benefit of the son, always assuming the facts stated to be the real facts, and not colourable. It is true that the defendant, as one of the trustees of the marriage settlement referred to in the case was to receive the profits; but in considering the effect of this, we must look at the trusts of the deed and the nature of an underwriter's business. The trustees had not to manage the business, as the trustees of the creditors' deed in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104) had: they had to apply the funds first in payment of 500*l.* a year to Sharp senior, the defendant. This, if we accept the statement in the case as to its origin, is a mere debt incurred by Sharp junior, in obtaining capital to start him in business. So far, there is a mere mortgage of profits, which, according to Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104), will not make the mortgage liable. Next, there is to be a payment of 500*l.* a year to Sharp junior, on which, I think, nothing turns, in considering the liability of Sharp senior. Then comes the trust for the accumulation or reserve fund. This is to provide for the losses which, in their particular business, are to be expected in some years to exceed the profits, and which must be paid out of capital or accumulated profits of previous years. Can the fact that the profits are to be paid to the trustees for such a purpose as this make the business that of the trustees, any more than an agreement to pay them to a particular bank would make the bankers partners? If profits had been made and the money accumulated, no doubt those funds could have been made available for the benefit of creditors; but the question here is, no profits being made, can the acceptance by the trustees of the trust to take the profits and hold them for such a purpose, without any powers of management, make the business that of the trustees, and carried on on their behalf? I think it cannot be so, upon the facts of the case, taking them to be precisely as stated. We have, however, power to draw inferences, and we are asked, on behalf of the plaintiff, to draw the inference that the business was really the business of the defendant. I believe the difference of opinion which exists on the bench of this Court is more as to the extent of this power, and the use we ought to make of it, than as to the law applicable to the case. The judgment of my Brother Byles in the Court below was expressly founded on the inference drawn by him. Now, the view I take of such a power is, that from the facts stated we may draw any inference fairly arising as to other facts not stated: but I do not think we are at liberty for that purpose to vary the facts stated to us, and to infer that the facts stated are merely colourable, and the real transaction a different one. A jury may, of course, discredit any portion of the evidence before them, and by doing so as to part of a case, they have a much wider range within which to find an interpretation to place upon it than we have under a mere power to draw inferences. For the reasons which I have stated, and which are more fully explained by some of my learned Brothers, I think, taking the facts literally as stated, the plaintiffs have not made out the liability of the defendant. I see no inference fairly arising as to additional facts, which would strengthen the plaintiffs' case, and I decline to draw the inference that the facts stated are merely colourable, and the business really that of the defendant. I therefore think the judgment ought to be reversed.

BRAMWELL, B.—In this case the plaintiffs declare that they made a policy of insurance, and that "the defendant, in consideration of a certain premium paid to him by the plaintiffs, subscribed the said policy for 100*l.*, and became an insurer thereon to the plaintiffs for that amount." The defendant pleads that "he did not subscribe the said policy or become an insurer as alleged"; and the question is, whether the plaintiffs have proved the allegation so traversed. This is the real and ultimate question. Because though this, like many other cases, has been argued as though the questions were, whether the defendant was a partner with somebody else, and though this way of arguing is reasonable enough, as primâ facie a partner is liable for the acts of his co-partner, within the ordinary scope of partnership authority, yet, inasmuch as a man may be a partner and not liable, or not a partner and yet liable, the determination of partnership or no partnership does not settle the question which still remains, "did the defendant subscribe the policy and become an insurer"? Now he did not subscribe it with his own hand, nor is he liable on the ground of holding himself out as a partner or principal in this matter, for he has not done so. The only other way in which he can be liable is by reason of his having given authority to the person who signed it, so to sign and bind him. The person who did sign it is described in the case as a "clerk"; he signed the name of the defendant's son. Then did the defendant give that person any authority so to sign and bind him? That he did not in words is certain, nor did he in intention, nor did the clerk intend to bind him; nor did his son, nor Fenn, nor did the plaintiffs suppose he was bound, nor intend to deal with or trust him, but his son. If then he is liable, if he has given such authority, it is against the intentions of all parties, it is in spite of their meaning the contrary, and must therefore be from some force in the nature of the transaction itself—and this may be. If the defendant was really the principal, or one of the principals in the transaction, if those who acted really were his agents, if on the truth appearing he had a right to say the contract was made with him, and to enforce it, he ought to be and would be liable: as, for instance, if there was a business which required the buying of goods on credit, and of a person there to carry it on in the name of an agent, whether such agency was an agency of a partnership or any other, so that upon the purchase of goods by the agent or partner the property vested wholly or in part in the first-named person, then he would, as it seems to me, be liable, though he had stipulated with his agent or partner he should not be. Because he would have tried for an impossibility, for a thing repugnant in itself, viz., that the contract should be made with him, for his benefit, but not to bind him. It becomes necessary then to examine the facts. I think it not open to us to find that there is fraud or that the arrangements were colourable; questions of that character are essentially for a jury. We have power to draw only reasonable inferences. I think that does not extend to enable us to infer fraud. It is not intended to disable us from drawing unreasonable inferences, but from drawing inferences of matter which it would not be reasonable to leave to inference, and I think it would not be reasonable to leave to inference whether the apparent facts were the real facts when the defendant and his son and Fenn have not been called as witnesses, and when we scarcely know anything that has taken place during the three years the business was carried on. Nor can I suppose such a thing is left to us in face of the statement in the case that the underwriting business of the son was carried on by Fenn, and that Fenn carried on the underwriter's business for Sharp junior, until and at the time of making the policy. At the same time, if I had to find whether the arrangement was fraudulent or colourable, I should say it was not. I think the arrangements, though complicated, are intelligible, and such as might well be honestly made. The facts are as follows: Fenn and Sharp junior agreed in March, 1857, that Fenn should do an underwriter's business for Sharp junior, on certain terms. With this the defendant had nothing to do, except giving a guarantie to the extent of 5,000*l.*, not to find capital, which, I believe, is not needed in such a business, but to be liable to losses to that amount. He had no claim to profits, or in any way to meddle with the business. In November, 1858, the business having proved profitable, a fresh arrangement was made between Fenn and Sharp junior, whereby the business was to be increased and Fenn's salary also. On the occasion, and in consequence of this, the defendant bargained with his son for an annuity for their joint lives of 500*l.*, or of a sum equal to one quarter of the profits if that quarter exceeded 500*l.* This may have been unfatherly and extortionate, as is said, if real, but clearly would not make the defendant a partner in or proprietor of the business. I do not say it was either extortionate or unfair. If the son was making large profits, he might well be able to pay the annuity, and the defendant ran the risk of that which has happened, viz., receiving nothing and paying a great deal. If the matter had stopped here, there would be no pretence for saying the defendant was liable. The next thing is the marriage settlement. What is its separate operation? If of itself it makes the defendant liable to this action, so it does Donnison, and would prove that he subscribed the policy and became an insurer. Does it then make both of them so liable? Now, it seems to me to be an elaborate contrivance for insuring the son's life for the benefit of his intended wife and their children, and if he lived of raising a round sum of 10,000*l.*, i. e., shares worth 1,500*l.* and money 8,500*l.*, for the same purposes. The deed contains appropriate clauses for this purpose, the majority of which need not be noticed, except that they are such as might be expected in a bona fide instrument. But it contains an assignment to the defendant and Donnison of all the money, earnings, profits, and emoluments then in the hands of Fenn, and of such as should thereafter come to his hands as agent of Sharp the younger. To know the effect of this, it should be known what Fenn would have in his hands belonging to Sharp junior, a description of which will be found in the judgment of my Brother Blackburn in Xenos v. Wickham (14 Com. B. Rep. (N.S.) 460; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104). But, no doubt, it is an assignment of all the profits of the business, and, indeed it might be an assignment of capital; thus, in one year there may be a balance of loss, which, of course, must come from capital, in the next year a balance of gain, which replaces capital: so on one account there may be a loss, on another profit. Anyhow, everything is taken, but there is a trust, which I take to be obligatory, to return out of the assigned property, including the railway shares, any money from time to time required to meet exigencies in the business. The trustees then are to return what they receive till the business can spare it. So for the deed seems very intelligible. It is as though the defendant and his son and Donnison had said the son shall be made to save to the extent of 10,000*l.*; for that purpose he shall hand all he gets to the defendant and Donnison till they have got 10,000*l.*; but as he may want it back for the business, all or part is to be returned to him when wanted for that purpose. But then, if everything is taken from him he can neither maintain himself nor pay his debts, accordingly provision is made for paying the father his annuity, and for the son's maintenance, and for repayment of any part of the 5,000*l.* the defendant may have to advance. What is the difference between this deed and a deed by which Sharp junior should have covenanted to pay to trustees of his marriage settlement what he could spare after maintaining himself, paying his debts and providing for the emergencies of his business? There is none except that the trustees secure his doing so, by giving themselves as far as they can, a right to take everything, handing back what he would otherwise have to deduct, and agreeing how much that shall be. Now suppose the defendant had not been a trustee, would this deed have made Donnison a partner in or proprietor of the business? and if so, why? If it would not, would it make the defendant so because there are trusts in it for his benefit? and if so, why? And if he is not liable in his character of trustee, nor in his character of cestui que trust separately, does it make any difference that he is both, and if so, why? I cannot see. Suppose the covenants had been with the defendant and Donnison to pay the monies to other persons as trustees, A. and B,—who would be partners or proprietors of the business then? A. and B., or defendant and Donnison, or all four? Would they all have subscribed the policy and become insurers? It is to be observed that it does not appear that the defendant or Donnison ever received anything. It does appear the defendant paid something under his guarantee. Reliance is placed on the statement that Sharp junior kept no banking account; that Fenn received and paid. But that was to be expected. Also on this, that Sharp junior paid what he drew out of the business into his father's account, and drew in his own name, on the same bankers of course, to be paid out of his father's account. But I really see nothing in this. It is not suggested he did not draw out as much as he paid in. Why, then, the deed being bona fide, is the defendant a partner or principal in the business? He can make no contract, nor order one, nor forbid one, nor enforce one, nor release one. If the profits were 10,000*l.* in the year, he would get nothing but his annuity: the residue would go to his son and trust fund. His annuity would be larger indeed, but that is unimportant. If there were no profits in any year he would still be entitled to his 500*l.* annuity. How can this state of facts prove that the defendant "subscribed the said policy and became an insurer"? It seems to me, therefore, that if the defendant is held to have "subscribed this policy and become an insurer," it will be so held, though, as I have said, he has not done so in form, nor in substance, and that he has so done, somehow, though there is no fraud, without his or any one else concerned intending it. Surely it seems enough to state this to shew that it cannot be true, and that therefore the defendant is not liable. The burden of proof to the contrary is on the plaintiffs. Now what reason do they give? They say that the defendant is a partner with his son, and that if not partners inter se they are so as regards third parties—a most remarkable expression. Partnership means a certain relation between two parties. How then can it be correct to say that A. and B. are not in partnership as between themselves? They have not held themselves out as being so, and yet a third person has a right to say they are so, as relates to him. But that must mean inter se, for partnership is a relation inter se, and the word cannot be used except to signify that relation. A. is not the agent of B; B. has never held him out as such, yet C. is entitled as between himself and B. to say that A. is the agent of B. Why is he so entitled, if the fact is not so, and B. has not so represented? But, “partnership,” and a “right to call a person partner as regards third parties,” are words, and the thing must be looked at, viz. the taking or sharing of profits, which it is said gives C. a right as against B. to say B. is a partner of A. Why should it? I trust that in the present state of authority this question may be freely handled without presumption, and that the goodness of such a rule may be examined. Because, though we are bound to administer the law as we find it, yet, when we are considering what is the law, we may not improperly inquire into the reasonableness of that suggestion. Why then does a taking or sharing of A.’s profits by B. entitle C. to demand payment by B. of A.’s debts in the trade? How, if there is such taking and sharing in this case, does it prove that the defendant “subscribed the policy, and became an insurer”? If A. agrees with B. to share profits and losses, but not to interfere with the business, and not to buy or sell, and does not interfere, nor buy nor sell, and C. knowing this, deals with B, he would have no claim on A. Why should he, if he does not know of it? Why, upon finding out something between A. and B, which has in no way affected or influenced him, should he who has dealt with B. have a claim on A? It is said because profits are what the creditors trust to, they are his fund for payment. This would be a bad reason if true; in fact a man who trusts another generally has a claim on his profits and capital too. How does a man who trusts the former only more affect the creditor’s fund? But, further, it really is not true in substance, only in words. It is not a receipt of profit in substance that makes a man liable. If I agree to receive a sum in proportion to profit, as for instance a sum equal to a tenth, I am not liable. If I receive a tenth I am. What is the difference except in words, at least as far as creditors are concerned? How can one set of words between A. and B. give C. a right, and the same thing in other words not? How many men in a thousand, not lawyers, could be got to understand that of the two servants of a firm, the one, who received a tenth of the profits was liable for its debts, the other, who received a sum equal to a tenth was not. This Mr. Justice Storey calls “satisfactory.” Satisfactory in what sense? In a practical, business sense? No, but in the sense of an acute and subtle lawyer, who is pleased with refined distinctions, interesting as intellectual exercise, though unintelligible to ordinary men, and mischievous when applied to the ordinary affairs of life. Lord Eldon did not think it satisfactory.² Such a law is a law of surprise and injustice, and against good policy. It fixes a liability on a man contrary to his intent and expectation, and without reason, and gives a benefit to another which he did not bargain for and ought not to have, and prevents that free use of capital and enterprise which is so important. It is said, this is true of a dormant partner; but it is not. His existence may be unknown to the creditor. But the dormant partner knows he is liable and means to be, and the creditor trusts all such persons. He means to deal with all real partners. It may be said, that if this reasoning is right a man might bargain to receive all the profit of a business and not be liable. The answer is, the thing is impossible. There never was and never will be a bona fide agreement by one man to carry on a business, bear all its losses and pay over all its profits. Should such an agreement appear, it would obviously be colourable. When there is a chance of profit to the trader then such an agreement may be honest, and when honest ought not to make him liable who is certainly to receive some of the profits, and perhaps all. I have hitherto dealt with the case on principle. I proceed to examine the authorities. The labour formerly needful is now rendered unnecessary by Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104). That case has settled the law, I may be permitted, I hope, to say in a perfectly satisfactory manner. It is there laid down that the question in such cases as the present is one of authority, one of agency. Lord Campbell says, "The defendant can only be liable upon the supposition that the person who wrote the acceptance on the bills of exchange was their mandatory for that purpose." Lord Wensleydale says, "And the simple question will be this, whether Haywood was authorized by either of the defendants as a partner in that company to bind him by those acceptances." His Lordship proceeds, "Haywood must be taken to have been authorized to accept for them by those who actually carried on business under that firm. Were the appellants partners in it?" And further, "The question then is, whether this deed makes the creditors who sign it partners with the trustees, or, what is really the same thing, agents to bind them by acceptances on account of the business"; and generally I refer to his whole judgment, particularly to the passage beginning, "Hence it becomes a test of the liability," down to "liable as a partner." Lord Cranworth puts the same two arguments together—I refer to the passage beginning, "It was argued," and ending "to have been made." This, then, is our guide for the future. The question here is, was the underwriter's business carried on by persons acting on the defendant's behalf? Now, it certainly was not. The clerk who signed the policy, Fenn and the son, acted on the son's behalf. That is, unless the whole is a sham, which, as I have before said, I think is not open to us to consider; nor true if it were open to us. This ought to dispose of the case. But even if we assume that the law supposed to exist before Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104) remains untouched, that is to say, the supposed law of Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Black. 235), I think the same conclusion ought to be come to. Lord Wensleydale does not notice that case; Lord Cranworth does, and, with submission, gives a better reason for the decision than is to be found in the case itself. The Chief Justice there says the question is, whether they have not constituted themselves partners in respect to other persons, and puts his decision on the ground that "he who takes a moiety of all the profits indefinitely, shall by operation of law be liable to losses." Let us hope that this notion is overruled,—one which I believe has caused more injustice and mischief than any bad law in our books. But even if not, how is this case within it. By the letter of the 1st of January, 1859, after the business had proved profitable, the son agreed to pay his father for their joint lives 500*l.* a year absolutely, not out of profits nor dependent on them; with a provision for an increase in proportion to profits if they reached beyond a certain amount. This would not make the defendant a receiver of profits nor give him a right to an account, nor in fact bring him within any of the old fancied rules of liability. Then comes the settlement in which the defendant is a trustee. As far as the settlement alone is concerned the defendant is no more liable than the other trustee, and why is he to be liable? It remains to notice the judgment of the Court below. With great respect I think Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104) was not followed. The Chief Justice says the deed made the defendant a partner by giving him an interest in the business, and finishes by saying the question is, whether the creditors may come on the defendant in respect of the profits. But according to the judgment in Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104), the question does not turn on that. Mr. Justice Byles seems to consider the case as a contrivance for giving the defendant the profits,—that in reality it was his business. If so, of course he is liable. Mr. Justice Montague Smith says he thinks the deed an arrangement by which the defendant was to have the profits as profits, eo nomine, and that he is liable as a partner. But if Lords Cranworth and Wensleydale have laid down the true rule, it is not that indicated in this last expression. It seems to me, then, there is here no partnership, no taking of profits which could have brought the case within what was supposed to be law before Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104); that on reason and principle that supposed law was wrong: that it is now condemned by the authority of Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104): that anyhow Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104) is the governing case, and that it lays down rules which decide this in favour of the defendant. I hope I shall not be charged with arrogance for the way I have spoken of bygone opinions. The law had drifted into the condition from which it was rescued by Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104). No one in particular was responsible for, and probably no one person would have put it at once in the position it was. But the true line had been departed from, at first but a little, and for a good reason, and every subsequent move took it further away in a wrong direction, till it was happily brought back by Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 104). The majority of this Court are of opinion the judgment should be reversed; therefore, judgment will be pronounced accordingly.

Judgment reversed.

GRAY v. WILSON.

35 L. J. C.P. 123; L. R. 1 C.P. 50; 14 W. R. 584.

Arbitration—Reference to Master—Power to appoint Surveyor.

ARBITRATION, REFERENCE AND AWARDS.—An action on a builder's bill was referred to the Master:—Held, that the Master might appoint a surveyor to report as to value, but that he must receive the report in the same way as other evidence, and could not refuse to hear any additional evidence tendered by the parties.

This was an action on a builder's bill referred to the Master under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125.

The Master, before witnesses were called, intimated that he should send a surveyor to view the work and report its value, and should give his certificate accordingly. This being objected to by the defendant, the Master pro forma gave a certificate for the whole amount, that the opinion of the Court might be taken.

Robinson, Serj. appeared on behalf of the defendant.

Laxton, on behalf of the plaintiff.

The Master stated that he had acted in conformity with the usual practice of the Masters. By order of the Court and consent of the parties, the matter was referred back to the Master,—

The Court (Erle, C.J., Willes, J., Byles, J. and Keating, J.), approving of the practice of thus sending an independent surveyor to report, but laying down that the report must be received just like other evidence, and that the Master must hear in addition such evidence as the parties tendered.

Carriers by Railway—Damage to Horses by Delay—Condition "at Owner's Risk"—Alternative Methods of Carriage—Parol Evidence as to Meaning of Terminus mentioned in Contract—Parol Evidence to raise Inference of Contract for Carriage.

CARRIERS.—Horses sent from Shipton by the defendants' railway to Wolverhampton, to be delivered there, were sent to a station called Herbert Street station; if booked through to Manchester (as they might be), they were sent to Bushbury Junction, a mile beyond Wolverhampton, to meet a train on another railway, to be carried to Manchester. Horses might be sent either by horse-boxes and passenger train, when the company charged more money and took more risk, or by cattle-trucks and goods train, when they charged less and took less risk. The plaintiff went to the station-master at Shipton, and required twelve horses to be carried to Manchester by the latter method; the station-master told him he could not book through, but would telegraph to Wolverhampton to have the horses sent on to meet the train on the other railway. The plaintiff paid the fare to Wolverhampton, and signed a contract, on which was the direction "Shipton to Wolverhampton," and a declaration that the horses were carried "at owner's risk." The trucks were directed to Wolverhampton; the horses were taken to the Herbert Street station, and it was clear that if they ought, under the contract, to have been carried to Bushbury Junction, there was a delay of twenty-four hours, and consequent injury to the horses:—Held, first, that there was some evidence that "Wolverhampton" meant "Bushbury Junction"; secondly, that as there was an alternative method of carriage, the condition as to risk was reasonable; thirdly, that the condition did not apply to a failure to carry in a reasonable time.

The plaintiff, in order to prove a contract to carry six horses from Shipton to Manchester, relied on a conversation at Manchester with the station-master there, in which he, the plaintiff, said he was going to send the horses, and the station-master said he would telegraph about them; on the fact of the arrival of the horses; and on the station-master conducting himself as if there were such a contract; but the plaintiff did not put in any written contract, though it was clear there was one:—Held, that there was no evidence to go to the jury of a contract to carry the horses.

This was an action against the defendants, as carriers, for not carrying certain horses of the plaintiff safely and within a reasonable time.

The first count of the declaration alleged that, in consideration that the plaintiff would deliver to the defendants, as carriers of goods for hire, certain goods, that is to say, twelve horses of the plaintiff, to be by the defendants carried from Shipton to Manchester, and there delivered, for the plaintiff, for reward to the defendants, the defendants promised the plaintiff to carry the said goods safely and with due care from Shipton to Manchester aforesaid, and there deliver the same for the plaintiff, within a reasonable time in that behalf; and the plaintiff delivered the said goods to the defendants, and the defendants received the same for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, and all conditions were performed and all things happened to entitle the plaintiff to have the said goods safely and with due care carried and delivered within a reasonable time in that behalf as aforesaid; yet the defendants did not safely and with due care convey and deliver the said goods for the plaintiff as aforesaid within a reasonable time, whereby certain alleged damage accrued to the horses, and the plaintiff was put to certain alleged expenses.

The second count of the declaration was in similar terms with respect to six other horses.

The defendants pleaded, first, a denial of the alleged promise; and, secondly, that they did safely and with due care carry and deliver the said goods for the plaintiff within a reasonable time.

At the trial the following facts appeared: Shipton is on the West Midland Railway, which forms part of the Great Western Railway system, and which runs through Shipton to Wolverhampton. At Wolverhampton there is a station belonging to the defendants, called the Herbert Street station, and about a mile beyond Wolverhampton (strictly so called) there is a junction called the Bushbury Junction, where the defendants' railway runs into the London and North-Western Railway which goes to Manchester, but where there is no station. Horses and cattle booked from Shipton to Wolverhampton to be delivered there are taken to the Herbert Street station, but those booked through to Manchester are taken to Bushbury Junction, and the responsibility of the defendants continues to the termination of the transit. There are through-rates, and animals are booked through Wolverhampton to Manchester. Horses may be sent either by passenger or goods train, the charge in the latter case being much cheaper than in the former.

The plaintiff went to the station-master at Shipton with respect to sending twelve horses from that place to Manchester by goods train, and was told by him that there was no through-rate, but that he would telegraph to Wolverhampton for the horses to be forwarded to catch a certain goods express train on the London and North-Western Railway. A ticket was prepared, which, among other matters, contained on its face the number of horses, the amount of the fare (to Wolverhampton), the plaintiff's name, and the words "from Shipton to Wolverhampton" and "two drovers free"; and on its back was the following declaration, signed by the plaintiff: "Declaration, to be signed when horses are conveyed in waggons.—I hereby declare that the value of the horses this day delivered by me to the West Midland Railway Company for conveyance in cattle-waggons by luggage trains does not exceed 10*l.* per horse; and in consideration of the rate charged for conveyance of such horses I hereby agree that the same are to be carried entirely at the owner's risk." Instead of availing himself of the free pass, the plaintiff went by an earlier passenger train; arranged, at the nearest station to Wolverhampton on the London and North-Western Railway, for the horses going on, booked them, paid the fare, and then proceeded on his journey. The waggons were labelled "Shipton to Wolverhampton," and no servant of the plaintiff went with them. They were taken to the Herbert Street station, and there remained till inquiries were made and directions received; they were then sent on to the Bushbury Junction, and it was clear that if, under the circumstances, the defendants were bound to have taken them to Bushbury Junction there was an improper delay of twenty-four hours. The horses eventually arrived in Manchester, much injured, it was alleged, by the length of time they had been on their journey.

With respect to the six horses, the plaintiff proved that he informed the defendants' manager at Manchester that he (the plaintiff) had six horses which were to be delivered the following morning at Shipton, that the manager said he would telegraph and see that they were properly loaded and booked through, that they arrived injured by their journey, and that the manager expressed his surprise that they had not arrived before, and conducted himself as if this ought to have been the case. But no direct evidence was given as to when these horses were delivered to the defendants, or how the delay (if any) occurred; nor was any written contract produced, though, from certain matters which took place at the trial, it was clear that there was one.

The first count was amended by substituting "Wolverhampton" for "Manchester."

A verdict was found for the plaintiff as to all the eighteen horses for 90*l.*, calculated at 5*l.* a horse. But the learned Judge gave leave to the defendants to move in manner set forth in the following rule.

A rule was obtained calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict found for him on the first count of the declaration should not be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict entered thereon for the defendants, and the damages found in this cause be reduced by the sum of 60*l.* accordingly, pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that there was no evidence of any breach of the contract, or of any negligence by the defendants to deliver the horses in that count mentioned, or on the ground that by the condition in the contract the defendants were exempted from the liability complained of; and why the verdict found for the plaintiff on the second count of the said declaration should not be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict be entered thereon for the said defendants, pursuant also to leave reserved, on the ground that there was no evidence of any contract for the conveyance of the six horses in that count mentioned, nor any evidence of any breach of that contract, or of any negligence by the defendants; or why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial be had, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence.

E. James and R. G. Williams now shewed cause.—First, as to the twelve horses. The facts (which they reviewed at length) shew that both the intention and the contract was to carry them to Bushbury Junction, that by mistake they were sent to Herbert Street station, and that delay and damage were thereby occasioned. With respect to the provision that the horses were to be carried at "owner's risk," this protects against injuries by accident on the way, and not against delay to carry in a reasonable time. And further, if it does, then it is unreasonable. Thus in M'Cance v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (7 Hurl. & N. 477; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 65), Bramwell, B. held a condition that horses should be carried entirely at owner's risk was unreasonable. In Aldridge v. the Great Western Railway Company (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 582; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 161) the Court seems to have thought a provision against "loss, detention and damage," was unreasonable; and in Allday v. the Great Western Railway Company (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 5) it was expressly held, that a provision against liability for delay was unreasonable. With respect to the six horses, what took place at Manchester clearly shewed that the defendants had undertaken the carriage of these horses, and that there was delay in the transit.

Pickering and Crompton, in support of the rule.—First, as to the twelve horses. The evidence relied on by the other side to shew a contract to carry to Bushbury Junction is the conversation at Shipton, where the note was signed; and the directions given by a consignor cannot be allowed to affect the written contract. The whole cause of the delay and damage in reality was the plaintiff's neglect in sending no one with these horses on so long a journey. The condition as to the owner's risk also was quite reasonable, because here there was an alternative, viz., to send at a greater expense with less risk, or at a less expense with a greater risk; and where such an alternative exists, such a condition as is contained in the present contract is reasonable—Peek v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (10 H.L. Cas. 473, 588; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 241). In Aldridge v. the Great Western Railway Company (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 582; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 161) all that was held was, that a provision against loss, &c., on another line was reasonable. In Simons v. the Great Western Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. 805, 826; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 25) it was held that a condition against loss or damage from any cause to goods carried at a special and peculiar rate was reasonable; and so, in the matter of telegraphing, a provision as to repeating, in order to insure accuracy, has been held reasonable—M'Andrew v. the Electric Telegraph Company (17 Com. B. Rep. 3; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 26). In Allday v. the Great Western Railway Company (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 5) the words were stronger than the present; and the only case where the same were used is M'Cance v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (7 Hurl. & N. 477; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 65); but in both those cases no alternative course was shewn to exist; and this distinction was clearly pointed out by the learned Judge at the trial, and by Cockburn, C.J. in the former of these cases. With respect to the six horses, there was not a particle of evidence of a contract, of the time of starting, or of any delay: it is the clear practice of railway companies, in ordinary course, to have a written contract, and none was produced here, though it is clear there was one.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule, so far as it relates to the twelve horses, should be discharged. It appears to me that there is great force in much that has been urged on behalf of the defendants, as to “Wolverhampton” meaning the Herbert Street station; but it seems to me there was some evidence to go to the jury that it meant the Bushbury Junction. This matter was left to the jury; the learned Judge is not dissatisfied; and I do not think it would benefit the railway company to have a new trial on the ground of the verdict being against evidence. With respect to the provision that the horses were to be carried at the owner’s risk, I think that the stipulation is entirely free from the decision of the House of Lords in Peek v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. 805, 826; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 25); for it seems to me that the learned and noble Lords who decided that case recognized the doctrine that it is reasonable for a railway company to have two modes of carriage—one, by which they take a great responsibility, and carry by horse-boxes, and another, by which they carry at a cheaper rate, but at a greater risk to the bailor. The contract of the railway company is to deliver the horses in a reasonable time at the owner’s risk. Whatever may happen to them on the journey is to be at the owner’s risk. But where the contract is to deliver within a reasonable time, there is a duty entirely distinct from the question of damage which may arise from accident on the journey. If a railway company are bound to carry horses in twenty-four hours at the owner’s risk, and the horses do not arrive accordingly, then, whether the horses are damaged or not, there is a breach of contract, for which the company are liable. With respect to damage to the horses on the road, in my opinion the company would not be liable for extra damage, but would be liable for all damage which might arise from the breach of contract in not arriving within a reasonable time. This is the total result of the trial in respect of the twelve horses and the 60*l*.

With respect to the six horses, which are alleged not to have been delivered in a reasonable time, the ground the plaintiff relied on was, that because the horses, somehow or other, got into a truck on part of the Great Western Railway, and somehow or other got out of the truck at the terminus at Manchester, therefore there might have been a contract by the Great Western Railway Company to take them to Manchester in a reasonable time. I am clearly of opinion that there was a contract, according to the usual course of the railway company, of which the Judges may almost take judicial notice; and, further, there is direct evidence in this particular case that the railway company took the animals on a written contract; and the plaintiff, in my opinion, cannot, by throwing before the jury the chance facts that, somehow or other, the horses got into the truck at one place, and, somehow or other, got out at another, ask the jury to infer a contract by the Great Western Railway Company to carry them. It is quite clear there was a written contract, and the plaintiff kept it from the jury, for the best possible reason, because it would disprove the thing which he asked the jury to infer. I think there was no evidence to go to the jury that the defendants were liable as to the six horses; and therefore, as to that part of the rule, it must be made absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants.

WILLES, J. and KEATING, J. concurred.

*Rule, as to the first count, discharged; and as to the second, made absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants, and reduce the damages by 30*l*.*

PHILLIPS AND OTHERS v. POLAND.

Bankrupt Act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 112—Protection from Arrest.

BANKRUPTCY.—An order for protection, granted under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 112, does not protect a bankrupt from arrest at the suit of a subsequent creditor, even though he has not passed his final examination.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiffs and the sheriff of Middlesex to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody, on the ground that he was privileged both at common law and by the protection granted by one of the Commissioners in Bankruptcy, under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 112. from arrest, till he had passed his final examination.

On the 1st of March, 1864, the defendant filed a petition in bankruptcy, and on the 22nd of March, 1864, he was duly adjudged bankrupt and surrendered, and protection was thereupon granted to him till the 28th of April, 1864. the time appointed for his last examination. This protection was renewed from time to time till the 29th of January, 1866, in order that he might pass his final examination on that day. In August and September, 1865, he purchased of the plaintiffs the goods which were the subject-matter of the action, and, on the 9th of December, 1865, judgment was signed.

On the 16th of December, 1865, a sheriff's officer came to the defendant's lodgings and produced a writ of fi. fa. on the judgment; and on being informed by the defendant that the goods there were not his and that he was a protected bankrupt who had not passed his final examination, and being shewn the order of protection, such officer produced a writ of ca. sa. and arrested the defendant.

An application had been made on the 19th of December, 1865, to Byles, J. at chambers, to discharge the defendant from custody, and he had referred the application to the Court.

Bullar shewed cause.—The question turns on the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 112, which enacts, that if a bankrupt "be not in prison or in custody at the date of the adjudication, he shall be free from arrest or imprisonment by any creditor in coming to surrender, and after such surrender during the time by this act limited for such surrender, and for such further time as shall be allowed him for finishing his examination, and for such time after finishing his examination, until his certificate be allowed as the Court shall from time to time by indorsement upon the summons of such bankrupt think fit to appoint." Now, first, there are three acts partially in force relating to this matter, viz., 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119. and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, the interpretation clause of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. is repealed (see section 230), a new interpretation clause is enacted (see section 229), and the three acts are to be read as one act (see section 232). This being so, "creditor" in the first act must receive the same interpretation as in the third; and on looking through this last act it will be found that wherever the word "creditor" is used, it is used in reference to creditors who can prove under the bankruptcy. And a different interpretation of the same word cannot be given in different portions of the same act, unless there be something clearly to indicate that this was intended.—The King v. the Guardians of the Holborn Union (6 Ad. & E. 68). But, secondly, the case of Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424) is conclusive on the point; that case was decided on this very section, and is on all-fours with the present case, the only difference being that there the bankrupt had passed his last examination. But that was quite immaterial, and the Court decided that the section only gave protection against creditors under the bankruptcy. And the Freston Cases (30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 460; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. Rep. 133; 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 89) are inapplicable, for there the creditor was one who had proved.

Quinn, for the sheriff, admitted the only distinction between the present case and Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424) was the one pointed out.

Nasmyth, in support of the rule.—The word “creditor,” in the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 112, extends to all creditors of every description. The case of Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424) is distinguishable on the ground that there the bankrupt had passed his final examination. This distinction is material, because the object of the section is, that the bankrupt should be at full liberty, in order to assist the Court in every way in disclosing every matter in respect of his property, and in collecting it for the benefit of the creditors; and this object would be equally interfered with, whether the arrest was by an antecedent or subsequent creditor; and therefore as long as the Court requires his assistance, and he has a duty to perform in respect of his property, i. e. down to the final examination, he should be protected against every one. And if it be said that this would entail inconvenience and injustice to third parties, it must be recollected that the time during which the protection would last is practically short, and during that time it is known that the debtor is a bankrupt; and therefore this inconvenience is much less than that which would be entailed by the contrary construction. Again, Davis v. Trotter (8 Term. Rep. 475), Ex parte Dalton (1 Ball & B. 130), Darby v. Baugham (5 Term. Rep. 209), and Ex parte Leigh (1 Glyn & J. 264), are authorities in favour of the present argument; and in Chitty's Practice (9th edit. p. 725) it is said, “It would seem from the cases decided under repealed acts on this subject, that these provisions (i. e. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. ss. 112, 113.) extend to all arrests by creditors, whether for debts provable under the fiat or not.”

WILLES, J.—This is a rule calling on the plaintiffs and the sheriff to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody. The judgment in this action was in respect of a debt incurred in September, 1865; the action was for goods sold and delivered; the judgment was regularly entered up, and a ca. sa. issued thereon, under which the defendant was arrested. He now claims to be discharged, because he is entitled to protection under section 112. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and he claims this protection under these circumstances. The petition was presented in March, 1864; on the 22nd of that month the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt, and he obtained an order for protection, which was renewed from time to time, and will not expire till the 29th of this present month. And there is no doubt that he was arrested whilst the time was running to which the protection extended. When he was arrested he was not at, going to, or returning from the Court of Bankruptcy, nor was he engaged in business relating to the proceedings in Bankruptcy, although he had not yet passed his last examination. On these facts, it is for us to decide whether he was rightly arrested on the 16th of December last. This question depends, not on any common law privilege, as he was not going to, attending or returning from the Court of Bankruptcy, but on the construction to be put on the word “creditor” in section 112, a section whereby the period during which the bankrupt is protected from arrest may be extended and the protection enforced, not only where the common law privilege exists, but also during the period between the time of his surrender and that of finishing his examination, and “for such time after finishing his examination, until his certificate be allowed, as the Court shall from time to time, by indorsement upon the summons of such bankrupt, think fit to appoint.”

The question for our consideration is, what is the meaning of the word “creditor”; whether it means any creditor for any debt whenever accruing, or one who can come in and prove under the bankruptcy? I am of opinion that the latter is the true construction. The rule is clear, that general words are to be construed generally, and so as to give full effect to them, unless there be something in the statute to shew that a contrary construction is to be put upon them. But it is also equally clear that general words are to be restrained to matters with which the statute is dealing; and if it be dealing with a certain subject-matter, they are to be restrained to it, unless it appears that the legislature was dealing with something larger. General words are to be restricted according to the persons or things in contemplation of the legislature; and it seems, therefore, on reading section 112, and looking to the use of the word "creditor" in other portions of the statute, that the intention of the legislature was to confine the word "creditor" to one who would come in and prove under the bankruptcy. The force of the argument to the contrary consists in respect of the necessity of protecting the bankrupt against, not only creditors who can prove, but also those whose debts have accrued since the bankruptcy. Now, as to this: a Court is appointed, before which the bankrupt is to appear, to which he is to surrender, which he is to assist by information, as to his affairs, and which is to receive, on the final examination, a complete account of his proceedings, by which it is to be guided in considering the question of his order of discharge. It is suggested that it is necessary that the bankrupt should be in a position always to appear before the Court in discharge of the duties imposed on him by the legislature, and that it is not unreasonable to protect him against creditors whose debts have accrued since the bankruptcy, just as a witness is protected when called on by a subpoena to give evidence. The contention, to a certain extent, is true; but in order to make it a valid reason in support of the proposition contended for, it is necessary to go further, and to shew that the bankrupt has no such protection unless the statute be so construed. Now, no such proposition as this is laid down anywhere, or supported by any authority; and a bankrupt in attending before the Court has the same protection as a witness. That alone is sufficient to dispose of the argument. But in addition another answer is afforded by the terms of section 112. itself, because it expressly gives a right to have the bankrupt brought up, when in prison or custody, by order of the Court, whenever it is necessary for the purposes of the bankruptcy proceedings,—a power which extends, not merely to cases where the process is in respect of debts, but also where it is in respect of criminal liabilities; for the words are, "whenever any bankrupt is in prison or in custody under any process, attachment, execution, commitment or sentence." Therefore, not only is there the common law protection, but an express power given by statute.

So much, therefore, as to the argument: now as to authority. I pass over the cases of Davis v. Trotter (8 Term. Rep. 475), Ex parte Dalton (1 Ball & B. 130), and Ex parte Leigh (1 Glyn & J. 264), because in the reports of them it does not appear when the debts accrued; and Ex parte Freston (30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 460; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. Rep. 133; 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 89), because there the original execution creditor had proved under the bankruptcy; and it is therefore not necessary to make any remark on them. The only cases it is necessary to refer to are Darby v. Baugham (5 Term Rep. 209) and Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424). As to Darby v. Baugham (5 Term Rep. 209), that is an authoritative decision of Lord Kenyon; and it is relied on as supporting the proposition that the analogous section (section 5.) of the statute 5 Geo. 2. c. 30. (which protected the bankrupt from a liability to arrest for debt up to the finishing of his examination) applied, whether the debt of the arresting creditor accrued before or after the bankruptcy. It is necessary to look to the circumstances of that case, and to compare it with Grace v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424). The circumstances of the former case were peculiar. It seems that the execution creditor was an accommodation acceptor; and, as I infer from the report of the case, the bill was drawn before, but became due and was paid after the bankruptcy. The case was peculiar, because it was a case where the original liability was incurred by the bankrupt before his bankruptcy, and where, although the payment was made by the execution creditor, who stood in the position of surety for the bankrupt, after the bankruptcy, proof of such payment could be given under the bankruptcy. It is true that when Lord Kenyon decided the case there was no statutory provision in force—as I supposed during the argument, and Mr. Baron Platt seems to have supposed in Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424)—similar to the 49 Geo. 3. c. 12. s. 8; but in turning to 2 Christian's Bankrupt Laws, 2nd edit. 354, which is the touchstone in these matters, whilst I find that this statute was the first statute containing a provision which allowed sureties who paid after the examination to prove under it, I also find a series of authorities (the first decided in 1791, which was two years, and the second in 1792, one year before Lord Kenyon's decision) which decided that the Lord Chancellor in Bankruptcy would give relief to the surety by making the creditor prove as trustee for him. Mr. Christian doubts the soundness of this; but it is clear that in Bankruptcy the difficulty as to proof by a surety paying after bankruptcy, was got over. This being so, the case of Darby v. Baugham (5 Term Rep. 209) does not seem so much opposed to Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424) as would at first appear. Now, unless Darby v. Baugham (5 Term Rep. 209) is to be explained in the way I have pointed out, Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424) is a decision on the very point decided by it, because, although there is a difference between the two statutes, 5 Geo. 2. c. 30, and the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, yet that difference does not touch the point which we are at present discussing; for the only difference between the two statutes is, that the latter extends the time during which protection can be afforded to the bankrupt, but the latter statute does not either enlarge or restrict the class against whom the bankrupt is to be protected. And the present case can only be distinguished from Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424), which was decided on section 112. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, on the ground that there the protection was claimed after the bankrupt had passed his last examination. But the language of the statute as respects the persons to be bound is the same, and we cannot give the word "creditor" two meanings according as the arrest is before or after the last examination; the case of Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424) is, therefore, in point. And on the question of authority the matter stands thus: that if Darby v. Baugham (5 Term Rep. 209) be not explainable in the way I have pointed out, then we have a case decided in the year 1793 one way, and another case decided in 1855, after full discussion, the other way. And we must adopt the latter, and act on it if it be irreconcilable with the former.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. No question arises here as to the defendant's right at common law to be discharged from custody, for he was not going to, attending, or returning from the Commissioners, or engaged in any business relating to the bankruptcy. He was in his lodgings, and was there arrested. The question must depend on the proper construction to be put on the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. I think on the question of construction we are bound by the case of Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424), which does not seem distinguishable, and in which the Court, after taking time to consider, discharged the rule. Mr. Nasmyth, who has argued ably for the defendant, confessed he had no authority in his favour on the construction of the statute, and the only decision he has relied on is one of Lord Kenyon's, in the case of Darby v. Baugham (5 Term Rep. 209). I think that case is to be supported on the reasons given by my Brother Willes, and that the decision turned on the fact that in a sense the plaintiff there was a creditor for a debt which accrued before the bankruptcy, and this conclusion is fortified by the case of Grave v. Bishop (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58; s. c. reported as Grace v. Bishop, 11 Exch. Rep. 424), in the Court of Exchequer. The proper construction of the statute seems that put on it by my Brother Willes. The word "creditor" is used in various places throughout this statute, which is one which gives a certain jurisdiction over previous creditors and a bankrupt. Is there any reason why we should read this word in section 112. in a more extended way than in other parts of the statute? I can see no reason. Mr. Nasmyth endeavoured to draw a distinction between an arrest previous and one subsequent to the last examination. But he must admit that the right of the Commissioners to grant protection is extended beyond the examination; and, therefore, all his reasoning as to the legislature meaning to protect the bankrupt in the way he contends during the proceedings preparatory to such examination fails. The legislature meant to give protection after the examination, and therefore extended it to such time after as the Commissioner shall allow. And why should he have a right to deal with subsequent creditors? In granting the bankrupt protection against previous creditors he would be governed by the statements of the creditors over whom he had jurisdiction, and the bankrupt whose estate he was administering. But with respect to subsequent creditors he has no power or means of inquiring, and great mischief would arise if he were to grant protection as against subsequent creditors without knowing the circumstances. I therefore think that the protection given by section 112. is confined to those who are creditors of the bankrupt at the time of the fiat, and who might come in under the bankruptcy. The authorities do not conflict with this view. The case of Ex parte Freston (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 460; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. Rep. 133; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 89) has no application to the present case, as there the execution creditor had proved, and I think that there was no privilege of arrest here, and therefore that this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

CRAFTER v. THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. C.P. 182; L. R. 1 C.P. 300; 14 W. R. 334; 12 Jur. N.S. 272.

Approved, Rigg v. Manchester, Sheffield & Lincolnshire Railway, 1866, 14 W. R. 834; 12 Jur. N.S. 525 (C.P.). Referred to, Great Western Railway v. Davis, 1878, 39 L. T. 475 (Ex. D.).

Railway—Negligence—Staircase.

CARRIERS.—The defendants had a staircase at one of their stations for the use of passengers; it led from the arrival platform to the street, was about six feet wide, had walls on each side, and had wooden steps nosed with brass, which had become smooth from use. The plaintiff, who together with large numbers of others had used these stairs without accident for months, slipped and hurt himself; and in an action for negligence against the defendants, he relied on the evidence of a builder who said that he thought brass dangerous, that lead would be proper and less slippery, and that there should be a hand-rail:—Held, there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendants were possessed of a staircase leading to a station of their railway, on which the public using the railway were invited to walk, and that it was their duty so to keep it that the public using the railway on their invitation might safely pass up and down the staircase; and that they neglected their duty, and so negligently kept the staircase that it was dangerous to persons passing along and so using the railway; and that the plaintiff, who was passing down the staircase for the purpose of using the railway by their invitation, fell and was thrown down the staircase and received certain specified injuries. The second count stated that the defendants were carrying passengers for hire on their railway and used a certain station for the reception and accommodation of the passengers; that the station was in their possession and under their management, and that they negligently managed the station, and kept the station staircase and approaches in a dangerous and slippery state, and did not provide hand-rails or sufficient accommodation for safe access to the carriages, and that the plaintiff having been received by them as a passenger, fell and was thrown down the staircase, and received certain specified injuries.

The defendants pleaded not guilty.

At the trial, it appeared that the staircase was about six feet wide, with a wall on each side, and that its steps were of wood, with brass nosings about 2½ inches wide, which were said to have become additionally slippery by wear. The staircase led from the arrival platform of one of the stations to the street, and the plaintiff in ascending slipped on the brass nosing of one of the steps, fell and was injured. This staircase had been used by the plaintiff every day for some months (ever since the opening of the railway) without complaint or injury, and between 40,000 and 50,000 passengers per month had also without accident passed up the staircase. The plaintiff relied on the evidence of a builder, who was called to state that brass nosings were improper on such a staircase, that lead would be the proper material, as being less slippery, and that there should be hand-rails.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

A rule having been obtained pursuant to such leave, and also for a new trial, Huddleston and H. James shewed cause.—There was evidence here of negligence. It was proved at the trial that brass was an improper and unsafe material for nosing such steps as these, and the decision of this matter was especially within the province of the jury. This case cannot be distinguished from Longmore v. the Great Western Railway Company,¹ where it was held that the question of the proper construction of a bridge could not be withdrawn from the jury, although the bridge had been used for years by thousands of persons without accident, and the way in which the injured person slipped through a space in the railing was the most unforeseen accident that could well be imagined.

Hawkins and Horace Lloyd, in support of the rule.—There was no evidence to go to the jury. There was no pretence for saying the staircase was out of order, and the only evidence relied on by the plaintiff was the expression of opinion, by a builder in a small way of business, that it would have been safer to have nosed with lead and erected a hand-rail; and this although thousands of persons and the plaintiff himself had used it for months without accident. This case falls within *Tooney v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company*² and Cornman v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 94; s. c. 4 Hurl. & N. 781). In the former case the plaintiff, having been directed by a stranger, went to the lamp-room instead of the urinal, and fell down some steps, and it was held that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury, Willes, J. saying, "It ought to have been shewn the steps were more than ordinarily dangerous. . . . It is impossible for any one so to dispose his property that a man may not, by accident or negligence, injure himself upon it." In the latter case there was the same ruling respecting an accidental fall over a weighing machine on a railway platform; all the Judges laying stress on the fact that the machine had been there for five years, could be plainly seen, and might be fairly considered to be safely situated, and that a mere scintilla of evidence would not do, but there must be reasonable evidence from which a jury might infer negligence. To use the expression of Martin, B., "If this accident had occurred in a timber-yard no jury would have found negligence against the owner of it; but many persons think that if an accident happens within the gates of the premises of a railway company, there should always be a verdict against them."

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute, because I think there was no evidence to go to the jury of actionable negligence, and I draw a distinction between the present case and those referred to in argument both from the nature of the structure and the ground of complaint as to that which was not supplied, namely, the hand-rail. With regard to the nature of the structure, these were common wooden stairs, some 6 or 8 feet wide, with the ordinary rise to go up, and some $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches of a strip of brass, or what they call a nosing to the steps. In my judgment, according to common experience, this was an ordinary structure; there was nothing of a peculiar nature about it, nothing like a trap-door, or a way of falling through the railing. There was a wall on both sides, and the passenger had only to lift his foot from step to step. The brass, having become smooth, was said to be slippery at times, and there was evidence that lead would be less slippery than brass. In my opinion, the persons who admit passengers to walk up such stairs as these, whether of wood or of wood with brass upon it, are not liable to an action because certain witnesses come and say they think that lead would have been safer. With regard to the question of the hand-rail, I am of opinion that from the nature of the structure the passengers going up this staircase had no right to claim that there should be a hand-rail, which, in truth, could only be used by those passengers who went up nearest to the wall, as of necessity several would go up abreast, and only one could use the hand-rail. It was not a thing that ordinary people would demand, and there is no law that requires of a railway company to gratify such a demand. This was an ordinary structure, and in an ordinary state and condition; there was nothing at all of a peculiar nature about it, and those using it could see what it was that had to be guarded against. Perhaps there may be a distinction where a man has to descend from a height with an open balustrade and there is a possibility of falling down from a considerable height; but this was an ordinary staircase. I am further of opinion that even if there be a scintilla of evidence that there was a cause of complaint, still the plaintiff had perfect notice and knowledge of the nature of the structure; he had full knowledge of the place, was using it with full knowledge of what it was, and he has no reason to complain. The plaintiff had used this staircase every day from the time of the opening of the line of railway, a period of some eighteen months; and we are told that some 40,000 passengers a month have used the staircase ever since it was opened. I think he has no right to maintain an action because he would have found more convenience if there had been a hand-rail, and less slipperiness if there had been lead instead of brass in the front of the steps.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was incumbent on the plaintiff to give reasonable evidence, evidence from which the jury should come to the conclusion that the defendants had supplied an improper structure. The question comes to this, whether it was improper for the reasons which have been stated to face these steps with brass. The only evidence that was given was the evidence of a builder, who said, in effect, that lead was better than brass, and that in his opinion brass was dangerous. There is hardly any structure that one meets with in one's passage through life as to which you may not be able to call some one who will say it is dangerous. We must read the evidence by the light of that common experience which everybody has. We must take into account that the plaintiff must be considered to have known that which everyone knows, that brass is used for nosing such stairs as these, because he had used these stairs over and over again without objection. He does not deny that he knew brass was used. Taking all the circumstances together, this is nothing more than an attempt to make persons use a particular sort of material in constructing their stairs at the place where they carry on their business, instead of the material which they have used, and which they use in common with a great number of mankind in hotels, and steamboats, and other places where everyone has seen brass used. I think, therefore, there was no evidence that could properly have been left to the jury. I think this case is to be amply distinguished from the case of Longmore v. the Great Western Railway Company.¹ The charge there consisted of there being an apparent rail for the protection of persons who might slip on a wooden bridge, whereas, in fact, the rail, instead of being any protection, offered none at all, and there was a hole through which the husband of the plaintiff fell and received the injury as to which damages were sought to be recovered. In that case there was a trap, whilst here the usual mode of constructing stairs had been adopted. I think the rule ought to be made absolute to enter a nonsuit; but for the purpose of meeting any future steps which may be taken, the remainder of the rule with respect to a new trial must stand over and be reserved.

KEATING, J.—I have felt some difficulty, I confess, in this case in distinguishing it from the case of Longmore v. the Great Western Railway Company,¹ I cannot say that that difficulty is wholly removed; but these cases present questions of mere degree, and as my Lord and my two learned Brothers are of opinion that there is a distinction between the two cases, I therefore am not disposed to dissent from the judgment of the Court.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of opinion that a nonsuit should be entered in this case. I think that a line must be drawn between suggestions of possible precautions that may be taken and evidence of negligence which is reasonable and proper to go to the jury. It may be very difficult to know where to place that line; but I think in this case that the facts lie on the side of mere suggestion of possible precautions, or possible alterations, which might have been made, and which would have rendered the staircase more absolutely safe, and that there was no evidence at all of anything which amounted to negligence to go to the jury. There was nothing unusual in the staircase, and as the staircase, such as it was, with the brass nosing and want of a hand-rail, was obvious to everyone, and must have been perfectly well known to the plaintiff, it seems to me, therefore, that the evidence of negligence failed, and that the plaintiff in using this structure, such as it was, cannot complain of this accident, which was not of an unusual or peculiar kind, but an accident of a description which happens on all staircases, however they may be constructed, that is, that a man slips upon them. I think the case of *Longmore v. the Great Western Railway Company*¹ may be distinguished from the present. In that case there was an aperture in the rails of the staircase, which was undoubtedly dangerous; a hole, so that a man might fall through. It was not obvious to anyone using it, that by slipping on the staircase he might fall through; and the consequences of falling through an aperture of that sort would, of course, be very serious, as they were in that case. With regard to the expression one of the witnesses used, that the stairs were dangerous by reason of the brass nosing, that is really merely an expression of opinion, and it is not strictly admissible for a witness to give evidence as to his opinion, although, no doubt, it is an expression very commonly used by witnesses. Although we are not here to assume that which is the undoubted province of the jury, yet the Court are bound to see in every case that there was sufficient and proper evidence to go to the jury, and to ask their opinion upon. In this case, I think, there was not such proper evidence, and therefore that the verdict must be entered as is sought for by the rule.

Rule absolute to enter a nonsuit.

LONGMORE v. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

See Crafter v. Metropolitan Railway, [1866] E. R. A. 1541; 35 L. J. C.P. 132; L. R. 1 C.P. 300; 14 W. R. 334 (C.P.). Referred to, Lay v. Midland Railway Co., 34 L. T. 30 (Ex. D.).

CARRIERS.—This was an action, brought by the plaintiff as administratrix, to recover compensation for the death of her husband, who was killed by falling from a bridge belonging to the defendants.

The bridge in question was a wooden one, constructed over the defendants' railway for the use of passengers in crossing the line from one platform to the other. The bridge may be thus described, with the help of a diagram.

The top consisted of a level boarding reaching across the line at a considerable height above it. A person standing on the top of the bridge and desiring to descend on either side would first have to descend a flight of six or eight steps, B C, in line with the top of the bridge; he would then find himself on a square landing, and would then have to turn at right angles and descend a long flight of steps to the platform. The railing of the bridge was on the cross-girder principle, except where the short flights of steps were, and there only one girder was placed, as A C; A B was about 4 feet, and A C between 7 or 8 feet long. The only other way of crossing from one platform to the other was either by crossing the metalled way, or by going out of the station some little distance to a public bridge over the line, crossing this bridge and coming back on the other side of the line and entering the opposite side of the station. This bridge had been used by thousands of persons, and the deceased frequently, without any accident. One night, however, the deceased unfortunately slipped in descending one of the short flights of steps, fell through the aperture A B C, and was killed.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, on the ground that the bridge was not a safe or proper one.

A rule was granted, pursuant to leave reserved to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence; or for a new trial because the Judge (Keating, J.) did not rule that as there was another bridge, the deceased used the wooden one at his own risk.

Huddleston and Macnamara shewed cause.

W. H. Cooke and H. James appeared in support of the rule.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. It was a question peculiarly for the jury whether reasonable care and skill had been used in the construction of this bridge for the use of passengers. I am of opinion that there was evidence to go to the jury, and that the Judge would not have been justified in taking the matter out of the hands of the jury, in whose province it was.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defect was not obvious, and the danger not apparent; it was the nearest way, and the deceased was invited to use it, and it was a question for the jury whether it was an improper structure.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The jury might have found no negligence, and I do not say that I should have found the same way as they have done; it was, however, a question for them.

Trover—Stoppage in Transitu.

SALE OF GOODS.—A. sold to B. goods which were lying at X, one of the defendants' railway stations; a portion were by B.'s order sent to Y, another of the defendants' stations, were there taken by him and were paid for; B. refused to take any more, but A. sent the remainder to Y. to be delivered to him; B. refused to take them and they were sent back to X; A. also refused to take them, and they were again sent to Y, where they remained till B. became bankrupt; A. then directed the defendants to keep them for him, and they did so. In an action of trover by the assignee of B. against the defendants,—Held, that A. had a right of stoppage in transitu, and that the defendants were therefore justified in detaining the goods for him.

This was an action to recover damages for the conversion, by the defendants, of the goods of the plaintiff, the assignee of the estate and effects of Thomas Parsons, a bankrupt. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and that the goods were not the plaintiff's.

The cause came on for trial, before Shee, J., at the last Spring Assizes, held at Liverpool, for the southern division of the county of Lancaster, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, for 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* damages, and 40*s.* costs of suit, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

On the 12th of July, 1864, the said Thomas Parsons bought from Joseph Wolstencroft eleven skips of 32 cop twist, at 2*s.* 9½*d.* per lb. The goods were then lying at the defendants' railway station in Salford, and it was agreed that they should be delivered by Wolstencroft to Parsons in such parcels and at such times as the latter should request. On the 19th of July Wolstencroft sent an invoice to Parsons of the whole of the goods, with the numbers and weights of each skip. On the 22nd of July part of the goods, viz. three skips, were delivered by Wolstencroft at the Brierfield railway station, on the defendants' line of railway, to the order and at the request of Parsons. For some reason which did not appear, Parsons, on the 2nd of August, returned the above invoice to Wolstencroft, and, on the 4th of August, he wrote to Wolstencroft the following letter:

"We decline taking any more of the 32 twist, whatever the consequence may be. It is so bad we cannot get out winders and warpers to work it. If you have sent the four skips off, we shall return them."

On the same day, Wolstencroft wrote to the defendants the following letter:

"Order to Messrs. the L. & Y. Railway Company, Salford station, by Joseph Wolstencroft.—Gentlemen, Please send to Thomas Parsons, Brierfield station, four skips out of the eleven lots marked, &c. Please send them off to-day and oblige," &c.

On the 16th of August Parsons paid Wolstencroft 95*l.* for the three skips delivered on the 22nd of July, and took from him a receipt. It is admitted that, as to the three skips, there was no objection made by Parsons, except as to the weight, and this was allowed for in the 95*l.* It is also admitted that, at the time the three skips were ordered to be delivered to Parsons, the whole eleven skips were lying at the defendants' railway station in Salford. On the 17th of August Wolstencroft sent to Parsons an invoice of the remaining eight skips, which particularized them, and contained the following statement: "Four skips of these skips have been sent to Brierfield station according to your wish; the other four are lying at Salford station, waiting your instructions; whatever is wrong in the weights shall be made right." And on the same day that Parsons received the above he returned it to Wolstencroft, with the following letter:

"We wrote you on August 4, by train, we should not take any more of the twist. Therefore, we shall not have any more of it, as we cannot get it worked. We return you the invoice." Parsons allowed the four skips therein mentioned to remain at Brierfield station, and instructed his carter not to remove them. On the 27th of August Parsons received a letter from Wolstencroft's attorney, demanding payment of 301*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* and threatening an action. On the 1st of September Wolstencroft delivered the following order to the defendants: "Order to Messrs. the L. & Y. Railway Co., Salford station, by J. Wolstencroft. Gentlemen,—Please deliver to Mr. Thomas Parsons, Brierfield station, the remaining four skips, lying in 20 Arch . . . to-day. Yours, &c." On the 2nd of September Parsons's carter, without his knowledge, took away from the Brierfield railway station the four skips last sent by Wolstencroft, but these were at once returned by Parsons. On the same day he consigned the whole eight skips from the Brierfield station to Wolstencroft, and got from the station-master a memorandum of receipt of the goods. On the same day the whole eight skips were sent by the defendants from the Brierfield station to Salford, to the order of Wolstencroft; but he refused to receive them, and they were sent back to Brierfield, and on the 6th of September the defendants sent a letter to their station-master at Brierfield, telling him of the refusal and directing inquiry to be made of the sender, and on the 7th of September sent the following letter to Parsons:

"You consigned eight skips to J. Wolstencroft, Manchester, on the 2nd instant; he refuses to take them, stating they are returned goods. Please say how they must be disposed of." And on the same day Parsons wrote to the defendants in answer to the above:

"The eight skips you write about; we cannot give you any information about them; the skips are not ours; we shall have nothing to do with them; they belong to J. Wolstencroft." The eight skips were sent back to the Salford station the same night. Nothing further took place between any of the parties in relation to the eight skips until the 30th of September, on which day particulars of demand for 319*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*, and a notice requiring payment under the Bankruptcy Act, was served on Parsons by Wolstencroft. It is admitted that 301*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* only was due on the remaining eight skips.

On the 3rd of October, a trader debtor summons for 319*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* was served on Parsons, which was made returnable on the 12th of October. On the 4th of October Wolstencroft's attorney wrote to the defendants the following letter:

"Be good enough to retain possession of the under-mentioned skips on behalf of Mr. Joseph Wolstencroft until further instructed. Eight skips marked," &c. The eight skips mentioned in this letter were the skips now in question. It is admitted that Parsons filed an affidavit of his having a good defence on the merits, and on the return of the trader-debtor summons, viz., on the 12th of October, 1864, appeared before the Bankruptcy Court and resisted the application on the said ground, and stated he would stop payment if the summons was proceeded with, and thereupon an order was made for him to give security for the debt and costs of any action which might be brought. On the 19th of October Parsons petitioned the Bankruptcy Court, and on the same day was duly adjudicated a bankrupt. On the same day Wolstencroft wrote to the defendants the following letter:

"The eight skips lying in the cellar at your station, please let them continue there to my order." On the 21st of October the officer of the Court of Bankruptcy demanded the goods from the defendants, and gave them notice not to part with them, as they were claimed by the assignee under Parsons's bankruptcy, and the defendants' clerk thereupon shewed to the said officer an entry in the defendants' books stating that the same goods were claimed by Wolstencroft. On the 21st of October Wolstencroft sent to the defendants an order for the delivery of the goods to him. On the 29th of October the goods were delivered by the defendants to Wolstencroft. The first meeting of Parsons's creditors in bankruptcy for proof debts, was held on the 1st of November, 1864, when Wolstencroft's attorney tendered a proof for 319*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*, which, being objected to on account of the discrepancy in the amount claimed by the letter of the 26th of August, 1864, and that claimed by the proof, it stood over till the next meeting, and has never since been presented, nor has Wolstencroft proved his debt. On the 5th of December the attorneys for the plaintiff wrote to the defendants a letter demanding compensation for the eight skips. The defendants' attorneys replied that they were instructed to defend any proceedings which might be commenced.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and if the Court is of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, then the verdict which has been entered for the plaintiff is to stand; but if the Court be of a contrary opinion, the verdict which has been entered for the plaintiff is to be vacated, and instead thereof a verdict entered for the defendants.

Holker (C. Crompton with him), for the plaintiff.—In the first place, the sale was a sale of specific goods, and the property in them passed to Parsons the bankrupt by the sale. The next and main point is, whether the vendor had a right to stop them on the ground of the transitus not being at an end. It is submitted that he had not, as the transitus had previously come to an end. They had been delivered at the railway station indicated by the purchaser, and their journey had ended notwithstanding the purchaser might have refused to keep them. This is not a case merely of constructive possession in the buyer, but a case in which the transit was actually at an end, and the vendor's right to stop the goods was therefore gone, according to Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 681, 5th ed). The case of Cusack v. Robinson (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 261) is an authority in favour of the plaintiff. There the goods having been delivered at Fenning's wharf, according to the directions of the purchaser, by carriers whom he named, it was held that they were so under the purchaser's control as to put an end to any right of stoppage by an unpaid vendor, and that there was an actual receipt by the purchaser within the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, although the purchaser had telegraphed to the vendor that he should send them back as not according to sample, and they were re-delivered by Fenning to the carriers under the purchaser's order. The cases of Wentworth v. Outhwaite (10 Mee. & W. 436; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 172) and Smith v. Hudson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 145) also shew that the goods being here in the custody of the defendants as warehousemen, and not as carriers, the unpaid vendors had no right to stop them.

Thirdly, it will be contended on the other side, that the vendor had assented to the purchaser's request, and had agreed to take the goods back, and that therefore, with their mutual consent, the contract of sale had been rescinded. It is clear from the evidence that this was not so, and that the vendor never intended to give up his rights as vendor or to put an end to the contract, but only to hold the goods until he had been paid for them.

Brett (J. A. Russell with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiff, who is assignee, cannot be in a better position than Parsons the bankrupt. The first question is, whether the property passed at all, and it would seem that this was not a sale of specific goods, and that any goods might have been delivered by the vendor. But, secondly, if the property did pass, yet, not only had the vendor the right to stop the goods in transitu, but the vendee agreed that he might stop them.

Holker, in reply.—It is impossible to say that the transitus continued during the month the goods were at the station; the railway company must therefore have been warehousemen, and they must be considered the warehousemen of the vendee, as the station was the place of receipt designed by him—Smith v. Hudson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 145), Wentworth v. Outhwaite (10 Mee. & W. 436; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 172) and Dodson v. Wentworth (5 Scott, N.R. 832).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants. The action is brought by the assignee of a bankrupt named Parsons, who claims the property in certain skips of twist. As far as the contract is concerned, Parsons before his bankruptcy was entitled to the property in them, but when he became bankrupt they were not in his possession, but in that of the defendants the railway company. The point to be decided is, whether the vendor was entitled to claim as unpaid vendor the right of stoppage in transitu. I assume that it is probable that the goods were to be delivered to Parsons at the Brierfield station; three skips arrived there, and were taken by his consent to his warehouse, and no question arises as to these. The others afterwards arrived at Brierfield, but had not ceased to be in transitu; before they arrived notice had been given by the vendee that he intended to dispute his liability to take them, and after they arrived orders were given to the defendants to take them back. The vendor refused to receive them, and, being refused both by vendor and vendee, they remained in the defendants' the railway company's hands. I am of opinion that they never ceased to be in transitu. James v. Griffin (2 Mee. & W. 623; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 241) shews that the intention of the vendee is material. Again, in Whitehead v. Anderson (9 Ibid. 529; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 157), Parke, B. says, "The question is quo animo the act is done. My notion has always been that the question is, whether the consignee has taken possession, not whether the captain has intended to deliver it." Now it is clear that in this case, when the goods were at Brierfield, the vendee never intended to take possession. Some of the goods, it is true, were taken to his premises; but that was clearly contrary to his intention, and by a mistake of his carter, and therefore it is just the same as if they had been taken by a wrongdoer. He never intended to take possession of them. Mr. Holker relied on the ground that the railway company were warehousemen for the real owners. Carriers, no doubt, may become warehousemen for the consignee, and in many cases do; but there must be a change from their position as carriers to the position of warehousemen, and the parties concerned must make this change; but there was no contract here to make the railway company warehousemen, and therefore, under the circumstances, I am of opinion that there should be judgment for the defendants.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. One fact is peculiarly in favour of the defendants. All the skips were at one time warehoused with them for the seller, a fact which distinguishes this case from Cusack v. Robinson (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 261). The persons with whom the goods were warehoused for the seller were also the persons who were to transfer them to the buyer. We have, therefore, first to consider the question of whether this agency for the seller had ceased, and if it had ceased, how it did cease. It is said that it ceased by the seller saying to the railway company, "Hold no longer for me; I put an end to your holding for me, and you must hold for the buyer"; and that therefore the railway company must be considered to hold for the buyer. But what is the just construction of what took place? If the goods were of a kind that the seller could think fit to get rid of altogether, and of which he could think fit to lose the security, it might possibly be considered that he meant, "I will abandon the goods, and will not have them, even if the buyer will not take them." But inasmuch as they were valuable goods, and it would seem the last thing he could intend that he should throw them away, I think such a direction must be considered to mean, "I insist that the buyer shall take, but if he absolutely will not, do not throw them away, but continue to hold for me as before." It is especially a question for a jury whether this was not the true intention of the seller. No doubt the property passed; indeed, a difficulty could never arise unless it did. The effect of that is, that the buyer is at the risk of the goods, and the expense of insurance would fall on him; but it does not follow that, in such a case as this, the possession is to be delivered unless the price be paid; and the lien attaches as long as the goods are in the hands of an agent for the seller. But if the carrier be the agent for the buyer, the bare lien is gone by a delivery to him, even if there were a sale for cash. But a right to stop in transitu upon bankruptcy, even where credit has not expired, remains till the goods are delivered to the buyer or his agent for custody, or for sending the goods upon a new journey or destination, or for a purpose other than carriage upon the original transit. Until one or the other happens the seller has a right of stoppage in transitu; the right exists unless it be lost by acceptance of the goods by the purchaser or his agent for custody or a new purpose other than that of carriage. But it is besides to be observed, that the arrival, in order to do away with the right of stoppage in transitu, must be such a one that the buyer has actual or constructive possession, and this cannot be whilst the buyer repudiates the goods. These are the elements of the law of stoppage in transitu. Apply these doctrines to the facts of the present case, and it is clear the transitus was not at an end. There is also a by-point, viz., the part delivery of the goods. Different opinions have been held on the question of whether a part delivery is a constructive delivery of the entire goods comprised in the contract, so as to put an end to the right to stop in transitu as to the whole of the goods. At one time it was held that there was a constructive delivery of the whole. This, however, has since been questioned and dissented from; and it has been said only to be a constructive delivery of the whole if the vendor gives and the vendee takes possession of part, meaning thereby respectively to give and take possession of the whole. I think this is a plain case when the facts are understood.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons already given.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is one of fact. It is not disputed that if the goods were in the possession of the defendants as carriers the right of stoppage existed. The only question is, whether, on the facts, though in one sense at an end, the transitus was completely ended. The point strongly urged was, that the railway company were warehousemen for Parsons; but they could not be so without his consent, and it is clear that he never intended to take, and would have resisted to the end but for his bankruptcy.

Judgment for the defendants.

Lease—Action for Breach of Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment—Interesse Termini—Measure of Damages.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—The plaintiff being in occupation of premises under a lease from J. F., which would expire on the 4th of December, 1864, obtained from J. F. a reversionary lease for twenty-one years and twenty-one days, to commence from the said 4th of December, 1864, on payment of a premium. In November, 1863, J. F. died. It then turned out that he had no power to grant this reversionary lease, and thereupon F. V., who was entitled to the premises on the death of J. F., refused to ratify it, and the plaintiff was obliged to accept a lease from F. V., to commence on the 25th of December, 1864, for seven years only, at a greater rent. The plaintiff brought an action against the executor of J. F. on a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in the void lease:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified for what he had lost by the breach of covenant, and that under the circumstances the difference between the value of the two leases might be used as a test of the amount of the damages he was entitled to.

This was an appeal by the defendant against the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas discharging the greater part of a rule of that Court, obtained by the defendant.

The facts will be found fully stated in the report of the case below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 201), and the following statement will be found sufficient for the present report.—

The action was brought against the defendant, as the executor of John Furze, for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment, in a lease dated the 14th of February, 1860, whereby John Furze, in consideration of 400*l.*, demised to the plaintiff certain premises from the 4th of December, 1864 (when a then existing lease to the plaintiff would expire) for twenty-one years, at a rent of 175*l.*

The first count of the declaration was founded on this covenant, and alleged that Frances Vickers, who claimed through John Furze, had threatened to evict the plaintiff, who had been obliged to accept from her a lease for only seven years, at a rent of 300*l.*, had been put to expense, and lost the 400*l.* There was a second count for money had and received.

The defendant pleaded to the first count, secondly, that the plaintiff had never entered into possession of the premises under the lease; fourthly, that Frances Vickers did not demand them from the plaintiff or oust him; and to the second count payment into court of 417*l.*, and never indebted to the residue.

On these pleas issue was joined, and there was a demurrer to the second plea. At the trial, the first count of the declaration was substantially proved, and also the second plea. The money paid into court was the 400*l.* premium and 17*l.* for the expenses of the void lease; the plaintiff, however, claimed between 1,500*l.* and 1,600*l.* for damages for the difference in value between the two leases, and 65*l.*, the expense of the new lease.

The learned Judge, in summing up, told the jury, in substance, that the covenant having been broken, the plaintiff under the circumstances was entitled to be indemnified for what he had lost under that breach of covenant, and to recover the difference in value between the old and new leases.

The jury found a verdict on the first count for the plaintiff for 1,522*l.* (which included the 65*l.*) and for the defendant on the second; and leave was reserved to the defendant to move to set aside the verdict on the second and fourth pleas, and to reduce the verdict by 65*l.*

A rule was (in the terms set forth in the report below) afterwards obtained pursuant to such leave, and also for a new trial on the ground of misdirection; and it was agreed that the demurrer should be argued with the rule. The Court of Common Pleas decided the demurrer in favour of the plaintiff, and made the rule absolute to enter a verdict for the defendant on the second plea and to reduce the damages by 25*l.*, but discharged the residue of the rule, with leave to the defendant to appeal on the main point as to the principle of damages; and the question submitted to the Court of Appeal was, whether the damages should be reduced, and if so, whether to nominal damages or 25*l.*

Garth, for the appellant (the defendant below).—The question is, how the damages are to be assessed; and it is contended that as this was the sale of an interesse termini, and the plaintiff was never in possession under the deed of conveyance, the same rule applies as that which holds good where a sale of lands goes off; and that, therefore, only the money paid (viz. 400*l.*) and the expenses are recoverable. There is no direct authority to be found in the English books, but there is a large number of American authorities on this point. The state of the law on this question is elaborately discussed in 4 Kent's Commentaries, 10th edit., part 6, lec. 67, and the author says, "The ultimate extent of the vendor's responsibility, under all or any of the usual covenants in his deed, is the purchase-money, with interest; and this I presume to be the prevalent rule throughout the United States."

[BLACKBURN, J.—But in the note, after stating that it had been held in Massachusetts that the true measure of damages was the consideration-money and interest, he says that this was formerly the rule also in South Carolina, but that now the rule is there settled according to the English common law doctrine. So that he evidently considers that the English law is contrary to the prevalent doctrine in America.]

In Staats v. Ten Eyck's Executors (3 Caines, 111) Kent, C.J., said, "Upon the sale of lands the purchaser usually examines the title for himself, and in case of good faith between the parties (and of such cases only I now speak) the seller discloses his proof and knowledge of the title. The want of title is therefore usually a case of mutual error, and it would be ruinous and oppressive to make the seller refund for any accidental or extraordinary rise in the value of the land. Still more burdensome would the rule seem to be, if that rise was owing to the taste, fortune or luxury of the purchaser. No man could venture to sell an acre of ground to a wealthy purchaser without the hazard of absolute ruin." And in Mayne on Damages, pp. 98, 99, we find that the author, after citing these words of Chief Justice Kent, goes on to say, "I conceive that the doctrine laid down by Chief Justice Kent is clearly the equitable rule, where the improvements arise from causes of an entirely collateral nature, such as the growth of a town, the formation of a railway, or the like." The reason is, that such events are not in the contemplation of the parties.

[MARTIN, B.—The case of Robinson v. Harman (1 Exch. Rep. 855; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 202) is against you.]

There fraud existed, which makes all the difference.

[BLACKBURN, J.—You must shew that you are within the exception laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078). CHANNELL, B.—The distinction pointed out in Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit., p. 236, seems not to have been sufficiently attended to; there it is said, "Where the purchaser has paid any part of the purchase-money, and the seller does not complete his engagement, so that the contract is totally unexecuted, the purchaser may affirm the agreement by bringing an action for the non-performance of it, or he may disaffirm it and bring an action for money had and received to his use. In this latter action the plaintiff cannot recover more than the money paid, although the estate has risen in value, while it would seem that if the estate has experienced a diminution in value, he can only recover the damages he sustained by the estate not having been conveyed, that being the only money retained by the defendant against conscience. But where, for example, the purchasers have had possession of the property, so that the parties cannot be placed in statu quo, the count for money had and received cannot be maintained."]

In Sedgwick on Damages (2nd edit), chap. 6, the matter is fully discussed. As to the English law, the author points out that there is hardly any learning on the subject, and that in Pomeroy v. Partington (3 Term Rep. 678, note), though the Court did not actually decide the point, they intimated that only the money paid, interest and expenses could be recovered; and as to the American law, he agrees with the account given in Kent's Commentaries, and shews that the prevalent American rule arose from the analogy to the ancient real warranty, and the assumed impropriety of applying different rules to covenants for quiet enjoyment and seisin.

[MARTIN, B.—As late as the year 1826, in Hopkins v. Glazebrook (6 B. & C. 31), Lord Tenterden said, "I will only say, that if it is advanced as a general proposition that where a vendor cannot make a good title, the purchaser shall recover nothing more than nominal damages, I am by no means prepared to assent to it."]

There is only one English case, viz. Williams v. Burrell (1 Com. B. Rep. 402; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 98), which comes at all near the present, and that is distinguishable, because there the lessee had entered and enjoyed the premises under the lease, whereas here there was only an interesse termini.

Mellish (Archibald with him), for the respondent (the plaintiff below).—A covenant for title is broken the moment the deed is sealed if the vendor really has no title; but a covenant for quiet enjoyment is not broken till the vendee is disturbed; and it would be odd if the damages recoverable were not the loss at the time of disturbance. With respect to the amount in the present case, the difference between the value of the two leases was the proper thing to give. The vendee did the best he could do for himself and all parties in getting the second lease, and it is fair to take the difference as a test of the damages. The true principle was laid down to the jury; and this difference was only used as a fair method of arriving at the amount under the circumstances.

MARTIN, B.—I have a strong opinion that the Court of Common Pleas were right, and so has the Lord Chief Baron, who has left the court. The matter is, in my judgment, clear. The correct rule is laid down, by Parke, B., in Robinson v. Harman (1 Exch. Rep. 855; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 202): "The rule of the common law is, that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed." The deceased, by this contract, bound himself for the existence of a certain state of things; and if this be altered, why should he not pay the difference? It is said that the case of Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078) qualified the rule of the common law; but Parke, B., in Robinson v. Harman (1 Exch. Rep. 855; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 202) treats it as an exception. The case of Sikes v. Wild (4 Best & S. 421; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 375) upholds Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078), although Lord Tenterden, then Chief Justice Abbott, said in Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6 B. & C. 31), "If it is advanced as a general proposition that when a vendor cannot make a good title the purchaser shall recover nothing more than nominal damages, I am by no means prepared to assent to it; if it were necessary to decide that point, I should desire to have time for consideration." Still it is an exception, and why should we extend it? Lord Tenterden is against it; the rule of the common law is against it; why should it be further extended? Prima facie, the plaintiff would be entitled to be placed in the same situation as if the contract had been performed; and I am of opinion that the Court of Common Pleas were right.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below should be upheld. The action is brought for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment (as to which it may be parenthetically remarked that there may be a distinction between the consequences of a breach of a covenant for title and one for quiet enjoyment, as the one breach may be said to occur at the time of the contract, the other at the time of eviction); and the question reserved for our opinion is as to the principle on which the damages were assessed. The principle laid down by the learned Judge at the trial, as disclosed by the case, was, that the plaintiff under the circumstances was entitled to be indemnified for what he had lost under the breach of covenant, and to recover the difference in value between the old and new leases. There is a general rule of law, that if a man enters into a contract and fails to perform it, he is to make compensation to the extent of the injury. Where the contract is one in fieri, or rescinded, or there is an attempt to enforce it, different considerations may arise which it is unnecessary to discuss. Here the contract was executed as far as possible. The deceased executed the conveyance, which contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The plaintiff being in possession under an old unexpired lease, what was actually conveyed was an interesse termini no doubt, and no actual eviction was necessary; but still the contract was actually executed, containing a covenant for a given benefit which the testator could not give, and therefore the damages ought not to be limited to what the plaintiff paid. It is true that the difference in value between the old and new leases is not necessarily the amount; but what was done at the trial, as to this, was only a method of working out the principle, and really was in ease of the defendant; as taking the shorter lease was no doubt the best thing to be done under the circumstances.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas should be affirmed. The general rule is, as laid down by Baron Parke in Robinson v. Harman (1 Exch. Rep. 855; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 202), that where a contract is broken the injured person is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation with respect to damages as if the contract had been performed. This is the amount of damages where the contract would give the actual enjoyment of a thing, and it is immaterial whether the contract is as to real or personal property. To this rule, however, there is an exception: the origin of which, I take it, was, that in the present complicated state of things no man can be sure that he has a good title to his real property, and therefore it is prudent for him when he is about to sell it, to make it part of the bargain that he shall not be liable to full damages, but that the bargain may be off on repayment of money paid and expenses. That is reasonable; and Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078), and other cases, establish that by custom such a stipulation tacite inest. As Mr. Justice Parke said in Walker v. Moore (10 B. & C. 422), "A jury ought not, in the case of a vendor in possession, to give any other damages in consequence of a defect being found in the title than those which were allowed in Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078), which was recognized in Johnson v. Johnson (3 B. & P. 167), Bratt v. Ellis (Sugd. Vend. & Pur. App. 7), and Jones v. Dyke (Ibid. 8). In the absence of any express stipulation about it, the parties must be considered as content that the damages, in the event of the title proving defective, shall be measured in the ordinary way, and that excludes the claim of damages on account of the supposed goodness of the bargain." This is the true and only principle on which to support Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078), and the other cases depending on it. There is a tacit agreement in such a case, and it merely saves writing at length. But in the present case there is an executed conveyance, a conveyance of the subject-matter out and out, containing a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Why should this case be out of the ordinary rule? and why should the plaintiff not be compensated for what he has lost, viz. a valuable lease? No English case decides otherwise, or even suggests (unless it be in the note in 3 Term. Rep. 678) any such difference as has been here contended for. In America there appears to be considerable difference in the law on this point in the different States; as to which I will only say that it may be in New York and the States where the law is the same that there is a tacit understanding even in such a case as the present, somewhat similar to that which here exists in cases like Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078). The only English decision on the point is in the case of Williams v. Burrell (1 Com. B. Rep. 402; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 98), and there Lord Truro gave up the point. I am of opinion that the same rule applies here as in ordinary cases, and that in such a case there is no difference between a contract as to real and a contract as to personal property.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Here there was an actual executed demise with a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The plaintiff was entitled to enjoy the premises for the whole term, but it turned out that the deceased had no title to make such a lease, and on his death his successor avoided it, and the plaintiff was obliged to make a new bargain for a shorter lease at a larger rent. I hesitated, because I doubted whether the true rule had been laid down to the jury. But I think that it may be taken for granted that the obtaining the shorter lease was really in ease of the defendant, and the best thing to be done; and it was not laid down by the learned Judge as a rule that the difference between the value of the leases was the measure of damages, but that this was used merely as a way of working out the true rule laid down to them, that the plaintiff was to be indemnified for what he had really lost. I think, therefore, there was nothing objectionable in the way in which the matter was left to the jury: the true principle was laid down to them, and the taking the difference of value between the leases was only a mode of guiding them as to the proper amount; and I am of opinion therefore that the direction was not erroneous.

PICOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I hesitated, however, for some time, because I doubted whether the proper rule had been laid down to the jury. The learned Judge told the jury "that the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified for what he had lost." That was correct; but he went on to say, "and to recover the difference in value between the old and new leases," and it struck me there was a fallacy in arriving at the damages in that way. I thought that the case differed from the case of an ordinary commercial contract,—as for instance, a contract for cotton, where, if it be broken by non-delivery, a man may go into the market and get more—because I thought the plaintiff ought to shew what he had lost in money, and that this could not be done in such a case as this, as he could not have obtained a similar lease to the void one of this property, and that to take an imaginary lease as a basis would be erroneous. In the result, however, I think this cannot be distinguished from the ordinary case, though it seems to me hard measure.

Decision affirmed.

ANGLO-AFRICAN COMPANY (LIMITED) v. LAMZED AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. C.P. 145; 1 H. & R. 216; L. R. 1 C.P. 226; 13 L. T. 796; 14 W. R. 477.Shipping—Charter-party—Loading of Cargo.

SHIPPING.—The provision "charterer's stevedore to be employed by ship" means, that if the charterer appoints one, he is to be employed; but if the charterer does not appoint one, the master must load the ship properly, according to the charter-party.

These were cross-demurrers to a plea and replication.

The declaration was founded on a charter-party, by which the defendants agreed that their ship should take out a cargo for the plaintiffs to certain places in Africa, deliver it, and there reload such merchandise as should be sent alongside, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow, &c., and carry it to England at a lump freight; and the breach alleged was, that although not prevented by any of the excepted perils, the defendants made default in reloading such lawful merchandise as was sent alongside the ship at the said ports, not exceeding what the said ship could reasonably stow, &c., by reason whereof a great part of the cargo provided for the said ship by the plaintiffs, and which the said ship could and ought to have loaded agreeably to the terms of the said charter-party, was left behind.

The plea set out the charter-party, the only material provision of which was, "charterer's stevedore to be employed by ship," and then alleged that according to the form and effect of the said charter-party, a stevedore was to be provided by the plaintiffs to reload and stow the said ship, which stevedore was to be employed by the defendants for that purpose; and such stevedore being so employed by the defendants as aforesaid, the defendants, according to the usage of merchants, would not be responsible or liable to the plaintiffs for or in respect of any default in such reloading and stowing; and the defendants were ready and willing to perform the said charter-party on their part, and to employ the charterer's stevedore as therein agreed, whereof the plaintiffs had notice; but the plaintiffs did not nor would provide any stevedore for the purpose of reloading and stowing the said homeward cargo according to the said charter-party; and by reason of the default of the plaintiffs in that behalf the master of the said ship was forced and obliged to and did reload and stow the same to the best of his skill and ability, and that the plaintiffs' alleged cause of action is for and in respect of the said ship not having reloaded so much merchandise for the said homeward cargo as she might have reloaded if a competent stevedore had been provided and employed in and about the reloading and stowing of the said cargo; and the defendants say that the alleged breach of the said charter-party was caused by such default of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and not otherwise.

To this plea the plaintiffs demurred; and also replied that before and at the time of making the said charter-party, and thence until and at the time of loading the homeward cargo there was not any stevedore at the loading-places in Africa, as the plaintiffs and the defendants respectively well knew at the time of making the said charter-party, but there was at the loading-place in England before and at the time of making the said charter-party, and at the time of loading the outward cargo, a number of stevedores, as the plaintiffs and the defendants well knew at the time of making the said charter-party.

To this replication the defendants demurred.

Sir G. Honyman, for the plaintiffs.—The meaning of the stipulation as to the stevedore is merely, that if the charterer chooses to appoint one, he must be employed by the ship; but if one be not appointed, then it is the duty of the ship-owner to load the ship properly—Sack v. Ford (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 90; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 12).

Quain, for the defendants.—It is not necessary to contend that it was compulsory upon the charterer to appoint a stevedore; for the plea narrows the breach alleged in the declaration to this, that the only cause of complaint is, that so large a cargo was not loaded as an experienced stevedore might have put on board.

[WILLES, J.—But your plea does not allege that the master loaded a reasonable and proper cargo.]

It is submitted that such an allegation is sufficiently involved in the plea for the purposes of the present contention. The defence is, an experienced stevedore might have put in more; your complaint is merely that we did not put in as much as he could; but as you did not appoint one, it does not lie in your mouth to complain.

ERLE, C.J.—The contract was to load all that the ship could reasonably carry; the ordinary liability. I take it that this was not loaded, according to the allegation contained in the breach. The plea says, the plaintiffs' stevedore was to be employed, and a larger cargo would have been shipped if he had been appointed. It is clear this is no defence. If the plea meant that all was loaded which the ship could reasonably carry, it would amount merely to a denial of the breach. If it only means that more could have been put on board by a stevedore, it assumes that one must be appointed by the charterers; but the stipulation only gives an option to them to appoint one, who is to be employed and paid for by the ship; and if they do not, then the ship-owners are to load in the usual way, with the usual liabilities.

WILLES, J., KEATING, J. and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Shipping—Bill of Lading—Transfer of Right of Action by Indorsement—Bills of Lading Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. s. 1.

SHIPPING.—The plaintiff having shipped goods on board the defendants' vessel in the port of London, upon the terms of a bill of lading given by the defendants, by which the goods were made deliverable at Bombay to the plaintiff or his assigns, indorsed the bill of lading to A. B. before the arrival of the ship at Bombay, as a pledge for monies advanced to the plaintiff. Such monies having been afterwards repaid, A. B. re-indorsed the bill of lading to the plaintiff, but not until after the goods had arrived at Bombay and had been delivered there to a wrong person:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to sue for such wrong delivery, although the same took place whilst A. B. was the holder of the bill of lading, as by such re-indorsement the plaintiff was remitted to his rights under the original contract with the defendants.

Semble—that by the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. s. 1.) the plaintiff, as such indorsee, even if he had not been a party to the original contract, would have been entitled to sue for its breach.

The first count of the declaration stated, that whereas theretofore the plaintiff, at the request of the defendants, caused to be delivered to the defendants, and they received from the plaintiff, certain goods and merchandise of the plaintiff of great value, to be by them, on board a ship of the defendants, safely and securely carried and conveyed by the defendants therein on a voyage, to wit, from the river Thames to Bombay, and there, to wit, at Bombay aforesaid, to be safely and securely delivered for the plaintiff, certain perils and casualties only excepted, for certain freight and reward to the defendants in that behalf, and the defendants were not prevented from so carrying and conveying or delivering the said goods and merchandise by any or either of the perils and casualties aforesaid, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said goods and merchandise safely and securely carried and conveyed and delivered by the defendants as aforesaid, yet the defendants did not safely and securely carry, convey and deliver the said goods and merchandise as aforesaid, but the same by and through the carelessness, negligence and improper conduct of the defendants in that behalf became and were and are wholly lost to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff lost an advantageous market for the same.

The second count stated that by a bill of lading made on the 3rd day of September, 1863, by the defendants and delivered to the plaintiff, the defendants promised the plaintiff that certain goods of the plaintiff in the said bill of lading mentioned, and then shipped on board the ship Dorothy, in the port of London, should be delivered at Bombay, in India (certain perils and casualties only excepted), to the plaintiff or his assigns, he or they paying freight for the same, with prime and average accustomed, and the plaintiff indorsed the said bill to the Central Bank of Western India, to whom the property in the said goods thereby passed, and they afterwards re-indorsed the said bill of lading to the plaintiff, to whom the property in the said goods passed; and although the delivering of the said goods as aforesaid was not prevented by any of the perils or casualties aforesaid, and all conditions were performed, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to maintain this action for the breach thereafter mentioned, yet the said goods were delivered by the defendants to persons not entitled to receive or have the same, and the same have been and are wholly lost.

The third plea to the first count stated that the said goods and merchandise were so delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants and received by them after the 14th day of August, 1855, and that the same were so delivered and received under and subject to the terms of a certain bill of lading then signed for the same by the master of the ship in the first count mentioned, and that the agreement for the carriage, conveyance and delivery of the same was contained wholly in the said bill of lading, and not otherwise, and the defendants say that the said bill of lading was and is in the words and figures following, that is to say:

H M P B B 1/30 30r	}	Shipped in good order and well conditioned by Thomas Short junior in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Dorothy , whereof is master for this present voyage Bruce, and now riding in the river Thames, and bound for Bombay, 31 cases merchandise, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Bombay (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, save risks of boats, so far as ships are liable thereto, excepted), unto order; freight to be paid in London, ship lost or not lost, or to assigns: freight for the said goods with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.

" Dated 3rd September, 1863.

" Weight and contents unknown. Not accountable for leakage, breakage or rust.

" Benj. Bruce.

" Indorsed per pro. Tho. Short, jun.

" Geo. Short."

That after the shipment of the said goods and merchandise, and before the arrival of the said ship at Bombay, the plaintiff indorsed the said bill of lading to certain persons to the defendants unknown, in order to pass the property in the said goods and merchandise to such persons; and that thereupon, and by reason of such indorsement, the property in the said goods and merchandise mentioned in the first count passed to the said persons, and that the said persons were the holders of the said bill of lading at the time of the committing of the said grievances in the first count mentioned, and the persons entitled to receive the said goods and merchandise were and are the parties entitled to sue the defendants in respect of the grievances mentioned in the said first count.

Replication to the said third plea, that whilst the said persons to whom the plaintiff indorsed the said bill of lading as therein mentioned were the holders of the said bill of lading, the defendants did not at any time deliver to the said persons, nor did the said persons at any time during such period, or at all, have delivery of the said goods and merchandise from the defendants, who have altogether made default in performing their duty and the terms of the bailment in the declaration mentioned, to wit, by delivering the said goods and merchandise to persons not entitled to receive the same, to wit, to persons other than the said persons in the said third plea mentioned, and other than the plaintiff. And, further, that the said bill of lading was indorsed by the plaintiff as in the said third plea mentioned in blank, and not otherwise, and delivered to the said indorsees thereof by the said plaintiff so indorsed in blank, which is the indorsement in the said third plea mentioned, and that after such indorsement and before suit, and whilst the said indorsees thereof in the said plea mentioned were the lawful holders thereof, they, with the intent to pass and revest the property in the said goods and merchandise to and in the plaintiff, thereby redelivered the said bill of lading so indorsed in blank to the plaintiff, with such intent as aforesaid, and so as to pass and revest, and they did thereby pass and revest the said property, and all rights of action in respect of the said goods to and in the plaintiff. And, further, that the said indorsement of the said bill of lading to the said persons in the said plea mentioned was not made with intent to pass, and did not, as between the plaintiff and the said indorsees, pass the absolute property in and an indefeasible right to the said goods and merchandise to the said persons, but with intent to give them, and in pursuance of an agreement between them and the plaintiff to give them a right in the nature of a pledge upon and in respect of the said goods and merchandise by way of further assurance to secure monies advanced and paid by them to the plaintiff. And, further, that before and at the time of the said redelivery of the said bill of lading to the plaintiff the said monies had been repaid to the said persons, and all claims of theirs upon or in respect of the said goods had been and were satisfied.

Rejoinder to such replication, that the said indorsees in such replication mentioned first redelivered the said bill of lading so indorsed in blank as therein mentioned to the plaintiff after the said alleged default of the defendants in the said replication mentioned, and not otherwise, and that at the time of the said alleged default the said indorsees were the holders of the said bill of lading and the parties entitled to receive the said goods and merchandise and to sue for the non-delivery thereof.

The defendants also demurred to the said third count and to the said replication to the third plea, and the plaintiff demurred to the said rejoinder.

The defendants pleaded also a tenth plea to the third count, which stated that the said bill of lading was made after the 14th of August, 1855, and that the reindorsement thereof by the Central Bank of Western India to the plaintiff was first made after the alleged default of the defendants, and not otherwise, and that at the time of the alleged default the said Central Bank of Western India were the holders of the said bill of lading, and the persons entitled to receive the said goods, and to sue the defendants in respect of such alleged default.

The plaintiff demurred to this tenth plea.

Joinders in the several demurrers.

Dowdeswell, for the plaintiff.—One question is, whether the indorsee of a bill of lading has transferred to him a right of action which had previously accrued. That depends on the construction of section 1. of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, which enacts that every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such indorsement shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit in respect of such goods, as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself. But another question arises in the present case, and that is, whether, if the consignor who has indorsed the bill of lading afterwards becomes again the holder of the bill, he is not remitted to his original rights under his contract with the shipowner. The cases of Thompson v. Dominy (14 Mee & W. 403; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 320) and Howard v. Shepherd (9 Com. B. Rep. 297; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 249) shew, that before the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, the effect of an indorsement of a bill of lading was only to transfer the property in the goods, but not the contract, and that therefore before this statute the only person who could sue the shipowner for breach of his contract to deliver the goods was the consignor, between whom and the shipowner the contract to carry and deliver had been made. The act of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. has, it is submitted, put a bill of lading on the same footing as a bill of exchange, so far as the rights of the parties are concerned, and a vested right of action would therefore pass to the indorsee as well as a future right of action. If it were not so, the inconveniences would be immense; the goods on their arrival might be found in a bad condition from some injury they sustained during the voyage; but the bill of lading perhaps passed through the hands of many indorsees, and if nobody could sue but the person who was the holder at the time when the injury took place (which might be almost impossible to fix), it would often lead to a denial of justice.

The Court then called on

Sir G. Honyman, for the defendants.—It is plain from the pleadings in this case that the goods had been landed at Bombay and had been delivered there to some one before the bill of lading was re-indorsed to the plaintiff. It is therefore submitted that the property in the goods did not pass to the plaintiff by such re-indorsement, and consequently no right of action in respect of them was transferred to the plaintiff by such re-indorsement. Section 1. of the Bills of Lading Act does not say that the consignee is to have every right in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading, which the original shipper had, but only that every consignee or indorsee to whom the property in the goods mentioned in the bill of lading shall pass by such consignment or indorsement, is to have transferred to him rights of suit in respect of such goods. It is therefore essential for the plaintiffs case that he should make out that the property in the goods passed to him by the re-indorsement. It is submitted that the bill of lading ceased to be a symbol of the goods after the goods had been landed, and that the bill of lading could only be indorsed so as to transfer the property in the goods whilst the goods were in itinere—Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 710), where it is stated " that the jury found that by the custom of merchants, bills of lading for the delivery of the goods to the order of the shipper or his assigns are, after the shipment, and before the voyage performed, negotiable and transferable by the shipper's indorsement and delivery, or transmitting of the same to any other person; and that by such indorsement and delivery or transmission, the property in such goods is transferred to such other person." So Lord Mansfield, in Wright v. Campbell (4 Burr. 2046), says, " If the goods are bona fide sold by the factor at sea (as they may be where no other delivery can be given), it will be good." There is nothing in any of the authorities to contradict this; indeed, it seems to be treated as law that the property in the goods would pass only by a transfer made whilst they were in transitu, and that it was not competent to do so by any indorsement of the bill of lading after the goods had been landed and delivered. If that be so, then this statute did not transfer to the plaintiff the right of action by the re-indorsement of the bill of lading to the plaintiff under the circumstances which appear in this case. Supposing the goods had gone to the bottom of the sea before the bill of lading was indorsed; the goods having then ceased to exist, no property in them could be transferred, and the statute does not transfer a right of action except where the property in the goods is transferred.

Dowdeswell, in reply.—It is not necessary for the plaintiff to deny the proposition that a bill of lading is at an end after the goods have been landed and delivered according to the terms of the bill of lading. It is alleged in the third count that, by the re-indorsement to the plaintiff, the property in the goods passed, and therefore the right of action passed to him by the re-indorsement.

[Sir G. Honyman asked for and obtained leave to amend the pleadings by inserting an averment of delivery of the goods at Bombay to a wrong person before the re-indorsement to the plaintiff.]

A wrongful delivery at Bombay to a person who had no right to have them, would not excuse the defendants or alter the plaintiff's right to the goods—Jones v. Dowle (9 Mee. & W. 19; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 52).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. There was here a bill of lading indorsed in blank by the plaintiff as security for money which he had raised on it, so that there was a good indorsee of the bill of lading whilst it was outstanding. Now in that state of things, the bill of lading was re-indorsed to the plaintiff, the money advanced on it having been paid off. I think that without having recourse to the Bills of Lading Act, the plaintiff had again all his rights at common law under the original contract with the defendants. But independently of that, if the party to whom the plaintiff had indorsed the bill of lading in blank had handed it over to a third person, I should have said that such person would have had in him all the rights which could be had under the bill of lading itself, and that the defendants by making a wrongful delivery of the goods, could not have put an end to their liability under the bill of lading.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the true construction of the act is, that the rights under the contract may be transferred by indorsement of the bill of lading, and are enforceable so long as the transfer to such indorsee remains in force. When, however, the indorsees of the bill of lading in this case were paid off and the bill of lading was handed back to the consignor, the latter was remitted to the rights he had independently of the statute. I agree too that the defendants cannot mend their position by shewing by their pleadings that they had wrongfully delivered the goods to other persons than those to whom they should have delivered them.

KEATING, J.—I agree that the plaintiff was remitted to his original rights, and that the wrongful delivery of the goods by the defendants can make no difference.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that under the Bills of Lading Act, the rights under the contract pass from one assignee to another. The plaintiff was, however, in this case remitted to his rights under the contract, and he has not been deprived of them by a wrongful delivery of the goods.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

CORNER AND ANOTHER v. SWEET.

Followed, Bailey v. Brown, [1876] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. C.P. 151; L. R. 3 Q.B. 133; 14 W. R. 584 (C.P.).

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.—Deed of Inspectorship—Release—Pleading.

BANKRUPTCY.—To a declaration on the common money counts, the defendant pleaded that a deed was made between himself and certain inspectors, and the persons who were creditors entitled to prove in bankruptcy; that such deed was an inspectorship-deed within the true intent, &c. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; that it provided that when a certain composition was paid, or the inspectors should certify that the estate was fully administered, or that a certain conveyance had been made, the debtor, his estate and effects should be absolutely released and the deed be pleadable as a release, and that, as it was essential to prevent the defendant being harassed, if any creditor should whilst the deed was in force prosecute any action, &c., the deed should have the effect of an order of discharge and be pleadable in bar; that the proper number of creditors had assented; that the inspectors and the defendant had properly executed it; that it had been properly registered and everything happened to make it binding on all creditors; that the plaintiff was a creditor and his debt a debt within the meaning of the deed; and that the deed was in force:—Held, first, that as the deed was sufficiently described to shew it was a deed within the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and it was averred to be in all respects an inspectorship-deed within its true intent and meaning, it must be taken to be a good deed; and, secondly, that the clause as to pleading the deed in bar was good, and the plea an answer to the action.

This was a demurrer to a plea.

The declaration was on the common money counts.

Plea—That, before the commencement of this action, and after the 11th of October, 1861, the defendant then being a debtor within the true intent and meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and indebted to divers persons, a deed bearing date the 6th of October, 1864, was made and entered into between the defendant of the first part, Elias De Pass Gustavus Sichel and George Hutchinson, thereafter called the inspectors, of the second part, and the several persons, companies and copartnership firms, who at the date of the said deed were respectively creditors of the said defendants, or who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication in bankruptcy against the said defendant on a petition filed on the day of the date of the said deed thereafter called the creditors, of the third part; and that the said deed related to the debts and liabilities of the defendant and his release therefrom, and the distribution, inspection, management and winding-up of his estate, and was in all respects an inspectorship-deed within the true intent, meaning the provisions of the

Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and that by the said deed it was provided and declared that, if and when the composition or sum of 10s. in the pound upon their respective debts should have been paid to the said creditors respectively, or if and when (though the said sum might not have been paid) the said inspectors or inspector should certify by writing under their or his hands, to be indorsed upon or refer to the said deed, that the estate of the said debtor had been fully administered according to the provisions thereof to the satisfaction of the said inspectors or inspector, or if and when the said inspectors or inspector should in like manner certify that the said debtor had made such conveyance, assurance or assignment as in the 21st clause of the said deed mentioned. which said certificate the said inspectors or inspector should be bound to give immediately upon such conveyance, assurance or assignment as aforesaid being made, then and immediately upon such composition being paid or (as the case might be) upon either of the said certificates as aforesaid being given, the said debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators, estate and effects, should be absolutely released and discharged from the said respective claims and demands of the said creditors respectively, and the said deed should and might accordingly thereupon operate and be pleadable as a release and discharge to the said debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators, as fully and effectually and in like manner as an order of discharge under an adjudication in bankruptcy; and that it was further provided and declared that the said deed, and the provisions thereby made, should be taken and accepted by the said creditors as aforesaid, in lieu of and in substitution for their said several and respective debts, claims and demands, in respect whereof dividends would become payable under the said deed, or in respect whereof a proof could be made under an adjudication of bankruptcy against the said debtor, founded on a petition for adjudication filed on the day of the date of such deed; and that, whereas it was essential to the interests of the said creditors, and for the better realization of the said estate, that the said debtor should not be harassed by any proceedings thereafter to be commenced or prosecuted by any of the said creditors in respect of any such debt, claim or demand as aforesaid, it was by the said deed declared and agreed that if any of the said creditors should at any time thereafter, whilst the said deed was in force, commence or prosecute any action, suit or other proceeding in respect of any such debt, claim or demand as aforesaid, the said deed and provisions therein contained should operate and have the same force and effect as an order of discharge which had taken effect under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the said declaration and agreement might be pleaded and used in bar of or as a defence or answer to every such action, suit or other proceeding in like manner, and with the same effect as an order of discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, might be pleaded and used in case the debtor had been adjudicated a bankrupt in respect of any of the said debts, claims or demands of the said creditors, or any or either of them, and had obtained his order of discharge; and that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said defendant, whose debts respectively amounted to 10l. and upwards, did in writing assent to or approve of the said deed, and the defendant and the said inspectors executed the same; and the execution of the said deed by the defendant was attested by an attorney, and within twenty-eight days from the day of the execution of the said deed by the defendant, the same was produced and left (having been first duly stamped) at the office of the chief registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and was accordingly duly registered, and together with such deed was delivered to the chief registrar such an affidavit as by the statute required; and that all conditions have happened, and all things have been done, and all times have elapsed necessary in that behalf to make the said deed as valid and binding on all the creditors of the defendant as if they had been parties to and duly executed the same; and that the plaintiffs were creditors of the defendant within the true intent and meaning of the said deed; and that the claim in the declaration mentioned was a debt, claim and demand within the said deed, and in respect of which a dividend would become payable under the same, and that the said deed from the making thereof hitherto has been and still was in force; and that by reason of the premises the defendant was entitled to plead the said deed in bar of, and as a defence to this action.

To this plea there was a demurrer.

Woollett, in support of the demurrer.—There is no absolute release; it is only to take effect after the certificates are given, and cannot be given till after payment, which may never take place, as no time is specified. In order that a deed may be good its provision must be reasonable—Hidson v. Barclay (3 Hurl. & C. 9; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 273), and such a provision as this is unreasonable.

[WILLES, J.—Gibbons v. Vouillon (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 483; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 74) decides that such a release is good; but further, you have not set out the deed, which may be very reasonable; and the plea avers that the deed was in accordance with the statute, and contained a provision as to release. In Tabor v. Edwards (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 183), where there was a general averment, but no release, I distinguished Bloomer v. Darke (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 165; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 214), on the ground that, though a general averment that a thing is contrary to a statute is bad, one that is in accordance is good; and the Court were inclined to think the latter general averment is good, though there was no decision on the point, because it was unnecessary, as the deed was held to be no bar as there was no release.]

But the release here is on a contingency, and is therefore bad; and if this be so, the additional clause becomes clearly unreasonable and bad; and notwithstanding the general averment, sufficient matter is disclosed on the plea to shew that the deed is unreasonable; there is no provision for a tender of the deed to the creditors, not for the time of payment of the composition.

[WILLES, J.—It would have to be within a reasonable time, and in Clapham v. Atkinson (4 Best & S. 722; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49) it was held, that a provision that a composition should not be paid for a year did not vitiate the deed.]

Walker v. Nevill (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73) will, no doubt, be relied on by the other side, but that case is distinguishable.

J. Brown and Lanyon, in support of the plea, were not called on.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant. The only doubt I had was as to the mode of pleading the deed,—whether it was necessary to set out the deed at length, or whether it was sufficient to describe the deed, so as to shew it to be within the statute, and to aver that it was in accordance with the statute. In the old days of special demurrers there was a distinction between an averment that an act was contra formam statuti, and one that it was secundum statutum. The former was held not to be enough without stating the fact which made the act contrary to the statute; but the latter was held to be an averment of fact under which you might prove that the requirements of the statute were complied with, and which was not open to special demurrer. One case which used frequently to occur was as to the assignment of a sheriff's bond. Now that special demurrers are abolished, I think you may aver in that general way in all cases. It is enough in such a case as this to give a general description of the deed sufficient to shew it is within the statute, and to add a general averment that the deed is according to it. The only way in which an objection could be taken would be by an application at chambers, on the ground that the plea was embarrassing; but that would not apply here, because the plaintiff, if dissatisfied with the statement of it, may set out the deed in his replication, and it is much more convenient to plead in this way. There being, therefore, authority that this is an averment of fact, and it being more convenient to hold that such an averment is valid than to hold that the deed should be set out in extenso, it must be taken on this plea that the deed is a good one within the statute.

Now, then, passing over the first clause as to the release, is the second clause as to pleading this deed in bar a good provision? It states,—“And whereas it is essential to the interests of the said creditors, and for the better realization of the said estate that the said debtor should not be harassed by any proceedings hereafter to be commenced or prosecuted by any of the said creditors in respect of any such debt, claim or demand as aforesaid, it is by the said deed declared and agreed that if any of the said creditors shall at any time hereafter, whilst the said deed is in force, commence or prosecute any action, suit or other proceeding in respect of any such debt, claim or demand as aforesaid, the said deed and provisions therein contained shall operate and have the same force and effect as an order of discharge which had taken effect under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the said declaration and agreement may be pleaded and used in bar of or a defence or answer to every such action, suit or other proceeding, in like manner and with the same effect as an order of discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, might be pleaded and used in case the debtor had been adjudicated a bankrupt in respect of any of the said debts, claims or demands of the said creditors, or any or either of them, and had obtained his order of discharge.” No doubt, before the case of Gibbons v. Vouillon (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 483; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 74), there was a difficulty; but that case is an express decision that if a deed contains a provision giving a licence to a debtor to carry on his business for five years without molestation, and providing that if an action be brought it might be pleaded as a release, the deed may be pleaded in bar to an action by a creditor who was a party to the deed. That case, therefore, shews that this clause of the present deed may be pleaded in bar; for the effect of the statute is, that the deed is just as binding on a non-signing creditor as if he had actually signed. In the case of Tabor v. Edwards (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 183), to which I referred during the argument, I thought that if there had been a release, as there is here, the plea would have been good like the present one.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons.

Principal and Surety—Bond for Collection of Poor, and Sewers and General Rates—Bond severable.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.—The condition of a bond given to the churchwardens of a parish by the defendants as sureties for one S., after reciting that in March, 1852, S. had been appointed collector of the poor-rates of the said parish, and that, in March, 1856, he had been also appointed collector of the sewers and general rates under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, was stated to be, that S. should pay to the said churchwardens all sums that should be collected by him in execution of his said office of collector of all or some or one of the said rates. In an action on such bond, to a declaration which alleged that S. did not pay to the churchwardens sums which it was stated he had collected in execution of his said office of collector of the said rates, the defendants pleaded in effect that the duties of S. in his said office of collector were increased by certain statutes passed after giving the said bond, for imposing a main-drainage rate, and also that S. was appointed by the said churchwardens collector of such main-drainage rate, of which the defendants had had no notice, and by which their risk as sureties had been increased:—Held, on demurrer, a bad plea, because the collection of the poor-rates was treated by the parties to the bond as a distinct employment, and the plea did not shew any alteration of the condition of S. as collector of the poor-rates, and was therefore no answer to so much of the cause of action as related to the defendants' responsibility for the collection of the poor-rates.

The declaration stated that theretofore, &c., the defendants, by their bond in writing, sealed with their respective seals, acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound to the plaintiffs and one George Bilton (since deceased) in the sum of 1,000*l.*, to be paid to the plaintiffs and the said George Bilton, which said bond was and is subject to a condition whereby,—after reciting that in and by act of parliament passed in the 49th year of the reign of His late Majesty King George the Third, intituled 'An Act for the more equally and effectually assessing and collecting the Poor-rates within the Parish of St. Anne, commonly called St. Anne, Limehouse, in the county of Middlesex,' it was and is enacted, that it should and might be lawful for the churchwardens, overseers of the poor and vestrymen of the said parish, in vestry assembled, or the major part of them, in case they should deem it necessary, from time to time to appoint a treasurer or treasurers, and a clerk or clerks, and a collector or collectors, of the poor-rates of the said parish, and such other officers as they might judge necessary, and to take such security as they the said churchwardens, overseers of the poor and vestrymen of the said parish should think proper from such treasurer, clerk or collector, and from time to time to remove such treasurer, clerk, collector and other officers, and appoint in like manner by ballot others in the room and stead of such of them as should be so removed, or as should die or discontinue or resign his or their office or offices, and that Edward Day Skillett was, on the 25th of March, 1852, duly appointed collector of the poor-rates of the said parish, and was, on the 26th of March, 1856, duly appointed collector of the sewer rates and general rates to be levied under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and that it might happen that the said E. D. Skillett might be appointed from year to year such collector as aforesaid, or be re-appointed collector of all or some or one of the said rates for the said parish, or otherwise be continued in the said office or offices without re-appointment; and it was a condition of the appointment of the said E. D. Skillett as such collector of the said rates respectively as aforesaid that he should find and provide two sureties to become bound with himself in the penal sum of 1,000*l.* (limited as thereafter mentioned) for the due fulfilment of the said office for the whole period of time during which he should continue in the said office of collector of all, or some, or one of the said rates, and that the said E. D. Skillett had applied unto the defendants to become sureties for him, which they had consented and agreed to do,—(and the condition of the said bond was declared to be such that), if the said E. D. Skillett, his executors or administrators, had from time to time since such respective appointments as aforesaid, well and truly and effectually performed, and did and should from time to time and at all times thereafter, for and during the whole period of time that he should continue in the said office of collector of all or some or one of the said rates aforesaid, whether by virtue of the appointments aforesaid, or either of them, or any future appointment or appointments, well and truly and effectually perform the duties of the said office of collector of the said rates respectively, and he the said E. D. Skillett, his executors, administrators and assigns, did and should from time to time duly and faithfully account for, and upon the request of the churchwardens and overseers for the time being of the said parish of St. Anne, or any three or more of them, well and truly pay or cause to be paid all and every the sums of money that should or might from time to time be collected or received by him the said E. D. Skillett by virtue of the said acts respectively, or otherwise in execution of his said office of collector, of all, or some, or one of the said rates, to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish of St. Anne for the time being, or to some or one of them, or to the treasurer of the said parish, or such other person or persons as the said churchwardens, overseers of the poor and vestrymen of the said parish for the time being, or the major part of them in vestry assembled, should duly authorize and empower to receive the same; and also that if the said E. D. Skillett, his executors or administrators, should and did from time to time, and at all times thereafter as aforesaid, upon such request as aforesaid, give and deliver a particular, true and perfect account in writing, under his or their hand or respective hands, to the said churchwardens, overseers of the poor and vestrymen of the said parish for the time being, or to some one of them (to be verified by his or their solemn statutory declaration if required), of all monies which he the said E. D. Skillett should from time to time have received and collected, or levied by virtue of the said acts respectively, or either of them, or by reason or otherwise in the execution of his said office, then that the said bond or obligation should be void and of no effect, but otherwise the same should be and remain in full force and virtue; and it was thereby provided that nothing in the said bond contained should extend to render either of the defendants, their heirs, executors or administrators, liable to pay more than the sum of 500*l.* apiece.

Averment, that, although the said E. D. Skillett continued in the said office of collector of the said rates for a long time after making the said bond, and during his continuance in the said office, and for and during the time mentioned in the said condition in that behalf, collected and received divers sums of money by virtue of the said acts, and otherwise, in execution of his said office of collector of the said rates, yet he did not during the period of time that he continued in the said office of collector well, truly or effectually perform the duties of the said office of collector of the rates respectively, in this, to wit, that he did not account for or pay over the said monies, but failed and made default, although all things necessary, &c., and all times, &c. elapsed, and applied the monies to his own use, contrary to his duty as such collector; nor did the said E. D. Skillett duly or faithfully account for, or upon the request of the churchwardens, &c., well or truly pay the said sums of money which had been so collected and received by him by virtue of the said acts, and otherwise, in execution of his said office of collector of the said rates, to the churchwardens, &c., nor did the said E. D. Skillett, although duly requested so to do, give or deliver a particular or true account in writing under his hand to the said churchwardens, &c., of all monies which he, the said E. D. Skillett, had received and collected and levied by virtue of the said acts, and by reason or otherwise in execution of his said office. Breach, non-payment of the said sum of 1,000*l.*

Eighth plea—To the whole declaration, that the said bond was made and executed before the making and passing and coming into force of certain acts of parliament, that is to say, of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102; and that the said two acts of parliament in this plea mentioned had been respectively made and passed after the making and execution of the said bond, and were respectively in force before and at the time when the alleged breaches of the condition of the said bond in the declaration mentioned, or any of them, were first committed by the said E. D. Skillett, or had first happened and accrued, and so remained and continued in force thenceforth until the commencement of this suit. Further, that the duties of the said E. D. Skillett in his office of collector of the said rates were much increased, varied, altered, and enlarged by virtue and in pursuance of the said acts of parliament, and the respective provisions thereof; and that the said office was altered, varied and enlarged by the said acts, and the respective provisions thereof; and that the said office of collector, and the duties, liabilities and responsibilities thereof, were by the said acts altered and varied, and made another and different office, with further, other and larger duties, liabilities and responsibilities from the respective times of the coming of the said acts into effect, to the said office, and its duties, liabilities and responsibilities at the time of the making and execution of the said bond. Further, that the said E. D. Skillett, so being such collector as aforesaid, was, by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, and the vestrymen acting for the said parish of St. Anne, Limehouse, after the passing and coming into effect of the said statute of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104, appointed to be collector, under and by virtue of the said act, of the main-drainage rate to be assessed and levied under and in pursuance of the provisions of the last-mentioned act, in the same manner, and subject to the like provisions, as the said sewers rate in the condition of the said bond mentioned; and that the defendants had no previous notice or knowledge of such last-mentioned appointment, nor did they assent thereto, nor did the said E. D. Skillett give any further security whatsoever for the due discharge and faithful performance of the duties of the last-mentioned office. Further, that as such collector of the said main-drainage rate, and by virtue of the said office of collector, and in the proper discharge of the duties thereof, the said E. D. Skillett received divers large sums of money, being other and greater sums than those he was entitled and appointed to receive under his said office in the said bond mentioned, and had other duties to discharge, and by means of the premises the responsibilities of the said E. D. Skillett were greatly increased and altered, and the risk of the defendants of his sureties varied and increased. Further, that under and by virtue of the said 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, the said E. D. Skillett did by virtue of the said last-mentioned act, in addition to the rates and sums of money mentioned in the bond, become, by virtue of his being such collector as is mentioned in the said bond, and otherwise by virtue of the said last-mentioned statute, collector of certain sums of money included by the said last-mentioned statute in the said sewers rate for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the said monies being sums other than and additional to those which, as such collector as in the said bond is mentioned, and by virtue of his said office, he was entitled and bound to collect before the coming into effect of the last-mentioned statute. Further, that after the passing and coming into force of the said last-mentioned statute the said E. D. Skillett, by virtue and under the provisions of the same, became collector of a separate rate for the metropolis main drainage, levied in the same manner, for the same period, upon the same persons, and subject to the like provisions as the said sewers rate in the said bond mentioned, whereby the said E. D. Skillett became entitled and bound to collect further, other and additional monies to those which, as such collector, as mentioned in the said bond, he was appointed, entitled and bound to collect, and had numerous further and other additional duties to discharge, and whereby the risk of the defendants as his sureties under the said bond was greatly altered and increased. Further, that all the breaches of the condition of the said bond in the declaration mentioned happened and accrued after the making, passing and coming into effect of the said acts, and after the happening of the several other facts, matters and things in this plea above alleged.

Demurrer thereto, and joinder in demurrer.

Gibbons (M'Mahon and Hannen with him), in support of the demurrer.—One of the questions which is raised on this demurrer is, whether the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104. has so increased the duties of the collector, and therefore the responsibility of the surety, as to discharge the latter.—[The argument as to this is omitted, as the decision entirely turned on the other point.]—Next, the bond is for the due accounting by E. D. Skillett for the poor-rates received by him, as well as for the accounting for the sewers and general rates; and the plea is bad, inasmuch as it gives no answer as to not paying over the poor-rates which

E. D. Skillett had collected. None of the subsequent statutes have altered or affected the collector's duties as to the poor-rates, and it was within the contemplation of the bond that E. D. Skillett would be appointed to collect rates analogous to that of the main-drainage rate—The Guardians of the Portsea Island Union v. Whillier (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 150).

Philbrick (Mellish with him), contra.—Though the recital in the condition to the bond alludes to two appointments as if they were to separate offices, the condition itself treats the office to which Skillett had been appointed as one office, and it is for his due performance of his duties of such office so long as he should continue “in the said office of collector of all or some or one of the said rates aforesaid, whether by virtue of the appointments aforesaid or either of them.” The case comes, therefore, within the principle of Bonar v. Macdonald (3 H.L. Cas. 226), where it was held that a variance in the agreement to which a surety had subscribed, and which variance had been made without the surety's consent, and may prejudice him, will discharge the surety, though the original agreement, notwithstanding such variance, may be that on which the liability is substantially incurred. The surety guarantees the solvency of the principal debtor; therefore, if by the change of or addition to the duties of such principal debtor the risk of the surety is increased, the surety is discharged, and it matters not by what means the risk is increased, whether it be by enlarging the duties of the office for the performance of which the bond is given, or whether it be by adding to it another office. Pybus v. Gibb (6 El. & B. 902; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 41) is an authority to shew that in such a case the suretyship cannot be severed. It appears here that Skillett was appointed by the plaintiffs to a fresh office, namely, that of collector of the main-drainage rate, which alone would discharge the sureties.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The sureties are not sureties for the new office. How, then, are they affected by the appointment?]

Their risk as sureties for the old office is altered by the imposition of the duties of the new office. The principal debtor receives by virtue of the new office larger sums than he would otherwise have done, and the sureties incur therefore a greater risk as to his properly discharging his duties under the old office. The case of Oswald v. the Mayor, &c. of Berwick (5 H.L. Cas. 856; s. c. 3 El. & B. 653; 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 321) also affirms the principle that if the risk of the surety be increased by any change in the duties and liabilities of the office, for the performance of which the bond is given, the surety is discharged; and here it is alleged in the plea as a matter of fact that the risk of the defendants as sureties was increased by Skillett being made collector of the main-drainage rate.

Gibbons replied.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The action is brought on a bond given by sureties for a collector of poor-rates, and also of sewers rates and general rates under the Metropolitan Local Management Act, 1855. There were two separate appointments of the collector, one as the collector of the poor-rates, and the other as the collector of the sewers rates and general rates. That being so, the bond recites that he was bound to find sureties for the fulfilment of the said office of collector, that is to say, collector of those two different rates. It was, therefore, contemplated that the rates were divisible in their nature, and the condition to the bond then is for the collector to pay over what he should collect. The averment in the declaration is, that he collected sums of money by virtue of the statutes referred to, and otherwise in his office of collector, and that he had not paid them over. The plea is, in effect, that after he was so appointed collector statutes were passed whereby the main-drainage rates were to be collected, and that those statutes, imposing the duty of collecting those rates, threw upon him a duty to collect them, in addition to the rates mentioned in the bond. Now, I am of opinion that this is a bad plea, and for the purpose of this judgment I do not propose to give any opinion upon the question, whether the main-drainage rates are the same as the sewers rates and general rates under the statute of 1855, or are rates levied under the statutes restricting the power of that act; but I think the plea is bad, because the plea ought to answer all the causes of action in the declaration, and I think that there is in this declaration a cause of action in respect of the breach of duty of the collector in not paying over the poor-rates, and also in not paying over the sewers and general rates; and then the increase of duties which is alleged in the plea in respect of the sewers rate and general rates is, in my judgment, totally different from the duties in respect of the poor-rates. In respect of each of these duties the surety is responsible. Had there been two distinct bonds, one in respect of the poor-rates and another in respect of the sewers and general rates, there would be no doubt that an increase of duty discharging the surety as to the sewers and general rates would be no answer to the breach of duty in respect of the poor-rates, and I think the bond in the present case is made equally severable. It seems to me that the cases which have been referred to are where there has been a change in the nature of the employment, and by reason of that an increased duty for which the surety was sought to be made answerable. That was the case of Bonar v. Macdonald (3 H.L. Cas. 226), where the principal debtor was a clerk in a bank, and he was afterwards appointed as manager to a district branch of that bank, with power to discount bills. There there was a change altogether in the nature of his employment, and, therefore, the surety for him as clerk was no longer surety for him as manager. The same reasoning applies to the case of the bailiff of a county court—Pybus v. Gibb (6 El. & B. 902; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 41), where the statute altered afterwards the jurisdiction of the Court, so that the risk of the surety for such bailiff was increased. That is my view of the cases, and for the reasons I have mentioned I think the plea is bad.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The declaration alleges in effect that the principal debtor was appointed in 1852 collector of poor-rates, and in 1856 collector of sewers and general rates, and the bond was given by the defendants, as sureties, to secure the proper conduct of the principal as collector of poor-rates and sewers rates under his existing appointments, and also to secure his good conduct in respect of his being re-appointed to collect all, or some, or one of the rates. The declaration afterwards goes on to allege that he misconducted himself by not accounting and paying over money he had received for rates. That declaration might be proved by shewing either that he was collector of poor-rates and that he misconducted himself in that capacity, or that he was appointed to both offices and misconducted himself in both. The defendants plead the establishment, under statute, of main-drainage rates, and states, first, a distinct appointment of the principal debtor as collector of the main-drainage rates, and next, that the principal debtor, as collector of the sewers rates, would be bound to collect the main-drainage rates; and it states further, that new duties were imposed in respect of the main-drainage rates which, if he discharged them, would impose new responsibilities on the sureties. That is the scope of the plea, and to that there is a demurrer, and it is a familiar law that the plea, to be good, must answer all the causes of action stated in the declaration; and if there be one cause of action therein stated to which it is no answer, there must be judgment for the plaintiffs. The question of law appears to be, whether the entire liability of the sureties for the principal debtor as collector of the poor-rates is discharged by the matter stated in the plea. I am of opinion that it is not. There is, I apprehend, a distinction between the new circumstances which affect the position of the sureties only, as, for instance, giving time, and cases where the condition of the principal debtor is altered. To the latter class belong the cases to which my Lord referred, of Bonar v. Macdonald (3 H.L. Cas. 226) and Pybus v. Gibb (6 El. & B. 902; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 41). To this class of cases we must direct our attention, for unless this plea establishes an alteration in the condition of the principal debtor as collector of the poor-rates, it sets up no answer whatever. With respect to Bonar v. Macdonald (3 H.L. Cas. 226), it is a mistake to suppose that the House of Lords laid down any such rule that additional labour to be done by the principal debtor and stipulated for by a distinct contract, would discharge the surety. In that case the clerk for whom the surety was responsible had not only an additional salary and additional labour, but also additional liability, and it will be found, on referring to the judgment of Lord Brougham, in which the judgment of Lord Cottenham is set forth, that it was because of that essential change in the obligation by altering the liability of the principal debtor that it was held that there was a discharge of the surety. Therefore the judgment of Lord Campbell in Pybus v. Gibb (6 El. & B. 902; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 41), when he speaks of the duties of the principal debtor being enlarged, must be understood in the sense of liabilities. The case of Pybus v. Gibb (6 El. & B. 902; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 41) was a case in which the principal debtor held an office which was enlarged with new duties and new liabilities.

I have observed on these cases because they were the strongest which Mr. Philbrick could produce, and I now turn to the present case. It is not necessary to consider whether the appointment of collector of poor-rates was an office; that would depend on whether it was to be held during a period, or whether the collector could be discharged as an ordinary servant. But whether a distinct office or not in point of law, the parties to the bond treat it as a distinct employment, as to which a liability may subsist wholly apart from the collection of sewers or general rates. That being so, the question arises just as if there had been a distinct bond given for the conduct of the collector of the poor-rates, and as if the plea had set up in answer to a proceeding on the bond that the principal debtor was subsequently appointed collector of sewers rates. To such a case the authorities referred to are wholly inapplicable. With respect to the other question, probably what Mr. Gibbons stated in the outset may be right; but I cannot give an opinion until further facts appear before us, and I content myself with saying that the bond is not entirely discharged, and therefore that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

KEATING, J. concurred.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The bond recites distinct appointments, and I think the liability of the sureties is to be taken distributively. Then, it is said that there was a change in one of the offices for the due performance of the duties of which the sureties are liable, which increased the risk of the sureties, and so the sureties were discharged. It is not necessary to give any opinion as to whether the duties have been so changed as to discharge the sureties; but, assuming that they would be discharged as to the main-drainage rates, they are not discharged as to the other independent office. It appears to me that it is the same as if the obligation of the sureties had been contained in two bonds; and supposing that were so, and that after one bond was executed by the sureties, Skillett was appointed collector of the main-drainage rates, that independent appointment would not interfere with the former contract which related to Skillett being the collector of the poor-rates, and would not discharge the sureties as to such former contract. There is nothing in the plea to shew that his appointment of collector of main-drainage rates rendered him incompetent for the discharge of the duties of collector of the poor-rates. I think we are bound to regard these as two distinct appointments, and the bond applicable to each as if there had been separate bonds. I am disposed to think that the cases in which the surety has been discharged, turn very much on the point of the contract itself being altered so as to prejudice the surety. That appears to be the principle of the decision in Bonar v. Macdonald (3 H.L. Cas. 226), and that is the principle laid down in Bell's Principles of the Laws of Scotland, 5th ed., p. 95, in the passage cited in Lord Cottenham's judgment, where he says, "The rule is laid down in Bell's Principles, that the cautioner is freed by any essential change consented to by the creditor on the principal obligation or transaction without the knowledge or assent of the cautioner." Therefore, treating the collection of poor-rates as a distinct appointment, the sureties were not discharged as to Skillett's liability for that; and therefore I think our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Principal and Agent—Agent for Sale of Goods—Payment to Agent—Settlement of Accounts between Agent and Purchaser.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—The defendant advanced a sum of money to a factor on a general account, as against goods which were to be subsequently delivered to and purchased by the defendant. Goods were accordingly delivered, the property of different makers, part of them being the goods of the plaintiff, who had employed the factor to sell them for him on a del credere commission. The defendant knew which were the plaintiff's goods, and that the factor sold them only as agent for the plaintiff. On a settlement between the factor and the defendant the accounts between them were balanced, by the latter paying the factor the difference between the price of the goods and the sum advanced:—Held, that the defendant could not treat any part of such advance as a pre-payment for the plaintiff's goods, and that the settlement between the defendant and the factor did not make any portion of the advance which was applied to the payment of the plaintiff's goods a good payment as against the plaintiff.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 274*l.* 7*s.*, for goods sold and delivered. The pleas were, never indebted, and payment.

The cause was tried, before Montague Smith, J., at the last Summer Lancashire Assizes, when the facts appeared to be that the plaintiff, who traded under the name of "Paul Caterall, Son & Co.," was a cotton-spinner at Preston, and employed one Joshua Armitage, a commission agent at Blackburn, to sell yarns on his account, upon a del credere commission, as broker. The defendant, a manufacturer at Blackburn, trading under the name of "Edward Briggs & Co.," dealt with Armitage, in purchasing from him, as agent for the plaintiff and others, yarns marked with the initials of the parties spinning them. Previous to the 14th of October, 1864, he had purchased from Armitage yarns of the plaintiff's, and paid for them in cash, and there was no evidence of any other mode of payment as between him and Armitage before that date. On that day the accounts between them being then balanced, Armitage applied to the defendant for a loan of 1,000*l.*, which the defendant refused, but agreed to advance that amount for the purchase, at an agreed price, of yarns to be subsequently delivered. The defendant accordingly paid Armitage on that day 1,000*l.*, and on the 19th and 21st of October deliveries of yarns of one Kershaw, to the amount of 725*l.* 13*s.*, were made by Armitage on account of the advance. On the 24th of December and the 5th of January following he delivered yarns of the plaintiff's to the value of 527*l.* 3*s.*, and on the 11th of January a settlement took place by the defendant paying to Armitage the excess beyond the 1,000*l.* in cash, and so balancing the account between them to that date. The plaintiff, however, was not paid for those yarns by Armitage, who soon after became bankrupt. In taking the account the defendant debited Armitage not only with the 1,000*l.*, but also with interest for delay in the deliveries, as well as discount, short weights, &c. He put to his credit the yarns as delivered, without specifying the makers, but he knew which were the yarns of the plaintiff, and that Armitage sold them as agent. The jury found that the 1,000*l.* was advanced to Armitage upon a general account, and not for Kershaw's yarns specifically, that being the only question the parties desired to be so left. The verdict was entered for the defendant upon the plea of payment, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him for the amount he claimed, namely, 274*l.* 7*s.*, or for such other sum as the Court might think fit, if the transaction between the defendant and Armitage did not prove payment to the plaintiff.

A rule nisi to that effect having been afterwards obtained by E. James, on behalf of the plaintiff, Temple and J. Edwards shewed cause.—It was contended by the plaintiff at the trial that the 1,000*l.* was not paid as against the plaintiff's goods but as against Kershaw's. The jury having found that the payment was made by the defendant on his general account, it is submitted that the defendant became entitled to the verdict. It was a payment of 1,000*l.* in advance, which, according to Chief Justice Wilde, in Fish v. Kempton (7 Com. B. Rep. 687; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 206), would bind the principal. In that case Chief Justice Wilde says, "Where a factor sells with notice to the vendee that he sells as factor, payment to him is good, even though made prematurely." Moreover, when the settlement of accounts took place between Armitage and the defendant in January, 1865, there was such an appropriation of this 1,000*l.* to the plaintiff's account, as according to Favenc v. Bennett (11 East, 36) would amount to a payment which would bind him.

Kemplay, in support of the rule.—However the 1,000*l.* was paid, whether specifically as against Kershaw's goods or generally on the account between Armitage and the defendant, it does not affect the plaintiff's rights. When the settlement took place between Armitage and the defendant there was nothing which amounted to a payment which was binding on the plaintiff. Suppose the plaintiff had refused to deliver goods, the defendant could not have sued the plaintiff for money had and received in respect of the 274*l.* 7*s.*, the amount of the balance of the 1,000*l.*, after paying what was due for Kershaw's goods. This shews that no part of the 1,000*l.* could be considered a payment on account of the plaintiff's goods. Then it is clear Armitage had only authority from the plaintiff to receive payments in money, and therefore the writing off on the settlement of accounts so much of the 1,000*l.* as remained due to the defendant after Kershaw's goods had been paid for was without authority from the plaintiff, and cannot be taken as payment to that extent of the plaintiff's debt—Todd v. Reid (4 B. & Ald. 210), Bartlett v. Pentland (10 B. & C. 760), and Sweeting v. Pearce (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 449; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 265). The exception to this is where there is a custom to make settlements in accounts by taking credits as payments, and such custom is known to and binding on the principal—Stewart v. Aberdeen (4 Mee. & W. 224; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 292); but that does not apply to the present case. The payment here, as regards any part of the 1,000*l.*, was before anything was due to the plaintiff, and was only a debt from Armitage to the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Erle, C.J., Willes, J., and Keating, J.) was now (Jan. 12) delivered by—

KEATING, J.—[After stating the facts as above, the learned Judge proceeded as follows:—] A rule having been granted, cause was shewn last term, and, after hearing the arguments and considering the case, we think the rule should be made absolute to enter the verdict for 274*l.* 7*s.* That a broker or agent employed to sell has prima facie no authority to receive payment otherwise than in money, according to the usual course of business, has been well established, and it seems equally clear that if, instead of paying money the debtor writes off a debt due to him from the agent, such a transaction is not payment as against the principal who is no party to the agreement, though it may have been agreed to by the agent—see the judgment of Abbott, C.J. in Russell v. Bungle (4 B. & Ald. 398) and Todd v. Reid (4 B. & Ald. 210), the authority of which upon this point is not affected by the correction as to a fact by Baron Parke in Stewart v. Aberdeen (4 Mee. & W. 224; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 292). It has also been held by this Court, in the case of Underwood v. Nichols (17 Com. B. Rep. 239; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 79), that the return to the agent of his cheque cashed for him by the debtor a few days before, was not part payment as against the principal; “It amounts to no more,” said Chief Justice Jervis, “than the debtor seeking to discharge his debt to the principal by writing off a debt due to him from the agent, which he has no right to do.” We think the present case the same in principle with Underwood v. Nichols (17 Com. B. Rep. 239; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 79).

When the plaintiff supplied his goods on the 24th of December and the 5th of January, Armitage had from the 21st of the preceding October been in debt to the defendant to the amount of 274*l.* 7*s.*, being the difference between the amount for Kershaw’s yarns and the 1,000*l.* advanced, and the defendant so treated it in his own account. Now, the only way in which the goods so supplied were ever paid for was by writing off that amount from the 1,000*l.* and paying the balance in money, which is precisely what was decided in Underwood v. Nichols (17 Com. B. Rep. 239; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 79) not to be a good payment as against the plaintiff. And it is to be observed it did not appear there was any usage or course of business that would at all make it so; on the contrary, the evidence shewed that all the payments for goods delivered before and after the transaction in question were payments in money in the ordinary way, and that the advance of the 1,000*l.* was an isolated and exceptional transaction; neither was there any proof whatever of any ratification by the plaintiff, who at once repudiated any authority to Armitage to receive payments for his yarns except in money.

It was argued by the counsel for the defendant that the advance of 1,000*l.* might operate as a pre-payment, and that such would be good, and for this he cited the dictum of Chief Justice Wilde in the case of Fish v. Kempton (7 Com. B. Rep. 687; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 206). The case itself only decided that a set-off by the debtor of a debt due to him by a known factor, would not be good as against the principal; but the dictum of Chief Justice Wilde was referred to as distinguishing between set-off and pre-payment, and suggesting that the latter would have been good. It is unnecessary, however, to say more in the present case than that the dictum of the Chief Justice applied to the case of a payment to the factor as part of the particular transaction, and which the principal could treat at the time as being made to his agent for him, whereas in the present case the payment was not made on account of the plaintiff’s yarns, so as that the plaintiff could have called upon Armitage to account for the 1,000*l.*, or any part of it as money received to his use. Had he done so the answer of Armitage would have been that, although a pre-payment in which the plaintiff had a possible interest, yet, inasmuch as the whole might have been exhausted in payment of Kershaw’s or other yarns of the agreed quality, the plaintiff would have no right to treat it as a payment to or for him until a subsequent act of appropriation, which in substance is nothing more than writing off a debt, should take place. It is unnecessary therefore to express any opinion upon that dictum as to the law or usage as applied to factors, as we do not think it applies to the present case.

It is right to notice, though it was not pressed in argument as creating a distinction, that Armitage acted under a del credere commission from the plaintiff. We think this makes no material difference as to the question raised in the case. The agent selling upon a del credere commission receives an additional consideration for extra risk incurred, but is not thereby relieved from any of the obligations of an ordinary agent as to receiving payments on account of his principal.

The rule therefore to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for 274*l.* 7*s.* will be absolute.

Rule absolute.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.—Action on Award—Plea traversing injurious Affection.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—By an award made under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), the arbitrator awarded one entire sum as the amount of damage sustained by a person by reason of his messuage being injuriously affected by the execution of the works of a railway company, to wit, by the erection of an embankment, and by the narrowing of the road in front of the said messuage. To a declaration in an action on this award for not paying the sum awarded, the company pleaded, that the said messuage was not injuriously affected by the narrowing of the road:—Held, on demurrer, a good plea.

Declaration, after reciting that the plaintiff was seised in fee of a messuage, situate in and known as No. 30, Ampthill Street, in the borough of Bedford, and that the defendants were a railway company incorporated by a certain act of parliament therein mentioned, and by a certain other act, entitled the Midland Railway Additional Powers Act, 1862, were empowered to execute certain works, and that the plaintiff, being a party entitled to compensation in respect of his interest in the messuage above mentioned, which was injuriously affected within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, by the execution of the said works by the said last-mentioned act authorized to be executed, and after also reciting an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants to refer the amount of such compensation to the award of an arbitrator, alleged that such arbitrator duly made and published his award in writing concerning the matter so referred to him, and thereby awarded and adjudged that the plaintiff had sustained damage by reason of his said messuage No. 30, Ampthill Street, being injuriously affected by the execution of the said works mentioned in and authorized by the 14th section of the Midland Railway Additional Powers Act, 1862, to wit, by the erection of an embankment and by the narrowing of the road in front of the said messuage, to the amount of 80*l.*, which said sum he, the said arbitrator, thereby awarded and directed the defendants to pay to the said plaintiff.

The breach assigned was the non-payment of the sum awarded.

Plea, after setting out in hæc verba the said award (which did not differ from what was so alleged in the declaration), and also the agreement of reference, stated that the plaintiff's said message was not, nor was his interest therein, injuriously affected by the narrowing of the said road in front of the said message, and that the said sum of 80*l.* included money, the amount of which is unknown to the defendants, which money the said arbitrator awarded for compensation for damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of his said message being, as the arbitrator erroneously supposed, injuriously affected by the narrowing of the said road, by reason whereof the said supposed award was and is void.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

A. K. Stephenson, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. It is submitted that if by any means the plaintiff's message could be injuriously affected by narrowing the road, the award would be good and the plaintiff entitled to the amount awarded. Rickets v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 257) shews that if the value of the house be so affected by the access to it being interfered with, the occupier would be entitled to compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act. The award is therefore good on the face of it.

[ERLE, C.J.—That is not disputed: the question is if the plea is not also good.]

The defendants might traverse the injurious affection; but it is submitted they have no right to sever the amount awarded and to confine the plea, as they have done here, to a traverse of the affection by the narrowing the road. There might be an affection within the act by the embankment, and if there was, that would be sufficient to support the award. In In re Newbold v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 405) Erle, C.J., says, "The award is good enough for the purpose of assessing the amount, provided the claimant on the trial of an action shews that his right has been injuriously affected by the works of the company. All the law about awards, and the mode of enforcing them, has nothing to do with the question." The case of Hodkinson v. Fernie (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 66) shews that the parties are bound by the award, both as to fact and law, provided it be good on the face of it.

[ERLE, C.J.—In the case of an award under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, if the company will not pay the amount awarded, the claimant must bring an action on it; and in answer to such action the company are entitled to shew that the land was not injuriously affected at all. Then the question comes to this, that where there are two claims, one tenable and the other not, and the arbitrator awards one entire sum in respect of both, whether the company may not sever the claims and traverse the injurious affection in respect of one of them.]

There has been no case in which such a plea as this has ever been pleaded before. In Read v. the Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Company (1 H. & C. 826; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 167) the plea denied that the plaintiff's interest was at all damaged or injuriously affected; and so in Barber v. the Nottingham Railway Company (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 726; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 193), the plea which was held good was a plea traversing that any damage had been sustained by the works of the company.

[KEATING, J.—Suppose the plaintiff's house has been injuriously affected by raising the embankment, but not by narrowing the road, and the amount of compensation awarded being given in respect of both, what are the company to do? WILLES, J.—I am strongly inclined to think that this would be a good plea to an ordinary award. You could always plead in an action on an award that there was a matter in difference submitted under a reference of all matters in difference upon which the arbitrator has not awarded, or that it was made of matters not submitted to the arbitrator, however good the award might appear on the face of it. Mitchell v. Staveley (16 East, 58) and Fisher v. Pimbley (11 Ibid. 188) are sufficient authorities for that. Then the arbitrator in the present case had only power to award compensation in respect of such matters as the claimant had a legal right to compensation for.]

Both parties by the submission agreed to refer the amount of compensation to which the plaintiff was entitled in respect of his interest in his house being injuriously affected by the execution of the company's works. It is submitted that that gave the arbitrator authority to find what he did in this case.

Field (Macnamara with him) appeared in support of the plea, but was not heard.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants. This is a reference, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, of a claim for compensation by reason of the plaintiff's messuage being injuriously affected by the execution of the works of a railway company. The company were bound to summon a jury to assess the amount of compensation, if the claimant did not desire to refer the amount to an arbitrator. Here the company and the claimant agreed to refer such amount to an arbitrator; but still the award of such arbitrator stands in pari jure with the assessment of a compensation jury. Now, the assessment of damages by such jury is only in case the claimant can establish by action his right to compensation, and the company would be entitled in such action to traverse the claimant's right to compensation. The present claimant claimed damage by the narrowing of the road; and if the claim had been confined to that and the plea had traversed it, that would have been tried by a jury; but the claimant claimed also damage in respect of the erection of an embankment, and the award of the arbitrator gives him compensation for both. The railway company contend that the award is bad in respect of having given compensation for the narrowing of the road, because the plaintiff's messuage was not damaged, they say, by the narrowing of the road. Had the arbitrator awarded 40*l.* for one matter, that is to say, for the erection of the embankment, and 40*l.* for the other matter, that is to say, for the narrowing of the road, it would have been bad as to the 40*l.* in respect of narrowing the road, if the claimant admitted that his messuage was not injuriously affected by such works. I think, therefore, the company had a right to traverse the injurious affection in respect of narrowing the road, notwithstanding a lump sum has been awarded as a compensation in respect of both matters.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the case of an ordinary award, where there has been a reference of damages, provided the party can enforce his claim to damages in an action at law, the condition must be exhausted before the party can be entitled to the damages so awarded. So with respect to a reference of damages as to several claims, if the award of the arbitrator included the amount of a claim which was not enforceable, the whole sum so awarded would not be recoverable, because it would be impossible to tell how much had been awarded in respect of the claim which was bad. The construction which has been put by the Courts upon the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, beginning with the case of The Queen v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (3 El. & B. 443; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 185), imposes on a claimant seeking compensation that which is precisely what I have imagined a party to be subject to who seeks compensation under a condition on an ordinary award.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If it were not as we hold, a railway company would be obliged to pay in respect of what it is admitted they are not liable for, because the arbitrator has also given a sum in respect of what they are liable for.

MALPAS v. THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. C.P. 166; 1 H. & R. 227; L. R. 1 C.P. 336; 13 L. T. 710; 14 W. R. 391; 12 Jur. N.S. 271.

Carriers by Railway—Evidence—Parol Agreement to carry beyond the Place mentioned in Consignment Note.

CARRIERS. EVIDENCE.—The plaintiff went to the defendants' station at Guildford and (as he said) asked if he could send some cattle to King's Cross station (which was beyond the defendants' line), when they would arrive, and what was the charge, and was told (as he said) that he could, that they would arrive at a particular time, and that the charge was 14s., which should be paid at the end of the journey; according to the defendants' evidence, he was told he could only send to the Nine Elms station, belonging to the defendants, and must take the risk about the animals going on. The plaintiff signed a consignment note containing the words, "to be sent to the Nine Elms station," but not the sum to be paid. The cattle were sent to the Nine Elms station and there detained. The fare to the Nine Elms station was 8s.:—Held, that the above oral testimony was admissible for the purpose of shewing on oral contract to carry to King's Cross, in addition to the written contract to carry to Nine Elms.

The declaration in this case alleged that the plaintiff had delivered certain calves and a heifer to the defendants, to be carried from Guildford to the cattle station, York Road, King's Cross, within a reasonable time, and that the defendants had failed to do so.

The pleas were, not guilty; a denial of the contract; a denial of the breach; and an allegation that the animals were carried under certain conditions, in the plea set out, which exonerated the defendants.

At the trial, it appeared that the plaintiff having bought nine calves and a heifer at Guildford, was desirous of sending them by the defendants' railway and then along the North London Railway to the cattle station at King's Cross, in order that he might sell them at the Islington Cattle Market. With this object he went to the station at Guildford, and there was conflicting evidence as to what took place there. According to the evidence of the plaintiff, he asked the clerk whether he could send his animals by train to go by the North London Railway to the cattle station, what the charge was, and when they would arrive, and that the clerk told him that he could, that they would arrive about four o'clock next morning, and that the charge was 14s., but that he (the clerk) would rather it was paid at the end of the journey. According to the evidence for the defendants, the plaintiff was told there was no such train, that the company would not undertake the consignment beyond Nine Elms, a London station belonging to them, and that beyond there he must take his chance. One thing, however, was clear, that the defendant signed (though he said he did not read) a paper containing certain special conditions of carriage, and the words, "Received of Malpas, of New Cattle Market, the under-mentioned animals. . . . to be sent to Nine Elms Station," the number of the truck, the words "Malpas, New Cattle Market," under the word "consignee" in the form, the description of the animals, no charge of any sum of money, and the words "charges to be paid."

The animals were sent; they arrived at the Nine Elms station; and no one being there to receive them, they remained there a considerable time, till, eventually, after inquiries being made, they were sent on to King's Cross, and there received by the plaintiff from the North London Railway Company, on payment of the fare of 14s. The fare to Nine Elms would be 8s. There was no doubt that, if the defendants were bound to carry to the Nine Elms station only, there was no unreasonable delay, but, if to King's Cross, there was.

The learned Judge having ruled that the particular condition relied on by the defendants in their pleas was unreasonable, left it to the jury to say whether or not they believed the plaintiff's evidence, and whether or not there was a contract to carry to King's Cross. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

A rule was obtained by the defendants calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that the consignment note signed by the plaintiff was conclusive evidence of the contract.

Bayliss now shewed cause.—It is true that parol evidence is not receivable to contradict or vary a written contract; but a signed document is not necessarily the contract, and parol evidence is receivable to shew that it was never intended to be so, and that the real contract was not in writing—Rogers v. Hadley (2 H. & C. 227; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 241), Lindley v. Lacey (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 7). Here the question was, whether or not the written document was intended to be the contract; the parol evidence was receivable for that purpose, and the jury have found it was not so intended.

Giffard and Wood, in support of the rule.—If it was said that the plaintiff was induced to sign the document by fraud or mistake it would, no doubt, be no contract; but there is no pretence for that. The plaintiff, who knows the usages of railway companies to have written contracts only, says he did not read it. Where a note is made, say of the time and the price, you may still shew additional terms—Jeffery v. Walton (1 Stark. 267); you may add to but you may not contradict the written document—Hoadly v. M'Laine (10 Bing. 482; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 162). The evidence here was directly to contradict the consignment note. If a man may wittingly sign a document and then evade it merely by saying he neglected to read it, the finality of written documents is at an end, and that very conflict of testimony is allowed which it is their object to prevent.

[Gilmore Evans, at the request of the Court, stated the facts and decision in Robinson v. the Great Western Railway Company, now reported, 35 L. J. C.P. 128.]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. This was an action brought on a contract to carry some animals from Guildford to King's Cross; and the question is, whether there was any evidence of a contract to carry to that place. The plaintiff gave oral evidence of a contract to carry to King's Cross for 14s., and the defendants relied on a paper signed by the plaintiff at the time of the oral contract on which the action was founded, containing a statement that the terminus was the Nine Elms station. It certainly was agreed orally that the animals were to be carried to King's Cross: that has been found by the jury; but the defendants contend that the paper is conclusive as to there being a contract to carry to Nine Elms. I am of opinion that this contention fails, because I am of opinion that on the evidence it is clear that the written contract to carry to Nine Elms is not inconsistent with an additional oral one to carry on to King's Cross; for on the evidence, although perhaps it is not clearly and definitely shewn that in order to be carried to King's Cross the animals necessarily or usually would be carried to Nine Elms first, I take it that the transaction was capable of being carried out on the assumption that the animals should be carried to Nine Elms and that there should be an additional transitus from Nine Elms to King's Cross. There is one important fact in corroboration of this view: no fare is mentioned in the paper; to ascertain it oral evidence was necessary, and that oral evidence shewed that the charge was to be 14s., a portion of which, it clearly appears, was for carriage on to King's Cross. I think the rule should be discharged, because the oral evidence does not vary or contradict the written contract, but shews an additional contract to carry on to King's Cross. I am careful to make this clear, because I agree that it is most important that railway companies, with their numerous transactions and consequent liabilities, should be able to limit their liabilities by writing. An agreement made in writing at the time of contracting is, no doubt, conclusive. In Robinson v. the Great Western Railway Company (35 L. J. C.P. 123) there was a nonsuit because there was a written contract, and it was not shewn; and in Van Toll v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 75; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 241), where the plaintiff delivered a bag containing jewelry at the cloak-room of a railway station, and received a ticket on which there was a notice that the defendants would not be liable for any package above 10*l.* in value, this Court held that the plaintiff must be taken to have assented to this, and that as her bag and its contents were above this value the defendants were not liable. But here, as I have already pointed out, oral evidence was absolutely necessary to shew the agreed price of the carriage, and that distinctly shewed that it was a sum beyond the carriage to Nine Elms and for carriage to King's Cross. On the ground, therefore, that the oral evidence was to shew an additional contract, and not to impeach the written document, I am of opinion that it was admissible, and that this rule should therefore be discharged.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion on the same grounds. Suppose the company insist that the document is conclusive, still the amount of the payment is left out; oral evidence was necessary to shew this, and this oral evidence shewed that the agreed payment was 14*s.*, and also proved clearly that for carriage to Nine Elms only the company would not charge 14*s.*, but something less. The bargain to carry to Nine Elms was complete by the payment of that lesser sum. What then was the additional charge for? It was for something, and must be for carriage beyond Nine Elms; and it is not inconsistent with the written document that this additional sum was charged in respect of an additional oral contract to carry on to King's Cross. And I consequently cannot see anything in this oral testimony to set aside or alter the written contract. There is, no doubt, a rule that you cannot alter a written contract by a contemporaneous parol one, but this is not the case here; the oral evidence does not alter the written contract, but shews an additional contract to carry further. With respect to the case of Jeffrey v. Walton (1 Stark. 267), I would remark that the reporter must have misrepresented what Lord Ellenborough said. For there the agreement having been made, afterwards a memorandum was made on a card, which did not purport to be an agreement, and did not even mention the subject-matter, yet Lord Ellenborough is made to say, "I shall not allow any evidence to be given by the plaintiff in contradiction of these terms, but I am of opinion that it is competent to the plaintiff to give in evidence supplementary matter as part of the agreement." He could never have meant that this memorandum was a written agreement. The case, however, is supportable on another ground, that the parties consented to this memorandum being part of the contract and acted on it; and it is therefore a sound decision, because where a document has been recognized and acted on, no objection taken, but another allowed to act on it, then there is an estoppel.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is important that it should be understood that our judgment is not on the ground that we hold it competent for a consignee to vary the written note by parol evidence, but on the ground that here such evidence was to prove an additional contract, which does not alter, contradict or vary the written document.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. No question is here raised as to the verdict being against evidence; the only question is, whether I ought to have left it to the jury to say whether there was a contract to carry to King's Cross. It is not competent to a man to sign a document and then contradict it by parol evidence; but here evidence was necessary to shew the agreed price, which was not inserted; if no price had been mentioned, then it would have been inferred that the proper general charge for the mentioned transit was to be paid; here, however, according to the plaintiff's evidence, the price was mentioned, and the parties agreed for 14s., a sum which included the expense of carrying on to King's Cross, and in respect of which the company, no doubt, therefore would have to carry to King's Cross; and it was a question for the jury whether they believed this evidence, and whether or not there was a contract to carry further than Nine Elms.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192.—Deed of Assignment—Clause verifying Debts—Reasonable Provisions.

BANKRUPTCY.—A clause in a deed of assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, by which the trustee is empowered to require any creditor of the debtor to verify the nature and amount of his debt, with full particulars, by statutory declaration, "or otherwise as the trustee may think fit," has not the effect of depriving the creditor who fails to produce proof to the satisfaction of the trustee of all benefit under the deed, and such clause is therefore reasonable.

The statutable majority of creditors have power to bind the minority in giving a discretion to the trustees under the deed as to the mode in which they shall manage the debtor's estate, and as to the time when and the manner in which they shall sell it.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, reported 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 198.

The question was as to the validity of a deed of assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), as against a non-assenting creditor. The deed, which was an assignment by the debtor Richard Turner to a trustee upon trust for sale, &c., and to apply the monies to be received to the payment of the debts of the debtor, contained, amongst others, the following clause: "And it is hereby agreed and declared that it shall be lawful for the said trustee or trustees to require any person or persons claiming to be a creditor or creditors of the said Richard Turner, notwithstanding that he or they may have executed these presents, and that the amount or alleged amount of his or their debt or debts may have been inserted in the schedule hereto, to verify the nature and amount of such debt or claim, with full particulars shewing the consideration thereof by statutory declaration, proved before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, or otherwise as the trustee or trustees may think fit." The Court of Common Pleas held this clause to be unreasonable, and to vitiate the deed. The rest of the deed is more fully set out in the report of the case in the Court below.

* Coram Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J. and Pigott, B.

Mellish (Hannay with him), for the appellant, the defendant below.—The objection which has been made to the clause in question is, that it is supposed to give an arbitrary power to the trustee to reject any debt he pleases if the creditor cannot comply with the terms of proving his debt in the way the trustee may choose to require, although such creditor may be able and willing to give very good legal evidence of such debt. It is submitted that that is not the fair meaning of this clause. In the first place it is to be remarked that the deed creates no inequality amongst the creditors; the clause relates as well to those who have signed as to those who have not signed, and there is nothing unreasonable in enabling the trustee to require proof of the debt by the person claiming to be creditor. If the trustee had no means of ascertaining whether the person claiming to be creditor was what he claimed to be, the whole object of the deed, which is to divide the assets amongst all the creditors, would be defeated. The Court below decided against the deed on the authority of the case of Leigh v. Pendlebury (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 815; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172); but the deed in that case expressly deprived the creditor of all benefit under it, if he failed to comply with what the trustee should require as to proving his debt. That is very different from the clause in the present case, which merely gives the trustee the power of ascertaining who are creditors. If such power be unreasonably exercised, it can be controlled by the Bankruptcy Court, with appeal to the Lord Chancellor, and it is only similar to the power which the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 164. gives to the Bankruptcy Court. It is absolutely necessary that there should be some such power vested in some one. The 197th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. subjects the creditors and trustees to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, and if the trustee therefore improperly refused to admit a creditor's claim, there is power to go before the Bankruptcy Court on the subject, for there are no negative words in the deed to deprive the creditor of that or of any other right if he fail to comply with the requisition of the trustee as to proof. In Strick v. De Mattos (3 H. & C. 22; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 276), a clause requiring a creditor to verify his debt by statutory declaration was held not unreasonable. And Ex parte Spyer (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 62) shews that the Court of Chancery will not allow the object of the deed to be defeated by a wrong exercise of a discretionary power. The Court of Common Pleas seemed to consider in the present case that there were other clauses in the deed open to objection besides the clause in question; but as they held that clause bad, it became unnecessary to give a decided opinion on the other clauses.

[Biron, for the respondent, said he should object to the power which the deed gave "to the trustee or trustees, in his or their discretion, to postpone the sale of" the trust property so assigned, "and to lease such unsold portion either from year to year or for a term of years for such rents as he or they may think fit," "and to give credit for the whole or any part of the purchase-money either with or without taking security for the same."]

If the statutable majority of the creditors thought it more to the advantage of the estate that the trustee should have such powers, there is no reason why they should not be given to him.

[MELLOR, J.—The objections seem to assume that the trustee will act in an unreasonable manner.]

Yes; that is the effect of them.

Biron (Prentice with him), contra.—With regard to the clause requiring the creditors to prove their debts to the satisfaction of the trustee, it is not to be distinguished from the clause which was held unreasonable in Leigh v. Pendlebury (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 815; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172). The clause makes the proof a condition precedent to the creditor getting any dividend or benefit under the deed. There is no limit to the kind of proof the trustee may insist on having; and if he should choose to impose on the creditor anything unreasonable before he will allow his debt, there is no means by which the creditor can get any dividend from the estate. No doubt, section 197. of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. gives the Court of Bankruptcy a general jurisdiction over these deeds; but it is not a remedy to which a creditor should be bound to resort; and, moreover, that Court cannot go beyond the deed; and if there is anything unreasonable in any of the clauses of such deed, that Court cannot rectify them; but the deed must be bad. With respect to the other clauses in this deed. The clause by which the trustee may postpone the sale, and lease the property for such rents as he may think fit, is surely unreasonable; but supposing this Court should think otherwise, it cannot be right that in case of sale the trustee may give credit for the purchase-money without even taking any security for it.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Has not the legislature cast on the majority of the creditors the power of determining what shall be best for all the creditors?]

But this would enable a trustee to put the whole property in jeopardy; he might lease it or sell to the debtor himself without any assets being derivable thereunder for the creditors.

[MELLOR, J.—There are some things which a Court of law cannot determine so well as the creditors, whether they are unreasonable or not; as, for instance, what powers should be given for selling or disposing of an estate of a debtor.]

It is submitted that a non-assenting creditor should not be subject to the caprice of a trustee. In the case of bankruptcy assignees sell only for cash.

Mellish, in reply.—The 136th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, expressly gives power to the Court of Bankruptcy to determine all differences between parties claiming under these deeds of arrangement; and on the authority of that enactment, the Lord Chancellor held, in Ex parte Lawrence (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 61), that the Court of Bankruptcy has jurisdiction to summon a trustee, under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, to be examined touching his dealings with the trust estate.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the following day (Feb. 6) the judgment of the Court was delivered by—

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, which was argued yesterday, we have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is erroneous and must be reversed. The Court below based their judgment on the case of Leigh v. Pendlebury (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 815; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172), holding that the provision in the deed in question in the present case was, in effect, that in case of failure to comply with the terms of the provision, the creditor would lose his right of having the benefit of the dividends under the deed; and that such a provision was unreasonable and therefore vitiated the deed. We do not wish, on such a subject as this, to do more than is necessary to decide the question actually before us; and we therefore refrain from expressing any opinion as to whether the provision in Leigh v. Pendlebury (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 815; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172) was or was not in itself unreasonable. Neither do we decide anything on the question whether a Court of law can declare a provision which applies equally to all classes of creditors, and which the statutable majority of the creditors thought fit to adopt, void on the ground that in the opinion of the Court it is unreasonable. On these points we leave former decisions neither confirmed nor impugned. We base our decision on this, that we think the clause now in question has not the effect of depriving the creditor, who fails to produce proof to the satisfaction of the trustee, of all benefit under the deed, and that we think the clause as we construe it, quite reasonable. In every case where a trust is to distribute a fund among a particular class, whether creditors or any other class, the trustee must, in the absence of any express provision on the subject in the deed, determine in some way whether he will act on the supposition that the person claiming benefit under the deed is or is not of that class. The trustee cannot be bound to give the dividends to every one who claims, though others assert that his claim is fictitious, nor can he be bound to reject every claim which is objected to, though it is said that the objection is unfounded. His duty, as trustee, requires him in some way or other to ascertain what he thinks to be the fact, and to act on his opinion, which will cast the onus upon the party dissatisfied with his decision, of appealing to a Court of equity, or, in the case of a deed within their jurisdiction, to the Court of Bankruptcy, to set aside that decision. Bearing this in mind, it will be found that the provision in this deed, perhaps, requires no more from the creditor than would be required if the deed were silent. At all events, it requires nothing unreasonably beyond what would be thus required. It does not make the trustee arbitrator, finally to decide whether there is any debt, or what is the amount of that debt; nor does it impose any penalty on those creditors who fail to produce what the trustee thinks sufficient proof of the debt; it simply requires that the creditor shall prove his debt "by statutory declaration or otherwise as the trustee may think fit." If he does so, those who think his claim bad must appeal to the Court of Bankruptcy. If he does not do so, the person claiming to be a creditor must appeal. We see nothing unreasonable in this.

Some other objections, on which the Court below did not adjudicate, were urged before us. We think they all failed. Those who intrust to others the task of realizing an estate, ought to select their trustees carefully; but, having done so, it is prudent to give those trustees a discretion as to the mode in which they shall manage that estate, the time when and the manner how they shall sell it, so as to make the best of it. The statutable majority of the creditors are by the Bankruptcy Act empowered to bind the minority in such matters, and we see no objection to the manner in which they have in this case exercised their authority. Judgment must therefore be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

Marine Insurance—Insurable Interest—Shipper and Consignee named in Bill of Lading.

MARINE INSURANCE. SHIPPING.—The mere fact of a person's name appearing in a bill of lading as the shipper and consignee of the goods is only prima facie and not conclusive evidence that such person has an insurable interest in such goods.

The plaintiff, who was a broker, sold for his principals on commission a certain cargo of goods, shipped under a bill of lading which made the goods deliverable to the order of the plaintiff or his assigns, and he retained the possession of such bill of lading until the purchaser had accepted a bill for the amount of the goods. The plaintiff was not a factor, but a mere agent, who had not possession of the goods, or any lien on them for advances, commission or otherwise. The goods were lost on the voyage; and in an action upon a policy of insurance which the plaintiff had effected upon the cargo, the jury found that there was no sale of the goods until after their loss; and the learned Judge at the trial ruled that the plaintiff had an insurable interest, as the bill of lading made the goods deliverable to him or his assigns:—Held, that such ruling was wrong as a matter of law, and that the plaintiff, having, in fact, nothing to suffer and incurring no liability by the loss, had no insurable interest.

Declaration upon a policy of insurance, by which the defendants promised to pay and make good all such losses as might happen by perils of the sea, on a voyage from Liverpool to Londonderry, to certain guano, valued at the sum of 1,150*l.*, in the ship Ann and Isabella, with an averment of the plaintiff having been interested in the goods to the amount of the monies insured, and of the ship with the goods having been wholly lost by the perils insured against.

Pleas, traversing first the promise, and secondly that the plaintiff was interested in the said goods.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

A rule nisi having been obtained to set aside the verdict, which was found for the plaintiff at the last Liverpool Winter Assizes, and for a new trial on the grounds, inter alia, first, that the Judge misdirected the jury in telling them that the facts proved established a sufficient insurable interest in the plaintiff to entitle him to recover; and, secondly, that there was no sufficient evidence of an insurable interest in the plaintiff to entitle him to recover.

Brett, Mellish and Potter shewed cause against the rule; and Temple and Charles Russell argued in support of it.

In addition to the authorities referred to in the judgment, the following were cited: 1 Arnould on Insurance, 66 (3rd edit.), 1 Phillips on Insurance, 177, s. 311, 2 Duer on Insurance, 104, 105, *Carruthers v. Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered on the 26th of February by—

WILLES, J.—This was an action upon an insurance of guano, valued at 1,150*l.*, on board the Ann and Isabella, from Liverpool to Londonderry.

The declaration averred interest in the plaintiff, George Seagrave, only. The pleas denied, first the policy, upon which nothing turns; and, secondly, that the plaintiff had an insurable interest.

At the trial, before Mr. Baron Martin, at the last Winter Assizes at Liverpool, the plaintiff had a verdict for 200*l.* In the last term, the defendants obtained a rule for a new trial, upon various grounds, which came on for argument at the Sittings after term, before Mr. Justice Keating, Mr. Justice Smith and myself, when we took time to consider.

It appears that, in the year 1864, M'Carter, of Londonderry, suing in the name of Joyce, recovered in this court against Swann and other underwriters, upon an insurance upon the same cargo for the same voyage, the sum of 1,200*l.*, of which he received 1,150*l.* M'Carter's interest was alleged to be that of buyer of the guano before its loss from the now plaintiff's firm; so that one set of underwriters has already paid the whole amount at which the guano was valued and insured in the policy now sued upon.

The details were as follows: Upon the 14th of February, 1863, M'Carter, who had from time to time bought guano of or through the now plaintiff's firm, wrote to them, stating that if it suited them to ship soon 100 tons of guano, at 6s. 6d. freight, to be paid for on the 1st of May, they might do so. Upon the 26th of February the plaintiff's firm wrote to M'Carter, stating that they had engaged the Ann and Isabella, to take about 115 tons at 6s. 6d., and that they expected to have the cargo on board about the middle of the next week, and proposed to draw upon him for it at 10l. per ton. M'Carter must have made up his mind to take the cargo thus offered, for he did not write to countermand it; and upon the 2nd of March he effected an insurance through one Joyce of this very cargo, per Ann and Isabella, for 1,200l. Upon the 3rd he wrote complaining that the price charged was 10l. a ton, when it was only 9l. 15s. net in Scotland, but not refusing it; on the contrary, stating that he expected the usual allowance, which was a matter of course. Upon the 4th of March the cargo was shipped at Liverpool under a bill of lading, making the goods deliverable "to the order of George Seagrave & Co. (the plaintiff firm) or to their assigns." The invoice was made out the same day, describing the guano as "delivered to the account of M'Carter," according to the letter of the 26th of February. Then the plaintiff's firm, having upon the 4th of March received the letter of the 3rd, effected with the present defendants the policy upon which this action is brought, upon the cargo, valued at 1,150l., to which extent from that time there were two insurances. The plaintiff at that time was at Belfast, and intended to visit Londonderry; and the invoice and bill of lading were forwarded to him, to be handed there to M'Carter. Upon Saturday, the 7th of March, in the evening, the plaintiff arrived at M'Carter's private house upon a visit, and informed him of what had been done; to which M'Carter made no objection. Afterwards upon that night, the ship and cargo were lost. Upon Monday, the 9th, before the loss was known, the plaintiff and M'Carter went to the office of the latter, and there, without more, the bill of lading was indorsed by the plaintiff, and handed to M'Carter with the invoice; and he accepted a bill for the amount. He learned of the loss the same day; but, so far as appears, neither did M'Carter ask to have back, nor did the plaintiff offer to return the bill; indeed, that would have been inconsistent with all that had passed, and especially with M'Carter's tacit assent upon the Saturday evening before the loss, and the payment upon the Monday accordingly. Further, upon hearing of the loss, M'Carter asked, not for his bill, but for the policy effected by the plaintiff, which the latter declined to give, and referred M'Carter to his own underwriters. Both parties, therefore, treated the purchase as being between themselves effectual and binding, which it could not have been unless complete before the loss. Accordingly, M'Carter brought the action in the name of Joyce against his underwriters, and, principally upon his own evidence, with that of the documents, but without calling the now plaintiff as a witness, he established in fact, to the satisfaction of a London jury, under the direction of Lord Chief Justice Erle, and afterwards in law to the satisfaction of this Court, that what the parties, buyer and seller, had agreed to act upon was the true construction of the transaction, and that the sale was complete by the letters of the 26th of February, acted upon by the sellers by shipping on account of M'Carter, and by M'Carter not rejecting the offer, by insuring upon the 2nd of March (the goods being at his risk as well as on his account), by the letter of the 3rd of March, which in this Court was considered as a reluctant assent to take the cargo, by his assent and acquiescence upon the evening of Saturday, the 7th of March, when Seagrave (the plaintiff) informed him of what had been done, by taking the bill of lading, and paying upon the 9th, without any new terms, shewing that the transaction was complete at latest upon the Saturday, and by acting upon the sale as valid after news of the loss.¹ The non-indorsement of the bill of lading before the loss did not, it is scarcely necessary to remark, exclude that conclusion—

(1) See Joyce v. Swann, 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 84.

Coze v. Harden (4 East, 211) and Browne v. Hare (4 Hurl. & N. 822; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 6). M'Carter, the buyer, thus obtained judgment for 1,200*l.*, and he has been paid 1,150*l.*, the whole amount at which the guano was valued in the policy now sued upon, and he paid the sellers as upon a successful adventure; so that the sellers got all they could have got if the cargo was safe, and thus both buyer and sellers were indemnified against any risk which was insured against by the defendants, and it might have been supposed that the insurers had heard the last of the matter.

It appears, however, that M'Carter was dissatisfied with the amount which he recovered in the name of Joyce, as to the following particulars detailed by him at the trial, viz. 50*l.* of the former verdict not paid, 49*l.* extra costs, 104*l.* difference between the interest which he recovered and the interest which he had to pay his own bankers, in order to raise money, 20*l.* travelling expenses, not alleged to have come within the suing and labouring clause, or to have had anything to do with the insurance.

The mass of these items was irrecoverable, under any circumstances, against the underwriters upon either policy; and no one of them could by any proceeding be justly claimed against the present defendants. M'Carter, however, took a different view of his rights, and it appears now, plainly, that by arrangement between him and the plaintiff, the present action was brought, in effect to enforce payment of the enumerated items, though, under good advice, a verdict was not sought for the whole 1,150*l.*, a measure which, if resorted to, would, we believe, have so demonstrated the impropriety of the claim as to prevent the actual result of a verdict in the plaintiff's favour.

At the trial of this cause, the plaintiff's case was launched upon his own evidence, which was to the same effect as that given by M'Carter upon the trial of Joyce v. Swann,¹ with these exceptions: first, that, after the examination by counsel was over, in answer to a question put by the learned Judge (being the question for decision) the plaintiff made the following statement: "I made the sale to M'Carter on the 9th;" secondly, that the plaintiff stated, that, instead of being principal in the actual or intended sale, his firm were only commission-agents (not del credere) of Dixon & Co., of the same town. And, although the objection on the score of insurable interest was urged early in the case, the plaintiff's only account of his interest was, that his firm were brokers, not factors; nor did it appear that the guano ever was in their possession as bailees, nor that they had any lien. The evidence was quite bare upon this point; and it is consistent therewith that the guano went straight from the stores of Dixon & Co. to the ship, and that the name of the plaintiff's firm was put in the bill of lading in accordance with a not uncommon practice of brokers to carry on business in their own names, and not because they had any other interest in the transaction. And this appears to be the reasonable conclusion from the evidence of the plaintiff, who gave no further account of his interest than that he acted as broker and agent for Dixon & Co., coupled with the fact that he sought to recover nothing upon his own behalf, but all for M'Carter.

The last additional fact to which the plaintiff was examined, was as to the payment of the bill given him for the price of the guano. At first he stated, "It has not been paid; 200*l.* or 300*l.* is still unsatisfied;" "The bill has not been satisfied, to a considerable extent;" "Messrs. Dixon have suffered a loss." But, upon cross-examination, he said: "M'Carter dishonoured the bill at first; it was satisfied by mutual arrangement; we were put to expense by the dishonour and delay,"—not, be it observed, by the loss of the goods.

Now, the only way of reconciling these contradictory statements is to suppose that the 200*l.* or 300*l.* spoken of by the plaintiff represent the 200*l.* or 300*l.* made up of the items already enumerated as claimed by M'Carter, and which are, by agreement with M'Carter (who is probably a good customer), to be allowed or not allowed to him, according to the event of the present action.

Upon that evidence, without calling M'Carter, the plaintiff relied; whereupon certain objections were taken for the defendants, some of them founded upon mere formal variances, to which we attach no importance, and one which raises the main question, viz. that Dixon & Co., who had been indemnified by payment, and not the plaintiff, were the persons interested in the policy, and that the plaintiff had not proved any interest in the subject-matter of insurance.

The learned Judge overruled these objections; and the defendants called M'Carter (the real plaintiff) as a witness. M'Carter, like the nominal plaintiff, gave evidence to the same effect as in the former cause of *Joyce v. Swann*¹ with these exceptions, that, after the examination by counsel, he, in answer to a question put by the learned Judge (being the question for decision) made the following statement, viz. "The purchase by me was on the Monday morning, the 9th." As to the bill in payment of the guano, M'Carter stated, "It is paid or satisfied." As to the items of claim already set forth, he added, "I expect to be made good this loss out of the policy now sued on." Such being the evidence, the learned Judge told the jury, that, upon M'Carter's evidence, it appeared to him clear that there was no contract before the 9th of March, at Londonderry, after the goods were lost; and upon that point he took the opinion of the jury, who adopted this direction and found a verdict for the plaintiff. No other question was left to them. With respect to the point of insurable interest, the learned Judge ruled, as matter of law, that the plaintiff had an insurable interest, "as an unpaid vendor, and with a bill of lading making the goods deliverable at Londonderry to him or assigns."

The damages were agreed at 200*l.* (representing the items already mentioned or some of them), in the event of the plaintiff being entitled to retain the verdict.

In the last term a rule was obtained for a new trial upon several grounds, amongst others, a miscarriage, in that the learned Judge rules, as matter of law, that the plaintiff had an insurable interest; and, the matter having been fully argued, and time taken to consider, we are of opinion that the rule for a new trial ought to be made absolute.

In considering the case, three prominent points present themselves: first, that both M'Carter and the plaintiff's policies were for the value of the guano only, and not for such extras as M'Carter detailed in evidence; secondly, that this action is for M'Carter's benefit; thirdly, that M'Carter has already received from his underwriters, through Joyce, the whole amount at which the goods are valued in the plaintiff's policy.

It was argued, therefore, that, according to the case of Bruce v. Jones (1 H. & C. 769; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 132), there was a complete answer to any further claim. We need not, however, consider this further at present, as there is no plea to raise the question; and if such a plea be added, it may, if necessary, be discussed upon a future occasion.

Next, it appears that the direction of the learned Judge in point of law, and the finding of the jury in pursuance of that direction, are in conflict with the verdict in Joyce v. Swann,¹ and the judgment of this Court thereupon, of which verdict and judgment M'Carter has already reaped and now retains the benefit. Nor was the evidence as to the question upon which the verdict passed substantially different from what was offered upon the trial of the former action, save in the answers given to the mixed questions of law and reasoning upon facts proposed to the nominal and to the real plaintiff, and which was the very question to be decided by the Court. Whether such a result can be deemed satisfactory it is at present unnecessary to consider, and the rule hardly raises the point with sufficient distinctness as an objection to the verdict.

Thirdly, and lastly, the report of the learned Judge is distinct. that he thought "the plaintiff had an insurable interest as an unpaid vendor, and with a bill of lading making the goods deliverable at Londonderry to him or hi assigns." In this statement of law we are, after much consideration, unable to concur. In point of fact, the now verdict finds that the plaintiff was not "vendor," because it finds that there was no valid sale, and no sale until after the loss. In point of fact also, the evidence of the plaintiff and of M'Carter shews that payment was made by bill which has been paid or settled; so that if the plaintiff was a vendor, he was not an "unpaid vendor." This ground failing, and with it the argument that there might be an interest in respect of commission, which probably, like the price, was settled between the parties as upon a valid sale, it remains to consider what is the effect of the plaintiff being named as shipper and consignee in the bill of lading.

That this, as matter of fact, is, prima facie, evidence of interest, we entertain no doubt; but the question is, whether as matter of law it is conclusive that there is an interest, even though the facts should shew that the nominal shipper and consignee is a mere agent, having no lien upon the goods for advances, commission or otherwise, nor the possession or custody of them as carrier, factor, warehouseman or other bailee, nor any liability to account for their loss by the perils insured against,—such as sustained the insurance by a carrier—Crowley v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478); a warehouseman declaring himself a trustee—Waters v. the Monarch Life Assurance Company (5 El. & B. 870; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 102); a bankrupt or insolvent in possession of after-acquired property by permission of his assignees—Marks v. Hamilton (17 Exch. Rep. 323; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 109); a ship carpenter having a lien for repairs—Tasker v. Scott (6 Taunt. 234; s. c. 1 Marsh. 556); or a person having an equitable assignment—Wilson v. Martin (11 Exch. Rep. 684; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 217). The evidence did not bring the plaintiff within any of these categories, and the loss which took place was a loss of the goods to the intended seller or the intended buyer, according as the sale was complete or not, and not a loss to the mere intermediate agents.

It was argued that the liability for freight as shipper made an interest; but, by the loss of the goods on the way, the freight was also lost; and if the goods had arrived, the interest was in the shipowner's enforcing his lien, not in the goods themselves.

It was further argued that the bill of lading gave a remedy against the master, and was as against him an estoppel; but even as against the master, the bill of lading was not conclusive if Dixon & Co. chose to interfere, and to insist upon delivery to them; and such delivery would have been an answer to any claim by the plaintiff, as was decided in the case of Sheridan v. the New Quay Company (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 618; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 58).

The persons, if any, interested in the policy were Dixon & Co., and not the plaintiff. The property was theirs. The temporary possession of it was that of the ship's master as bailee; the plaintiff, if there was a valid sale, was interested at the outside to the extent of his commission, if it was at risk, which it was not, for it was earned by the fact of sale, and there would be no lien for it against the buyer: and if there was no valid sale, he was a mere agent who had suffered nothing, and incurred no liability by the loss, for he had discharged his functions, save that he held the shipping documents subject to the orders of his employers.

We are not aware that it has ever been held that a mere agent without possession or lien has an insurable interest to the extent of the value of the goods, simply because his name appears in the bill of lading instead of that of his principal; and the general rule is clear that to constitute interest insurable against a peril, it must be an interest such that the peril would by its proximate effect cause damage to the assured.

We are therefore, after much consideration, of opinion that the learned Judge was wrong in ruling as matter of law, even in the state of facts found by the jury, that there was an insurable interest in the plaintiff.

We were asked to amend the declaration by inserting a statement of interest in Dixon & Co., and, undoubtedly, if Dixon & Co. had sustained a loss, they might have adopted and recovered upon this policy: but we are of opinion that no such amendment ought to be allowed in this case, because the action is in our judgment brought for M'Carter, not for Dixon & Co., who have been paid, and such an amendment might tend to frustrate, and could not tend to promote the decision of the question which this action was brought to try. As to the formal objections raised to the declaration, they may be cured by amendment if and when the plaintiff thinks it worth while. We give the defendant leave to add a plea or pleas, within eight days, upon condition that the plaintiff may within eight days thereafter enter a stet processus and cancel the policy.

For these reasons, and with these directions, the rule for a new trial is made absolute, and we hope we are not outstepping our province if we add a suggestion that, in the event of the matters of law decided by the Court upon this or the former occasion being again contested by either party, the more convenient course will be that such party should be put to raise his objections by bill of exceptions, and thus obtain the benefit of reviewing our decision before a superior tribunal.

Rule absolute.

Bill of Exchange—Foreign Bill—Indorsement—Notice of Dishonour—Alteration.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE. INTERNATIONAL LAW.—A bill was drawn in England payable to drawer's order, directed to and accepted by the drawee in France, payable in France, and was indorsed by the drawer in blank and delivered to the defendant in England, and by him indorsed in blank and delivered to the plaintiff in England, and indorsed by the plaintiff and delivered to one B. in France. The bill was duly presented in France and dishonoured; a notice of dishonour was given—good by the law of France, bad by the law of England; by the law of France an indorsement must state a date and consideration. The plaintiff altered the bill by putting a date and consideration to the blank indorsements; but beyond this, on the special indorsement of the drawer to the defendant was inserted the rate of exchange, and on the face of the bill words purporting to make this part of the acceptors contract:—Held, first, that the notice of dishonour was good, both on the authority of Rothschild v. Currie (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 77), and also because due notice is such notice as can be reasonably required under the circumstances, and it is reasonable to hold that notice of dishonour, valid according to the law of the place where the bill is payable, is reasonable notice for the different countries of the different parties to a bill, unless the particular circumstances of the case are exceptional; but secondly, that the alterations rendered the bill void in the hands of the plaintiff.

This was an action on a bill of exchange. The declaration alleged that one Lion by his bill of exchange now overdue, directed to one Pollagot; required the latter to pay to his order 250*l.* three months after date; that the said Lion indorsed the bill to the defendant, who indorsed it to the plaintiff; that the bill was duly presented for payment and dishonoured, whereof the defendant had due notice, but did not pay the same. There was also the common money count for money paid, money lent and on accounts stated.

The defendant pleaded to the first count, first, that he had not due notice; secondly, that he did not indorse; thirdly, that his indorsement was made void by being materially altered without his consent: and, fourthly, that the plaintiff whilst holder, agreed for valuable consideration with Pollagot, the acceptor, to give him time. And he pleaded to the money count, never indebted.

The material facts which appeared at the trial were these: The bill was drawn by Lion in London, payable to his order, and was directed to and accepted by Pollagot in Paris, payable there; it was indorsed by Lion in blank and delivered to the defendant in London, and by him indorsed in blank and delivered to the plaintiff in London, and by him indorsed and delivered to one Berl  in Paris. The bill was duly presented for payment to Pollagot in Paris and was dishonoured. The holder then took all the steps required by the French law in order to enable him to recover against the other parties to the bill, i.e. the bill was duly protested at the proper office, and a copy of the protest sent to the French consul in London, who, in due course, according to French law, gave notice to the defendant. The notice was clearly good according to the French law, clearly bad according to English law. It also appeared that by the French law an indorsement should be special and state a date and consideration; and that the plaintiff had altered the bill by turning the indorsements in blank into special indorsements, with a statement of a date and a consideration, viz., for value received. Beyond this, on the special indorsement of Lion to the defendant, were inserted the words, "Pay to the order of E. T. Smith, at the rate of francs 25.75 for 1*l.* value received, the sum of francs 6437.50, ut retro," and on the face of the bill a superscription of the same words, purporting to make them part of the acceptor's contract. Evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff to shew that the only effect of 25.75 was to prevent the holder from demanding a higher rate of exchange, and that the acceptor or other person called on to pay might still pay according to the actually existing rate if lower, but this evidence failed.

A verdict was entered for the defendant, under the direction of the learned Judge, on the grounds that the notice of dishonour was bad, and that the alteration vitiated the bill; with leave to the plaintiff to move to set aside the verdict and enter it for himself for the amount claimed.

A rule having been obtained pursuant to such leave (though by mistake drawn up in an incorrect and too restricted form),

H. James and Harrington shewed cause.—It is admitted that the bill was duly protested, and that the notice of dishonour was good by the law of France, but was bad according to the law of England; and it is submitted, first, that this is an English bill, as to the indorsement, and that, if so, there is not a proper notice of dishonour; and, secondly, that if it be a French bill, there is no sufficient indorsement by the French law, and that even if this has been complied with, yet there was no authority to make the indorsement which was made here, and which is not only special, but regulates the rate of exchange, which cannot be put higher than the rate on the day on which it becomes due. Now, first, in general terms, is this a French or English bill as to the indorsement? It is submitted that each indorsement was a new bill, a contract of indemnity; and that this contract being in England is a contract of guarantee by English law. It is admitted that Rothschild v. Carrie (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 77) is an authority the other way; and that the only distinction is, that there the bill was accepted on its face payable in Paris, whereas here it is open, and also (as we say) was sent for collection to Paris. In the case of Gibbs v. Fremont (9 Exch. Rep. 25; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 302) the case of Rothschild v. Currie (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 77) is referred to as doubtful, and in Allen v. Kemble (6 Moo. P.C. 314) it is disapproved of. Again, Mr. Justice Byles, in his treatise on Bills of Exchange, 8th edit. 372, thus refers to Rothschild v. Currie (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 77): "It has even been held, but perhaps erroneously, that not only the protest, but the notice, must be regulated by the law of the country where the bill is payable." This question is also discussed in Chitty on Bills (edition of 1859), 172, and in Story on Bills (s. 296. and the notes to that section), and also in Story's Conflict of Laws. M. Demangeat, in his treatise Traité de Lettres de Change, states that the law of England governs an indorsement made there, and makes an indorsement which is good there also good against an acceptor in France. Any other construction would lead to great inconvenience, as the indorsee cannot well know the law of another country. Secondly, the French law requires that the indorsement should contain the name of the indorsee, the date and the value (whether on account for goods, &c.)—Code de Commerce, arts. 136, 137, 138, Nouguier, Des Lettres de Change. And as to the alteration, it is admitted that there is a right to alter; but here the alteration has gone too far, because there is no right to fix the sum as is here done; and one of the reasons why the acceptor refuses to pay is, that he has this sum demanded of him; and, as appears from Nouguier, Des Lettres de Change, 420, by the French law, a man has no right to modify the ordinary rules of indorsement.

E. James and Tapping, in support of the rule.—There is no conflict of authority. In Gibbs v. Fremont (9 Exch. Rep. 25; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 302) the question was simply on what rate of interest the damages were to be calculated against the drawer in case of non-acceptance. The acceptor's engagement is to pay in France, and the indorser engages, on non-performance by the original debtor in France, to pay himself in England. Rothschild v. Currie (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 77) is in point. First, it is submitted that this is a French bill as against the indorser. Lord Mansfield, in the case of Robinson v. Bland (1 W. Black. 258), said, "The general rule established ex comitate et jure gentium, is that the place where the contract is made, and not where the action is brought, is to be considered in expounding and enforcing the contract. But this rule admits of an exception, where the parties at the time of making had a view to a different kingdom," and here at the time of indorsement it was contemplated that the contract should be fulfilled in France.

[BYLES, J.—It is said in Allen v. Kemble (6 Moo. P.C. 314), "Since the cases above referred to were decided, the whole law on this subject has been most carefully, elaborately and learnedly examined by Mr. Justice Story in his treatise on Bills of Exchange, and he disapproves of the decision in Rothschild v. Currie" (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 77).]

Where a contract is made in one country to be performed in another, the latter is deemed the country where it is made—Byles on Bills, 370, Story on Bills, s. 129, the judgment of Lord Brougham in Don v. Lippmann (5 Cl. & F. 1).—[They further referred to Nouguier, Des Lettres de Change, Les Codes Annotés, de Sirey, par Gilbert, et Dictionnaire des Lois, par Chicoisneau.]—As to the argument from inconvenience, it cuts both ways, and is rather in favour of our construction, as it would be highly inconvenient that the holder should have to ascertain where every indorsement was made and the law of those places. He cannot tell where the indorsements were made; the proper time may elapse from no default, and, indeed, the bill might be indorsed where there was no law on the subject. Secondly, as to the alteration. According to the evidence, these words are always put in, and merely denote the maximum, not minimum, which was to be paid; and it is clear that immaterial words in favour of the party sued do not affect the contract. The only mention as to alteration in the Code is found in Code de Commerce, s. 139, which prohibits ante-dating, but not such an alteration as the present.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Erle, C.J., Byles, J., Keating, J., and Smith, J.) was now (Jan. 12) delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—In this action, by the holder against the indorser, the defendant relied on two grounds of defence: first, that he had not received due notice of dishonour, and, secondly, that the bill was rendered void by alteration. As to the first ground, the facts were that the bill was drawn in England, payable to the drawer's order, directed to and accepted by the drawee in France, payable in France, and was indorsed by the drawer in blank and delivered to the defendant in England, and by him indorsed in blank and delivered to the plaintiff in England, and indorsed by the plaintiff and delivered to one Berl , in France. The bill was duly presented in France and dishonoured, and the holder took the steps required by the law of France to entitle him to recover from the other parties to the bill. That is to say, the bill was taken to the proper office and a due protest was made, and a copy of the protest was transmitted to the consul of France in the foreign country where the party to the bill was residing, that is to say, as respects this defendant, to the French consul in London, and by that consul the protest was in due course, according to the French practice, made known to the defendant without delay. If the action on the bill had been brought in France, upon an indorsement made in France, these facts would have amounted to such notice of dishonour as the law of France requires, and would have entitled the plaintiff to recover. As this action was brought in England against an indorser indorsing in England, the present question is, whether these facts are evidence of due notice of dishonour against this defendant in an action brought in England.

Our answer is in the affirmative, on two grounds: first, because the point has been decided in Rothschild v. Currie (1 Q.B. Rep. 43; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 77), where the bill was drawn, accepted, indorsed and dishonoured under circumstances similar to those relating to the present bill, and the facts adduced to shew notice of dishonour were also similar and were decided to be sufficient because they were sufficient according to the law of France. Secondly, if the reason assigned in that case be not now adopted, and if the contract of an indorser in England of a bill accepted payable in France be held to be a contract governed by the law of England, and so the holder be not entitled to sue in England such an indorser, unless he has given due notice of dishonour, according to the law of England, then the question is what notice, under such circumstances, amounts to due notice. If the parties lived in England, and their addresses were known, the rule is that notice should be sent by the post on the day following the day of dishonour. But, in respect of bills dishonoured in a foreign country, such a rule cannot always have a literal application, because, among other reasons, the postal regulations may make it impossible. Due notice is such notice as can be reasonably required under the circumstances, and the reasonableness of the notice proved in evidence is a question of law depending on the facts of each particular case, which facts are for the jury. In the course of practice rules have been recognized by the Judges, and so have become law—see the judgments of Grove, J., Lawrence, J., and Le Blanc, J., in Darbishire v. Parker (6 East, 3). If, by the law of the place where the bill is payable, there are regulations for giving notice of dishonour, in order to make indorsers liable to the holder, a presumption is raised that notice, according to those regulations, is all that the indorser should require. The indorser of a bill accepted payable in France, promises to pay, in the event of dishonour in France, and notice thereof. By this contract, he must be taken to know the law of France relating to the dishonour of bills, and notice of dishonour is a portion of that law. Then, although his contract is regulated by the law of England relating to indorsement, and, although he may not be liable unless reasonable notice of dishonour has been sent to him, yet the notice of dishonour according to the law of France may be, and, we think, ought to be deemed reasonable notice according to the law of England, and be sufficient in England to entitle the plaintiff to recover according to that law. It is reasonable to hold that the foreign holder should have time to make good his right of recourse against all the parties to the bill, in whatever country they may be; here the holder was a Frenchman in France, the indorsement to him was by the plaintiff, a Frenchman in France, the indorsement to the plaintiff was by the defendant, an Englishman in England, and the indorsement to that Englishman by Lion, the payee, may have been in any country. The inconvenience would be great if the holder was bound to know the place of each indorsement, and the law of that place relating to notice of dishonour, and to give notice accordingly, on pain, in case of mistake, of losing his remedy; whereas there would be great convenience to the holder if notice, valid according to the law of the place where the bill is payable, should be held to be reasonable notice for each of the countries of each of the parties, unless an exceptional case should give occasion for an exception.

The defendants' second ground of defence was the alteration of the bill after the indorsement by the defendant. The facts were, that the bill had been indorsed in blank by Lion, the payee, and delivered to the defendant, by him indorsed in blank in England and delivered to the plaintiff, who took or sent the bill to France, where it was indorsed by one Berl . The law of France requires an indorsement to be special, and to state a date and consideration, and one alteration made by the plaintiff was turning the indorsements in blank into special indorsements, with the statement of a date and a consideration, viz. for value received. If this had been all it might be held to make no change in the liability of the parties but to be a completion of the intention of the parties to indorse, and, probably, would not have been thought to make the bill void. For a man may convert a blank indorsement into a special indorsement in his own favour—Clark v. Piggot (1 Salk. 126; s. c. 12 Mod. 193). But, beyond this, on the special indorsement of Lion to Smith was inserted the rate of exchange, according to which payment was to be made thus: "Pay to the order of E. T. Smith, at the rate of francs 25.75 for 1l. value received, the sum of francs 6437.50, ut retro;" and beyond this, there was placed on the face of the bill a superscription of the same words, purporting to make them part of the acceptor's contract. The defendant contended that these alterations altered the contract of the acceptor and of himself, which was in substance to pay according to the rate of exchange at the time of dishonour, a rate which might be lower than 25.75. And as it is law that an alteration of a written contract in a material part makes it void this contract was rendered void thereby.

The plaintiff attempted to answer this defence by offering evidence to prove that the effect of the words in the indorsement, "pay at 25.75," did not create a right to demand payment at that rate of exchange, but was a declaration obligatory on the holder, whoever he might be, not to demand a higher rate than 25.75, even if the actual rate should be higher, leaving the right of the acceptor or other party to pay at a lower rate, if the actual rate should be lower, unaffected thereby. On this part of the case it is not necessary to say more than that this evidence appears to us to have failed.

We have, therefore, to decide whether these alterations render the bill void in the hands of the plaintiff, by whom or on whose behalf they were made, and our answer is in the affirmative; they appear to us to bring this case within the numerous authorities deciding that alterations of an instrument containing a contract, having the effect of altering the rights and liabilities of the parties to that contract, render that instrument void.

THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED) v. MARTIN.

35 L. J. C.P. 181.

Marine Insurance—Double Insurance—Amount Recoverable on Policy of Re-insurance.

MARINE INSURANCE.—By a policy of insurance a vessel was insured from Bombay to Calcutta, and for thirty days after she had been moored at the latter place. She had arrived there ten days before such policy was effected; and on receiving news of her said arrival, her owners effected a second policy on her with the same insurers, by which she was insured at and from Calcutta to Bombay. The vessel was totally lost at Calcutta during the continuance of the risk under both policies, and the insurers, having paid the owners as for a total loss upon the second policy, sought to recover the full amount upon a policy of re-insurance which they had effected of the risk under the second policy, without deducting the money payable upon the first policy. The Court, being at liberty to draw inferences of fact as a jury, were of opinion from the above facts that the said second policy as intended as a substitution for the first, and that the original insurers were liable only on the second policy, and were, therefore, entitled to recover the full amount on the policy of re-insurance.

This was an action for the recovery of 50*l.* under a policy of re-insurance on forty sixty-fourth shares of a ship called the Aladdin, and by the consent of the parties, and by the order of Byles, J., the following CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court, without any pleadings.

On the 20th of September, 1864, the owners of the Aladdin effected a policy of insurance with the plaintiffs in the sum of 7,000*l.* on forty sixty-fourth shares of the said ship, such shares being valued in the said policy at 7,000*l.*, and the insurance being at and from Bombay to Calcutta, and for thirty days after she had been moored at Calcutta in good safety. A copy of this policy was annexed to the case, marked No. 1.

The ship arrived at Calcutta on the 10th day of September, 1864, and on receiving news of the arrival the owners effected another policy with the plaintiffs on the aforesaid forty sixty-fourth shares, the shares being likewise valued in this policy at 7,000*l.*, and the insurance being at and from Calcutta to Bombay, and during her stay there for thirty days after arrival. A copy of this policy was annexed, marked No. 2.

On the 16th of November, 1864, the plaintiffs effected with the defendant and other underwriters a policy of insurance in the sum of 2,000*l.* on the said forty sixty-fourth shares of the said ship, the insurance being at and from Calcutta to Bombay, and the said shares were valued at 7,000*l.* This policy, a copy of which was annexed, numbered No. 3, was a policy of re-insurance on the second mentioned policy.

On the 5th of October, and during the continuance of the risk under both the first and second policies, the vessel was driven ashore, in the cyclone which raged at Calcutta, and became a complete wreck; and it is admitted that the loss was a total loss. The plaintiffs have settled with the owners as for a total loss of the ship on the policy No. 2, and claim from the defendant the sum of 100*l.*, being the full amount of his subscription of the re-insurance policy, No. 3. The defendant has paid 50*l.* on one-half of the amount of his subscription.

The Court to be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury would be entitled to do.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the defendant was liable to pay to the plaintiffs the full amount of his subscription to the re-insurance policy.

Cohen, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs have paid the whole amount on policy No. 2, they being liable for the same under such policy to the owners of the vessel. There is no reason, therefore, why they should not recover the full amount underwritten by the defendant, who had, by policy to the extent he had so underwritten, re-insured the plaintiffs against loss in the second policy. No doubt policy No. 1. overlapped part of the time covered by policy No. 2, but both policies being made by the owners of the vessel with the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs could never recover anything under policy No. 1. They have, therefore, had to pay the whole amount insured, and are entitled to be indemnified under the policy of re-insurance to the full extent of such re-insurance.

Crompton, contra.—The question is as to the amount payable under a policy of re-insurance where the original insurers were liable under two policies, under each of which the loss could be claimed. If these two policies are to be considered in the same way as they would have been had each been made with different underwriters, the interest of the plaintiffs in the risk insured by the third policy, which was underwritten by the defendant, would have been only that of one-half, for in such a case the plaintiffs would only have been ultimately liable on the second policy to the extent of one-half the amount thereby insured—Rogers v. Davis (Park on Insurance, 423) and Davis v. Gildart (Ibid. 424). “In France over-insurance is not permitted; and in case of policies identical as to the party interest and risks exceeding the amount of the insurable interest without fraudulent intent, the first underwriters only to the amount at risk are liable”—1 Phillips on Insurance, 202 (3rd edit.), citing Code de Commerce, a. 359. If there was here a double insurance the defendant would be entitled to share with the plaintiffs the benefit arising from the over-insurance. It is submitted that there was such double insurance. According to 1 Phillips on Insurance, 205 (3rd edit.), “two insurances may be double, though the risk commence or terminate at different times. During the time while the two insurances concur and run parallel, the risks being specified by the same description in both, are identical, and come within the phraseology and the object of the provision relative to prior and subsequent policies.” With respect to re-insurances, such could not have been legally made in this country until the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 56. s. 1; there are, therefore, no decisions as to the amount recoverable thereunder. It is stated in Arnould on Insurance, vol. 1. p. 94. (3rd edit.), that, “in every other country, except France, the re-assured is allowed to cover by his re-assurance the whole amount of the original insurance, without deducting therefrom the premiums of the original insurance, or the premium of the premium. In France the great authority of Emérigon supports this practice, but Pothier, Valin, Estrangin, the learned commentator on Pothier, and Boulay-Paty, are all opposed to Emérigon on this point, upon the ground that the premium of the original insurance having been already paid to the underwriter, he runs no risk upon it, and, therefore, cannot insure it.”

Cohen replied.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that judgment should be for the plaintiffs in this case. The intention of the parties, as gathered from the dates at which the first and second policies were made was, that the first policy should be considered at an end when the second policy was made, and that the second policy should be the one on which the ship was insured by the owners. Then the plaintiffs re-insured that risk, and the liability of the defendant for the full amount, under his contract of insurance, is therefore clear.

TOMLINSON v. GOATLEY.

35 L. J. C.P. 183; L. R. 1 C.P. 230; 12 Jur. N.S. 431.

Practice—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 17.—Order to Proceed as if Service Effected.

PRACTICE.—The Court will not interfere with the discretion of a Judge at chambers in refusing to make an order to proceed as if personal service had been effected, because he was not satisfied that there had been sufficient reasonable efforts to effect service.

Kingdon moved, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 17, for leave to proceed as if personal service had been effected. The defendant was an attorney living at Bromley, in Kent, and having his office at No. 5, Bow Street, Covent Garden. He was sued in this action as the acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable at 5, Bow Street, Covent Garden, and it appeared from the affidavit of the process server, that the latter went to the defendant's office in Bow Street for the purpose of serving him with the writ on the 11th of January, 1866, when he saw a clerk there, who told him that the defendant was not in; that the deponent then made an appointment with the clerk for seeing the defendant on the next day, at his office, at three o'clock, which he was told by the clerk was the best time for that purpose; that deponent called accordingly at that time at the said office on the 12th of January, when the same clerk whom he had seen there the previous day told him that the defendant was not then in, but that he had been there that day, and he was expected to be there again in the course of the day; that the deponent then left with such clerk a copy of the writ inclosed in an envelope, addressed to the defendant, and that the deponent called again at the office on the 17th of January, and asked the same clerk, whom he again saw there, if he had given the envelope to the defendant, when the clerk said he had given it to him on the same day it had been left there, viz. the 12th, and that there was no answer. The deponent also stated that he had afterwards seen at the office in Bow Street a person who promised that the defendant should call upon Mr. Comins (the plaintiff's attorney) and enter into some arrangement for settling the action; and the deponent stated that he had made all reasonable efforts to serve the defendant personally with a copy of the said writ, and that for the reasons aforesaid he believed the writ came to the defendant's knowledge on the 12th of January. A similar application, on the same affidavit, had been made to Mr. Justice Byles at chambers, but that learned Judge had declined to make an order, because, in his opinion, no sufficient reasonable efforts had been made to serve the defendant. The learned Judge seemed to consider that there should have been an attempt to serve the defendant at his place of residence, but that would be only putting the plaintiff to great unnecessary expense.

[ERLE, C.J.—Whether reasonable efforts have been made to effect service is a matter which must be decided by the Judge to whom the application for the order to proceed is made. I do not mean to lay down any rule as to what would be sufficient, for that cannot be done, as each case must entirely depend on its own facts.]

In Davies v. Westmacott (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 829; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 150) the Court declined to interfere with the decision of the learned Judge at chambers, because they considered service at a club to be an offensive mode of proceeding.

ERLE, C.J.—We do not wish to lay it down that attempts to effect service must in all cases be made at the place of residence of the party; but it must be always left to the discretion of the Judge before whom the matter comes.

WILLES, J.—I think it would be a bad precedent if we were to interfere with a Judge's decision as to what are reasonable efforts to effect service. I agree that it is not necessary to go to the party's residence where the Judge is satisfied that the place of business is a reasonable place to find such person. In this case there were, however, other circumstances, namely, only two appointments and one call, which might have justified the refusal of the application, although I do not say that it is always requisite there should be these. It also appears that the process server made no statement to the clerk of the purpose for which he wanted the appointment.

KEATING, J. and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

INDERMAUR v. DAMES.

Negligence—Injury to Person on Premises by Invitation.

NEGLIGENCE.—The defendant agreed with one D. for the setting up of some gas-regulators in his sugar-refinery. The contract stipulated they were not to remain unless a certain saving was effected, and that this was to be tested. In order to do this it was necessary to examine the burners, and D.'s manager and the plaintiff, as his servant, went to the sugar-refinery for that purpose. In the refinery there was a shaft for raising and lowering sugar, and necessary, usual and proper for the business; this shaft was unfenced, though when out of use it might have been fenced round. The plaintiff was warned that the place was dangerous and lights not allowed, and that he should keep by a man who would have a light; but having left a tool in a part of the refinery where he had been he went back for it, and in returning to the man with the light fell through the shaft without any fault on his own part:—Held, that where a person resorts to a building in the course of business on the express or implied invitation of the occupier, such person using reasonable care is entitled to expect the occupier to use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger which he knows or ought to know; that where there is evidence of neglect it is a question for the jury; and that in this case there was evidence for the jury that the plaintiff was on the defendant's premises on business by his tacit invitation; that the shaft was an unusual danger known to the defendant, and that damage accrued to the plaintiff from the defendant and his servants not using sufficient means to avert and warn him of it.

This was an action to recover damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The declaration alleged, that the defendant was possessed of a sugar-refinery, containing several floors; that inside it there was a shaft passing through these floors to the basement and dangerous to persons entering the building and unacquainted with it, as the defendant well knew; that the plaintiff was so unacquainted and was employed by the defendant to enter the building and do certain work as a gasfitter, after dark, on one of the upper floors, and that the defendant negligently allowed the said shaft to be open, unfenced, unguarded and unlighted, whereby the plaintiff, whilst so employed, fell down the shaft and received certain injuries.

The defendant pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, a denial of the dangerous character of the shaft; thirdly, a denial of the defendant's knowledge; fourthly, a denial of the employment of the plaintiff.

At the trial, the following facts appeared. The plaintiff was a journeyman gasfitter, in the employment of one Duckham, who was patentee of an improved gas-regulator; and the defendant was a sugar-refiner possessed of the refinery mentioned in the declaration. In June, 1864, one Hargreaves, as agent for Duckham, agreed with the defendant to fit up his refinery with two gas-regulators, and the contract stipulated that if a certain per-centage of gas was not saved Duckham should remove these regulators and restore the fittings at his own expense, and that if this saving was effected the regulators, after test, should be considered purchased at a certain price, and a three years' guarantee of them given. In the same month, Hargreaves, accompanied by the plaintiff and a man and lad also in Duckham's employ, went to the refinery to put up the regulators; but as the plaintiff was not sober the manager of the refinery would not allow him to enter the premises, and the work was done by the other man and the lad. A few days after Hargreaves, accompanied by the plaintiff, went to the refinery to examine the burners and see in what state they were (without which it was impossible to test the regulators), and to test the regulators. Before going, Hargreaves had warned the plaintiff that sugar-refineries were peculiar places, that candles and lucifers were not allowed, and that he should keep close to Hargreaves, who would follow the man who carried the light. A workman of the defendant accompanied Hargreaves and the plaintiff to the first floor, where they examined a burner, and then went round the floor to examine another; but the plaintiff having left one of his tools near this first burner, went back for it; and, in coming back again, instead of going round, walked straight across the floor, and fell through the shaft, which was 4 feet 3 inches square, and fenced only on two sides, and which he could not see in the darkness, there being, according to his evidence, only two burners alight. Such shafts are necessary, usual and proper in all such refineries, and are used for raising and lowering sugar, and sometimes for ventilation. When so in use it is, of course, necessary to have the shaft open; and when not in use it is equally possible to have it entirely fenced; but the plaintiff produced no evidence to shew that it was usual in other refineries to fence the shafts.

At the end of the plaintiff's case it was submitted, on behalf of the plaintiff, that there was no obligation on the plaintiff to fence the shaft; but the learned Judge thought there might be a distinction between the case of a person permanently, and that of one only temporarily employed, and thought that the case should proceed, but reserved the point.

Evidence was then adduced for the defendant, in order to shew that the refinery was constructed similarly to other refineries, that there were several burners alight, and quite sufficient light for the plaintiff to have avoided the accident, with due care. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Huddleston obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why a non-suit should not be entered on the ground that the evidence did not shew any cause of action; or why final judgment should not be stayed, on the ground that the declaration shewed no cause of action; or why there should not be a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The following authorities were cited on moving for the rule: Hounsell v. Smyth (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 203), Seymour v. Maddox (16 Q.B. Rep. 326; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 327) and Wilkinson v. Fairrie (1 H. & C. 633; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73).

Ballantine, Serj. and Raymond (Jan. 25) shewed cause.—The plaintiff was a stranger to the dangerous nature of the premises, and, as he went there upon lawful business with the defendant's knowledge, it was the defendant's duty to have taken care to have so protected the shaft that it should not have caused him an injury. It is different from the case of Hounsell v. Smyth (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 203), where the plaintiff had a mere licence or permission, as one of the public, to cross the waste land of the defendant; and had, moreover, the knowledge or the means of knowing the danger he incurred in doing so, by reason of there being a quarry there. There is an implied duty on persons who have property under their control that it shall not be a dangerous trap to those who are invited to go on the premises or who may be authorized to go there—Barnes v. Ward (9 Com. B. Rep. 392; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 195), and Corby v. Hill (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 556; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 318), within the principle of which cases the present one falls. The case of Seymour v. Maddox (16 Q.B. Rep. 326; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 327), cited on moving the rule, was, whether the alleged duty arose out of the relation of master and servant; and that case is, therefore, clearly distinguishable from the present one. The strongest authority in support of the defendant's rule is that of Wilkinson v. Fairrie (1 H. & C. 633; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73); there, a carman being sent by his employer to the defendant's for some goods, was directed by a servant of the defendant's to go to the counting-house, and, in proceeding along a dark passage of the defendant's premises, in the direction pointed out, he fell down a staircase, and was injured. On these facts appearing, in an action by the carman against the defendant for negligence, Mr. Baron Bramwell nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that either the plaintiff could see, and therefore the accident was the result of his own negligence, or, if he could not see, he ought not to have proceeded without a light; and the Court of Exchequer held the nonsuit to be right. But there is a great distinction between a staircase and a hole such as this shaft was, and this distinction is alluded to in that case: "If it was sufficiently light that he could see," said Mr. Baron Bramwell in that case, "he might have avoided the staircase, which is a very different thing from a hole or trapdoor, down which a man may fall."

[WILLES, J. referred to Farrant v. Barnes (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 553; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 137), and Holmes v. Clarke.¹]

Huddleston and Griffiths (Jan. 27), in support of the rule.—There was no duty on the defendant either arising out of the contract or otherwise to fence this shaft, or to do anything to his premises to make them especially fit for the plaintiff to go over. In fact, there was no permission given to the plaintiff at all to go on the premises, for the defendant had, on the contrary, expressly objected to the plaintiff working there. However, at the utmost, the plaintiff can only be said to have gone there with the defendant's licence. As between the defendant and his own servants, there clearly was no duty to have fenced this shaft: then what obligation was there on the defendant to guard this particular aperture? He had done the utmost that any moral duty could have imposed on him when he had deputed a competent person to go over the premises with the persons who might be sent by Duckham to test the regulators. The plaintiff had no more right to protection than the visitor in Southcote v. Stanley (1 Hurl. & N. 247; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 339) or the plaintiff who was licensed to cross the waste land in Hounsell v. Smyth (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 203). The cases on the subject are all reviewed at length in the judgment of Chief Baron Pigot in Sullivan v. Waters (14 Ir. Com. Law Rep. N.S. 460), where that learned Judge deduces the conclusion, "that a mere licence given by the owner to enter and use premises which the licensee has full opportunity of inspecting, which contained no concealed cause of mischief, and in which any existing source of danger is apparent, creates no such obligation in the owner." The declaration in the present case discloses no cause of action; it alleges no duty and no contract, nor does it shew facts from which any such a duty as would make the defendant liable can be implied. It is not averred that there was any danger on the premises of which the defendant knew the plaintiff did not know or had not the means of knowing. The case of Wilkinson v. Fairrie (1 H. & C. 633; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73) is quite in point. There the carman chose to walk down a dark passage, and did not take that care of himself which it was his duty to do, and so was unable to recover for the injury he had sustained; and here the plaintiff chose not to follow the guide which had been provided, and therefore cannot complain of what happened in consequence.

[WILLES, J.—The case perhaps resembles Toomey v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 146; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 39).]

The case of Hounsell v. Smyth (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 203) has been followed by that of Bolch v. Smith (7 Hurl. & N. 736; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 201), which also shews that a mere licensee cannot maintain an action for insufficient fencing. Either the plaintiff was on the premises with the defendant's permission or not; if he was not, then there is no liability; if he was, then the question arises whether he was there as Duckham's servant simply, or as servant of Duckham in his character of employee of the defendant. In the former case, the plaintiff would only be a licensee, and the case would then fall within that class of cases which apply to licensees; in the latter case, he would be a servant of the defendant, and would fall within Seymour v. Maddox (16 Q.B. Rep. 326; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 327) and Priestly v. Fowler (3 Mee. & W. 1; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 42), and similar cases, and he must bear the risk. There is no difference between this case and Seymour v. Maddox (16 Q.B. Rep. 326; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 327), where a player fell through a trap-door left open in the stage. No doubt a servant should have the means of knowledge; but here the hole was not a trap, but a proper and necessary thing, and the only notice required, therefore, was that "you are embarking on something dangerous, and must look out." As to Farrant v. Barnes (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 553; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 137), there was deceit in that case; and as to Holmes v. Clarke,¹ the fencing of a dangerous machine was worn out, full notice given, and therefore wilful neglect.

[WILLES, J.—And also a breach of a statutory duty.]

There is, no doubt, an obligation on every man to use his land properly with respect to the public, and he must not place a hole near a road; and so, also, he must not leave one in a shop into which he invites the public; and there also may be a statutory liability. But here the liability must arise out of contract, and therefore the question really turns on what the contract was. Now, the contract with Duckham was, that he was to do certain work, and to come and see it afterwards. Assume that to be so, then the duty undertaken by the plaintiff is that he will provide a sugar refinery in the ordinary state for Duckham and his servants to pass through, and no duty arises to give protection beyond the usual means in a sugar refinery. If this hole had been unusually dangerous, it might be that the defendant would be liable; but it was one always left in a refinery. There is also another view of the matter. Assume that there was a duty to point out or guard this hole, it was Hargreaves who got permission; the defendant did not know any one else was coming, and Hargreaves knew the place was dangerous, and, therefore, there could be no duty on the defendant to inform the plaintiff, who happened to come with Hargreaves.

E. R. A. [1866]—VOL. 2

WILLES, J.—This was an action to recover damages for a hurt sustained by the plaintiff by falling down a shaft at the defendant's place of business, through the actionable negligence, as it was alleged, of the defendant and his servants.

At the trial, before the Lord Chief Justice, at the Sittings here after last Michaelmas Term, the plaintiff had a verdict for 400*l.* damages, subject to leave reserved.

A rule was obtained by the defendant last term to enter a nonsuit or to arrest the judgment or for a new trial, because of the verdict being against the evidence.

The rule was argued during last term, before Lord Chief Justice Erle, Mr. Justice Keating, Mr. Justice Montague Smith and myself, when we took time to consider. We are of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged.

It appears that the defendant was a sugar-refiner, at whose place of business there was a shaft, 4 feet 3 inches square and 29 feet 3 inches deep, used for moving sugar. The shaft was necessary, usual and proper in the way of the defendant's business. Whilst it was in use, it was necessary and proper that it should be open and unfenced. When it was not in use, it was sometimes necessary with reference to ventilation that it should be open. It was not necessary that it should, when not in use, be unfenced; and it might then without injury to the business have been fenced by a rail.

Whether it was usual to fence similar shafts when not in use did not distinctly appear, nor is it very material, because such protection was unquestionably proper (in the same sense of reasonable) with reference to the safety of persons having a right to move about upon the floor, where the shaft, in fact, was, because in its nature it formed a pitfall there. At the time of the accident it was not in use, and it was open and unfenced.

The plaintiff was a journeyman gasfitter in the employ of a patentee who had supplied the defendant with his patent gas-regulator, to be paid for upon the terms that it effected a certain saving; and for the purpose of ascertaining whether such saving had been effected, the plaintiff's employer required to test the action of the regulator. He accordingly sent the plaintiff to the defendant's place of business for that purpose; and whilst the plaintiff was engaged upon the floor where the shaft was, he (under circumstances as to which the evidence was conflicting, but accidentally, and, as the jury found, without any fault or negligence on his part) fell down the shaft, and was seriously hurt. It was argued that, as the defendant had objected to the plaintiff's working at the place upon a former occasion, he (the plaintiff) could not be considered as having been in the place with the defendant's leave at the time of the accident; but the evidence did not establish a peremptory or absolute objection to the plaintiff's being employed, so as to make the sending of him, upon the occasion of the accident, any more against the defendant's will than the sending of any other working man; and the employment, and the implied authority resulting therefrom to test the apparatus, were not of a character involving personal preference (dilectus personæ), so as to make it necessary that the patentee should himself attend. It was not suggested that the work was not journeyman's work.

It was also argued that the plaintiff was at the best in the condition of a bare licensee or guest, who, it was urged, is only entitled to use the place as he finds it, and whose complaint may be said to wear the colour of ingratitude, so long as there is no design to injure him—see Hounsell v. Smyth (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 203). We think this argument fails, because the capacity in which the plaintiff was there was that of a person on lawful business, in the course of fulfilling a contract in which both the plaintiff and defendant had an interest, and not upon bare permission. No sound distinction was suggested between the case of the servant and the case of the employer, if the latter had thought proper to go in person; nor between the case of a person engaged in doing the work for the defendant pursuant to his employment and that a person testing the work he had stipulated with the defendant to be paid for, if it stood the test whereby impliedly the workman was taken to be allowed to apply that test, and a reasonable opportunity of doing so. Any duty to enable the workman to do the work in safety seems equally to exist during the accessory employment of testing, and any duty to provide for the safety of the master workman seems equally owing to the servant workman, whom he may lawfully send in his place.

It is observable that in the case of Southcote v. Stanley (1 Hurl. & N. 247; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 339), upon which much reliance was properly placed for the defendant, Mr. Baron Alderson drew the distinction between a bare licensee and a person coming on business, and Mr. Baron Bramwell between active negligence in respect of unusual danger known to the host and not to the guest, and a bare defect of construction or repair which the host was only negligent in not finding out or anticipating the consequence of. There is considerable resemblance, though not a strict analogy, between this class of cases and those founded upon the rule as to voluntary loans and gifts, that there is no remedy against the lender or giver for damage sustained for the loan or gift except in case of unusual danger known to and concealed by the lender or giver—MacCarthy v. Young (6 Hurl. & N. 329; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 227). The case of the carboy of vitriol was one in which this Court held answerable the bailor of an unusually dangerous chattel, the quality of which he knew, but did not tell the bailee, who did not know it, and who as a proximate consequence of his not knowing, and without any fault on his part, suffered damage. The cases referred to as to the liability for accidents to servants and persons employed in other capacities in a business or profession which necessarily and obviously exposes them to danger, as in Seymour v. Maddox (16 Q.B. Rep. 326; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 327), also have their special reasons. The servant or other person so employed is supposed to undertake, not only the ordinary risks of the employment into which he enters, but also all extraordinary risks which he knows of and thinks proper to incur, including those caused by the misconduct of his fellow-servants, not, however, including those which can be traced to mere breach of duty on the part of the master. In the case of a statutory duty to fence, even the knowledge and reluctant submission of the servant who has sustained an injury are held to be only elements in determining whether there has been contributory negligence; how far this is the law between master and servant where there is danger known to the servant and no statute for his protection we need not now consider, because the plaintiff in this case was not a servant of the defendant, but the servant of the patentee. The question was adverted to, but not decided, in Holmes v. Clarke.¹

The authorities respecting guests and other bare licensees, and those respecting servants and others who consent to incur a risk, being therefore inapplicable, we are to consider what is the law as to the duty of the occupier of a building with reference to persons resorting thereto in the course of business upon his invitation, express or implied. The common case is that of a customer in a shop; but it is obvious that this is only one of a class; for whether the customer is actually chaffering at the time, or actually buys or not, he is, according to an undoubted course of authority and practice, entitled to the exercise of reasonable care by the occupier to prevent damage from unusual danger, of which the occupier knows or ought to know, such as a trapdoor left open, unfenced and unlighted—The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (11 Ad. & E. 223; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 258), per Curiam; Chapman v. Rothwell (El. B. & El. 168; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 315), where Southcote v. Stanley (1 Hurl. & N. 247; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 339) was cited, and the Lord Chief Justice, then Mr. Justice Erle, said, "The distinction is between the case of a visitor,—as the plaintiff was in Southcote v. Stanley (1 Hurl. & N. 247; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 339),—who must take care of himself, and a customer who, as one of the public, is invited for the purposes of the business carried on by the defendant." This protection does not depend upon the fact of a contract being entered into in the way of the shopkeeper's business during the stay of the customer, but upon the fact that the customer has come into the shop, in pursuance of a tacit invitation given by the shopkeeper, with a view to business which concerns himself. And if a customer were after buying goods to go back to the shop in order to complain of the quality or that the change was not right, he would be just as much there upon business which concerned the shopkeeper, and as much entitled to protection during this accessory visit, though it might not be for the shopkeeper's benefit, as during the principal visit, which was. And if, instead of going himself, the customer were to send his servant, the servant would be entitled to the same consideration as the master.

The class to which the customer belongs includes persons who go not as mere volunteers, or licensees, or guests, or servants, or persons whose employment is such that danger may be considered as bargained for, but who go upon business which concerns the occupier and upon his invitation, express or implied.

And with respect to such a visitor, at least, we consider it settled law that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger which he knows or ought to know, and that where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken by notice, lighting, guarding or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as matter of fact.

In the case of Wilkinson v. Fairrie (1 H. & C. 633; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 78), relied upon for the defendant, the distinction was pointed out between ordinary accidents, such as falling down stairs, which ought to be imputed to the carelessness or misfortune of the sufferer, and accidents from unusual covert danger, such as that of falling down into a pit.

It was ably insisted for the defendant that he could only be bound to keep his place of business in the same condition as other places of business of the like kind, according to the best known mode of construction. And this argument seems conclusive to prove that there was no absolute duty to prevent danger, but only a duty to make the place as little dangerous as such a place could reasonably be, having regard to the contrivances necessarily used in carrying on the business. But we think the argument is inapplicable to the facts of this case, first, because it was not shewn, and probably could not be, that there was any usage never to fence shafts; secondly, because it was proved that when the shaft was not in use a fence might be resorted to without inconvenience, and no usage could establish that what was in fact unnecessarily dangerous was in law reasonably safe as against persons towards whom there was a duty to be careful.

Having fully considered the notes of the Lord Chief Justice, we think there was evidence for the jury that the plaintiff was in the place by the tacit invitation of the defendant upon business in which he was concerned; that there was by reason of the shaft unusual danger known to the defendant; and that the plaintiff sustained damage by reason of that danger, and of the neglect of the defendant and his servants to use reasonably sufficient means to avert or warn him of it, and we cannot say that the proof of contributory negligence was so clear that we ought on this ground to set aside the verdict of the jury. As for the argument that the plaintiff contributed to the accident by not following his guide, the answer may be that the guide knowing the place ought rather to have waited for him, and this point as matter of fact is set at rest by the verdict. For these reasons, we think there was evidence of a cause of action, in respect of which the jury were properly directed; and as every reservation of leave to enter a nonsuit carries with it an implied condition that the Court may amend, if necessary, in such a manner as to raise the real question, leave ought to be given to the plaintiff, in the event of the defendant desiring to appeal or to bring a writ of error, to amend the declaration by stating the facts as proved in effect, that the defendant was the occupier of and carried on business at the place; that there was a shaft very dangerous to persons in the place, which the defendant knew and the plaintiff did not know; that the plaintiff by invitation and permission of the defendant was there near the shaft upon business of the defendant, in the way of his own craft as a gasfitter for hire, &c., stating the circumstances of the negligence, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was injured.

The details of the amendment can, if necessary, be settled at chambers. As to the motion to arrest the judgment for the reasons already given and upon condition that an amendment is to be made if and when required by the defendant, it will follow the fate of the motion to enter a nonsuit. The other arguments for the defendant to which we have not particularly adverted, were no more than objections to the verdict as being against the evidence; but it would be wrong to grant a new trial without a reasonable expectation that another jury might take a different view of the facts; and so the Lord Chief Justice does not express any dissatisfaction with the verdict, the rule upon this the only remaining ground must also be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Damages—Breach of Promise to Marry—Seduction.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—In estimating the damages for breach of promise of marriage where the defendant has seduced the plaintiff, the jury may take into consideration that the plaintiff's prospect of marrying has become less by reason of such seduction, and the mortification to her feelings in ceasing to be a respected member of her family. The Court will not interfere with the discretion of the jury as to the amount of damages, if they have not acted in error, or from misconception, or from undue motives.

Action for breach of promise of marriage, tried before Erle, C.J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865. Evidence was given of the promise to marry, and that the plaintiff was the daughter of a widow who kept a lace-shop at Notting Hill, and that the defendant was a young gentleman possessed of property worth 700*l.* a year. It appeared also that the plaintiff, who had been living with her mother and assisting her in her business, was persuaded by the defendant to leave her mother's house under such promise of marriage, and was afterwards seduced by him. At the trial, the plaintiff's witnesses were cross-examined by the defendant's counsel as to the plaintiff's conduct with other men before her acquaintance with the defendant: the questions put on such cross-examination imputing want of chastity on her part, and that she had been previously seduced before her introduction to the defendant. No evidence, however, was given for the defendant in support of such imputations.

The learned Judge, in the course of his summing up the case to the jury, told them that, in computing the amount of damages they gave the plaintiff, if they found a verdict for her, they had a right to take into account compensation for the pain to her feelings, and the change in her prospects in life, arising from a proclaimed contract of marriage which had been broken off: "The chances of her situation in life," said the learned Judge, "are very materially damaged if there has been anything like an engagement; very much more materially damaged by the circumstances which have been alluded to here, and which went on proclaimed for some time. Under these circumstances, I think that you are fully entitled to take into your consideration the loss she has sustained, because the position that she had of humble industry has been lost to her. It was a very humble path of life, going out to sell her mother's lace; but allow me to say, it was a happy and respectable home. There was a daughter, supported by a mother, who might have been the comfort of the mother's life. If the daughter comes back a wreck, with an imputation on her, and all the matters that have been suggested here to-day, that home, instead of being a home of family affection, is a home where there is something worse than desolation by the loss of that daughter that has come upon her."

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 2,500*l.* damages.

Huddleston now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the damages were excessive.—The direction of the learned Judge, it is submitted, was calculated to mislead the jury into believing that they might give damages for the desolation which the defendant's conduct had brought on the plaintiff's home. In Toulmin v. Hedley (2 Car. & K. 157), where the Court was of opinion that the direction of the learned Judge who tried the cause, though in terms correct, might still have been misunderstood by the jury, they granted a new trial.—He also contended that the damages were excessive.

WILLES, J.—In this case a rule for a new trial is asked for on two grounds: first, that the Chief Justice misdirected the jury, and, secondly, that the damages are excessive. With respect to the first, I am of opinion that there was no misdirection. In an action for breach of promise of marriage, the jury are not limited in estimating the amount of damages to the pecuniary loss which the plaintiff has suffered; but are bound also to take into their consideration the injured feelings of the plaintiff upon the occasion. This has been frequently acted upon, and it is only necessary for me to refer to the case of Smith v. Woodfine (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 660) as containing all the authorities on the subject. Mr. Huddleston complains that the Chief Justice, in his direction to the jury, pointed out to them the position the plaintiff had occupied as a member of a respectable family, and the desolation which had been brought on her home, and told them that that was a circumstance which they might take into consideration in assessing the amount of damages. If my Lord had directed the jury that they might add, in their calculation of damages, something as a solatium for the inhabitants of the plaintiff's home, whose feelings had been outraged by the defendant's conduct, that would have undoubtedly been a misdirection; but it is clear that my Lord did not intend, and could not have been understood as intending, that the jury should take such course. What the summing-up amounted to is this, that the plaintiff was not merely entitled to damages in respect of the loss she had sustained in not marrying a gentleman of property, but also the loss she had sustained by reason of the seduction, not that they were to give damages in respect of this seduction, but that they might give greater damages for breach of promise of marriage, in that her prospect of afterwards marrying had become less by reason of such seduction. The Chief Justice, no doubt, further intended to point out, that part of the injury the plaintiff had sustained was the fact that in returning to her home she would do so not as a respected member of the family; that therefore the mortification she would feel in not being able to look the other members of her family in the face might be taken into consideration in estimating the amount of damages. No doubt, the rule of damages in respect of a breach of promise of marriage is different from what it is in respect of the breach of an ordinary contract. With respect to the amount, the Court is called on to exercise a nice jurisdiction. In Smith v. Woodfine, in which large damages were also given, it was laid down by this Court that it would not interfere with the discretion of the jury as to the amount unless there has been some obvious error or misconception on the part of the jury, or that they have been actuated by undue motives. I do not think that there has been any error or misconception. Then, have they been actuated by undue motives? The only ground for saying so is that the damages are said to be excessive. We are not called upon to say whether, if acting as jurymen, we might under the circumstances have given a less amount. I think, however, it was a case for considerable damages, and without expressing any opinion as to what the amount should have been, I content myself with saying that it was within the province of the jury to say what was the proper amount, and I cannot impute to them any misconduct or error, and therefore I think we ought not to interfere.

The rest of the Court concurred.

See Whitmore v. Humphries, [1872] E. R. A.; 41 L. J. C.P. 43; L. R. 7 C.P. 1; 25 L. T. 496; 20 W. R. 79 (C.P.).

Landlord and Tenant—Encroachment—Presumption that same was made for the Landlord—Intervention of a Brook.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—Where a tenant has inclosed waste land during his tenancy, the intervention between such inclosed land and the demised premises of a brook or small river which is fordable by cattle during dry weather, is not sufficient to rebut the presumption that the inclosed land should be considered as part of the holding, so as to go to the landlord on the termination of the tenancy.

This was an action of ejectment, brought to recover a field called "Caenewydd," otherwise "Caerhos," in the parish of Caron, in the county of Cardigan, and which was tried, before Shee, J., at the last Summer Cardiganshire Assizes.

The defendant had been for many years tenant to the present and the previous Earls of Lisburne of a farm called Bryneithynog, in the said parish of Caron, and one of the questions at the trial was, whether the field "Caerhos," which consisted of about four acres, and had formerly been waste land within the manor of the Earls of Lisburne, and had been inclosed between thirty and forty years ago, formed now part of the farm Bryneithynog, so as to go to the plaintiff on the expiration of the defendant's tenancy of such farm. The field "Caerhos" had, whilst it was such waste land of the manor, and before being inclosed, been separated from the farm by the farm fence, and also by a brook called Flur Brook, which ran across the end of the field nearest to the farm, in a waving line, so as to leave some small part of the field, but of no value, between the brook and the farm fence. The inclosure was made of that part of the field which was on the side of the brook furthest from the farm. The defendant occupied the field "Caerhos" with the farm, but there was a dispute at the trial whether "Caerhos" had been inclosed by the defendant or by a stranger; but the Court, in drawing inferences as a jury, found as a fact that such inclosure was made by the defendant, and therefore so much of the argument and judgment of the Court as related to this is omitted in this report, and it is to be assumed as proved that the defendant during his tenancy of the farm inclosed the field "Caerhos" and occupied it with his farm. There was no evidence of the width or depth of the Flur Brook, but it appeared carts could never pass over it. The defendant's cattle, however, used to ford it during dry weather, and at other times they went over a bridge which crossed the brook in a neighbour's land, through which, with the permission of such neighbour, they entered "Caerhos," there being no other means of access to it from the farm.

A verdict was given for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, the Court having power to draw inferences of fact.

Pursuant to such leave, a rule nisi was accordingly obtained by T. Allen, for the defendant, to set aside the verdict and to enter it for the defendant on the ground that the evidence shewed that the piece of land so inclosed was not approved for the landlord's estate, and was not part of it. Against such rule, Giffard, H. Allen and I. W. Bowen shewed cause.—Even where an encroachment is made by the tenant on waste land which does not belong to his landlord, if he occupies it with his holding it will be presumed to be part of it, and the mere intervention of a road will not matter—Andrews v. Hailes (2 El. & B. 349; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 409). But where the landlord is also lord of the manor and the waste encroached on is within such manor, the case becomes an a fortiori one; thus, in Andrews v. Hailes (2 El. & B. 349; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 409), Lord Chief Justice Campbell, who repudiates the doctrine of stealing for the benefit of the landlord, but holds that at the end of the demise the tenant cannot dispute the landlord's title to the encroachment more than any part of the land with which it is held, goes on to say, "the strange doctrine as to stealing for the benefit of the landlord originated in those cases where the landlord was lord of the manor and the tenant encroached on the waste. In such cases it might well be presumed that the tenant approved for the benefit of the lord, who had a right to approve." Contiguity is not necessary, but the question is, whether the encroachment was held with the demised premises; this is shewn by the last-mentioned case and by Doe v. Jones (15 Mee. & W. 580; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58) and Kingsmill v. Millard (11 Exch. Rep. 313), in which last case Mr. Baron Parke laid down, that even if subsequently the tenant should convey away, the landlord would not be prejudiced unless he knew of it.

[WILLES, J.—He had previously held, in Doe v. Rees (6 Car. & P. 610), that encroachments were for the benefit of the landlord.]

T. Allen, in support of the rule.—Assuming the inclosure was made by the defendant, the presumption that he inclosed for the landlord is rebutted by the circumstances of the case, which shew that the encroachment was made for his own benefit. In all cases in which the presumption has been raised in favour of the landlord, the contiguity of the land inclosed to the demised premises has been deemed important. In Kingsmill v. Millard (11 Exch. Rep. 313) the land was contiguous to the demised premises, for it was adjacent to the fence of the garden which formed part of the demised premises; therefore it was not necessary for the decision of that case for Mr. Baron Parke to have said, "it is not necessary that the land inclosed should be adjacent to the demised premises; the same rule prevails when the encroachment is at a distance." It is submitted that such dictum is not warranted by any decision. Where the only separation between the encroachment and the demised premises is a road, such road makes no difference to raising the presumption in favour of the encroachment being considered as part of the holding, for a road is beneficial to the enjoyment of the two together. On that ground rest the decisions of Andrews v. Hailes (2 El. & B. 349; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 409) and Doe v. Jones (15 Mee. & W. 580; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 58). "Caerhos," the field in question in this action, cannot be said to be either adjacent or contiguous to the demised farm; the Flur Brook, which intervened between them, was really a river, and there was no way of communication between the farm and the field, except in dry weather, without going on the land of others. To raise the presumption that the encroachment was for the benefit of the landlord, it should be, as it was in Doe v. Rees (6 Car. & P. 610), adjacent to the farm.

[ERLE, C.J.—Webster says, "contiguous" means touching, but that this word is sometimes used in a wider sense, though not with strict propriety, for "adjacent" or "near," without being absolutely in contact, and he says "adjacent" means "lying near."]

The guiding principle must be the intention of the tenant at the time he made the encroachment. The defendant never could have intended that this inclosure should be held with the farm as part of the same holding, when there was no regular access to it from the farm.—[The rest of the argument was to shew that the inclosure was not made by any one employed to do so by the defendant.]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged, and in giving this opinion I perform the duty of a jurymen who has to draw inferences of fact. I take it that the farm occupied by the defendant and the strip of land outside the farm and the field "Caerhos" were all within the manor and lands of Lord Lisburne. I take it also that the encroachment, if inclosed by the defendant, is sufficiently near to his farm, Bryneithynog, to fall within the decisions which have been cited, wherein it is laid down that a tenant inclosing waste land adjacent or contiguous to the farm which he holds, is presumed to inclose for the benefit of his landlord, so that when his tenancy has ended it would go to the landlord as part of the holding. I think the distance here is not enough to found a distinction. A road intervening does not make the distance so great as to rebut such presumption. In the present case there is the intervention of a small river, and much no doubt depends on the nature of the river, for if it had been such a river as the Rhine instead of such a stream as this brook, the presumption would probably have been otherwise. The only doubt I have entertained in this case was, whether the defendant, the tenant of the farm, did in fact inclose this waste land, because if the inclosure was made by a stranger with the intention of making it his own and he sold it to the defendant, I could not have given the judgment I am now giving.—[The learned Judge then explained the reasons why he came to the conclusion, from the evidence, that as a matter of fact the inclosure was made by the defendant.]

WILLES, J.—[After adverting to the question whether the land encroached had been inclosed by the defendant or a stranger, the learned Judge thus proceeded:—]—With respect to the other point, Mr. Allen contends that as the land inclosed is not contiguous in the sense of being conterminous with the farm, the general presumption of law ought not to apply. I agree with him that an encroachment may be at such a distance as that in no sense it can be said to be connected with the occupation of the demised premises. Dealing with it as a presumption of fact rather than of law, it would arise according as it might appear that the encroachment was so near to the demised premises that the tenant had thereby an opportunity of making the encroachment, and next, that the landlord had an opportunity of winking at the tenant making the encroachment. Here there was nothing but the river interposing to remove the land encroached to such a distance as to make that a reason for rebutting the presumption of law. The history of the law upon this subject is curious. The general doctrine appears to be of some antiquity and never to have been questioned, except in the case before Lord Kenyon of Doe d. Colclough v. Mulliner (1 Esp. 460). There Lord Kenyon appears to have thought the doctrine irrational and to have considered that the encroachment made by the tenant ought never to belong to the landlord, because the landlord might thereby be treated as a trespasser. However, in the case of Doe d. Challnor v. Davies (Ibid. 461), which was tried at the same assizes before Baron Thomson, this very question arose, whether the encroachment made by the tenant was for the benefit of the landlord, although the encroachment was not conterminous with the farm occupied by the tenant. The facts of that case were, that after Challnor's farm had been let to the defendant the latter took a patch of land belonging to the common immediately contiguous to the farm, but there was no communication between the farm and the inclosure, though the gate from the inclosure led from the waste. The tenant also made another encroachment on the common by inclosing another piece of land adjoining the first encroachment, but not communicating with the farm. That was therefore a case where the encroachment was not conterminous with the farm which the tenant held. The learned Judge was disposed to have nonsuited the landlord, but on being referred to a case, before Baron Perryn, where it had been admitted that encroachments by tenants were for the benefit of their landlords, and that the same doctrine had been recognized by Mr. Justice Heath and Mr. Justice Buller, he changed his opinion and the plaintiff obtained a verdict. Therefore the doctrine of Lord Wensleydale in Kingsmill v. Millard (11 Exch. Rep. 313) is far from being a modern doctrine. It is not necessary that the land encroached should be conterminous with the demised premises; it is enough if it is so near that the tenant has by reason of such nearness an opportunity of making the encroachment, or the landlord of winking and so acquiescing in its being made.

KEATING, J. concurred.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The only point of law is that which Mr. Allen raised when he contended that the inclosure must be adjacent in the sense of conterminous or communicating with the demised premises. I think the law is not so. Distance may be an element in forming the presumption, but in almost all cases the question must depend not on the relative distance between the demised premises and the inclosure, but upon the circumstances under which the inclosure was made, and in that way only is it material to consider the distance.

charter-party stipulated "the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo less advances, in cash, at current rate of exchange; one-half of the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading; owner to insure the amount and deposit with charterer the policy, and to guarantee the same." M. accordingly gave his acceptance for the half freight, and a receipt on account of such freight as per charter-party was indorsed on the bill of lading, which bill of lading was signed by the captain and afterwards duly indorsed to the plaintiff for value. On the arrival of the ship at Alexandria, M. having in the mean time become insolvent, the master refused to deliver the cargo to the plaintiff unless the whole of the freight was paid or guaranteed, although the acceptance given by M. was not then due. A guaranty was then given by one B. for the plaintiff under protest, and the cargo was delivered, and B. being afterwards compelled to pay the amount of such guaranty on the dishonour of M.'s acceptance, the plaintiff repaid him:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the half freight from the defendant, as during the currency of M.'s acceptance the defendant had no lien for it, and the refusal to deliver the cargo was therefore wrongful.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas on a SPECIAL CASE, stated without pleadings. The case is set out at length in the report below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 268; s. c. 19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 453).

The following summary of the facts is sufficient for the purpose of the question before the Court of Appeal.

On the 1st of October, 1863, Mr. De Mattos, of London, entered into a charter-party with the defendant, by which it was provided that the defendant's ship the Parthenon should proceed to Sunderland and there load a complete cargo, and therewith proceed to Alexandria, and there deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate, &c., "the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances, in cash, at current rate of exchange; one-half of the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading; owner to insure the amount and deposit with charterer the club policy, and to guarantee the same."

In accordance with this charter-party, De Mattos shipped a cargo of coal, and the captain signed a bill of lading, by which the cargo was made deliverable at Alexandria unto order or charterer's assigns. On the bill of lading being signed, De Mattos gave his acceptance at three months for 301l. 17s. 6d., which was half the amount of the freight, in favour of the defendant, and there was indorsed by the defendant's agent on the bill of lading the following, "Received on account of the within freight 301l. 17s. 6d., as per charter-party."

The ship arrived at Alexandria on the 5th of January, 1864, De Mattos having in the mean time become insolvent. The plaintiff, who was an indorsee for value of the bill of lading, informed the captain that he was prepared to pay the balance of the freight due after deducting the 301l. 17s. 6d.; but the captain having learnt that De Mattos had suspended payment, refused to deliver the cargo unless he was paid the full amount of the freight without any deduction, or had a guarantie for the payment of the same, and he claimed a lien on the cargo for the full chartered freight. The acceptance so given by De Mattos did not become due until the 3rd of February, 1864, when it was dishonoured. On the 20th of January, 1864, Messrs. Barker & Co., at the plaintiff's request, gave the guarantie required, in order to procure a delivery of the cargo. The cargo was accordingly delivered to the plaintiff, and upon the dishonour of the acceptance Messrs. Barker were required by the captain to pay the amount of their guarantie, which they did by order of the plaintiff, who, however, protested against the same. The plaintiff having afterwards and before action repaid Barker & Co., the question was, whether he was entitled to recover from the defendant, the shipowner, the amount in dispute, viz., 301l. 17s. 6d., the moiety of the freight. The Court below gave judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

Lewers, for the appellant (the defendant below).—The question is, whether the captain had a right to claim a lien for the whole freight, and that depends on the construction of the charter-party. The Court below held, that the acceptance was given as a payment in advance of the freight; but it is submitted that such a construction cannot be reconciled with the clause in the charter-party respecting the owner's undertaking to insure the amount, for if such acceptance was taken as payment of the freight the owner to that extent would have no insurable interest. The acceptance was intended to be taken, not as a pre-payment but as a loan from the charterer. The case of Kerchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P.C. 361), relied on by the plaintiff in the argument below, only shews that where the shipowner has entered into a stipulation which is inconsistent with his lien he waives his claim for freight; but that is not the case here. Moreover, it is submitted that there was only a suspension of the right of lien by this advance of freight, supposing the acceptance to amount to such advance; and upon the insolvency of De Mattos, which took place when he executed the deed of composition (which deed has been held by a Court of error to be binding), the right of lien was revived. It was the same as if the bill had been dishonoured at maturity, and it therefore ceased to be an advance in respect of freight—In re the London, Birmingham and South Staffordshire Bank (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 418). Next, what, took place at Alexandria when the guarantee was given and paid must affect the amount of damages.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There was before the actual dishonour of the acceptance a demand and refusal to deliver the cargo. We must deal with the facts as they were at that time. The defendant cannot put himself in a better position by reason of his having refused to do what at the time the demand was made he ought to have done.]

Mellish appeared for the respondent (the plaintiff below), but was not heard.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed. The Court below, in an elaborate judgment of my Brother Willes, enters largely into the question as to the rights of the shipowner under the charter-party. I do not think it necessary for me to do more than say this, that it appears to me that the giving of this acceptance was not a loan, but a pre-payment, and so I think the receipt given on the bill of lading treats it. I think that, as the shipowner had put that receipt on the bill of lading and the latter had been transferred to the plaintiff bona fide and for value, the plaintiff was entitled to have a delivery of the cargo to him upon payment of the half freight only. A demand of the delivery of the cargo was made by the plaintiff and refused by the master on behalf of the shipowner, unless payment was made of the whole freight, including therefore that half of the freight which had been dealt with by the freighter and shipowner as paid beforehand. Now, I do not think that any matter which subsequently arose altered the rights of the parties at that time, and that the payment of more than the half freight which was made in order to get the cargo may be recovered back. The case has been stated without pleadings, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider whether the remedy ought to have been in the form of trover or for money had and received. In any case I consider it to be money which has been paid for the delivery of goods to which the plaintiff was entitled without being obliged to make such payment.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion; but I give my judgment on the ground that there was no lien on the cargo in respect of the insolvency of the acceptor of the bill and the probability of the bill being dishonoured. I think the cargo was the property of the plaintiff, and that he was entitled to the delivery of it on payment of half only of the freight.

CHANNELL, B.—I also concur in thinking that there was no lien.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion also that the judgment should be affirmed. I only wish to say that I do not desire to express any opinion whether this bill, which was given by the charterer, was a pre-payment of part of the freight or an advance on account of it. If the ship and cargo had been lost the question would have arisen, but no such question has now arisen, and I am clearly of opinion that upon the construction of this charter-party the freight was to be paid on unloading less advances; and I cannot believe that whilst this bill, which had been accepted for half the freight, was current, it was intended that the shipowner should be paid in cash the whole of the freight. Therefore, so long as such bill was current there would be no lien for the whole freight, and as the ship arrived at Alexandria before the bill became due and was dishonoured, the master had no right to refuse the delivery of the cargo.

THE CITY OF DUBLIN STEAM PACKET COMPANY v. THOMPSON.*

See now Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 77 et seq.; and Merchant Shipping Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 48), s. 54.

Ship and Shipping—Measurement of Tonnage of Steamships—Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. ss. 23, 29.—Validity of Rules.

SHIPPING.—With reference to regulating the mode of ascertaining the register tonnage of steamships, the 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), designated in the margin of the statute "Rule 3," provides that in every ship propelled by steam power an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and that the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship, and states, "such deduction shall be estimated as follows." The section then, under divisions marked (a) and (b), points out how this deduction is to be estimated, and, in doing so, directs, inter alia, that where the tonnage of the space occupied by the boilers and machinery is above 30 per cent. of the gross tonnage, and there is no agreement between the Commissioners of Customs and the owners, the deduction shall consist of the tonnage of the actual space so occupied, with the addition, in case of paddle-wheels, of one-half, and, in case of screws, of three-fourths of the tonnage of such space, "and the measurement and use of such space shall be governed by the following rules,"—which are afterwards set out in that section. The 29th section empowers the Commissioners, with the approval of the Board of Trade, to make such modifications and alterations in the tonnage rules as may become necessary, "in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principles of admeasurement therein adopted":—Held, that the divisions of section 23, marked (a) and (b), form no part of the tonnage rules which section 29. empowers the Commissioners of Customs to alter.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, giving judgment for the plaintiffs upon a special case stated, without pleadings, for the opinion of that Court, and which is fully set out in the report below (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 553; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 316).

* Coram Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Pigott, B. and Lush, J.

The question was as to the validity of certain rules made by the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade. The rules (which are given at length in the report of the case before the Court below) professed to be made in pursuance of the powers granted by the 29th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104): "With a view to the more accurate and uniform application of the principle of granting a certain allowance to steamers for their propelling powers," and to be "in lieu of the rules set forth in section 23. of the Merchant Shipping Act."

The 29th section of that act empowers the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, to make alterations in the tonnage rules prescribed by the act. The 23rd section, fully set forth in the report below, except that in the margin of the statute the section is called "Rule 3," provides for the allowance which, in ascertaining the tonnage of steamships, is to be made for the space occupied by the propelling power and deducted from the gross tonnage, and in the parts of the section marked (a) and (b), it points out how such deduction is to be estimated, and such deduction, in the case of a vessel whose tonnage space solely occupied by boilers and machinery is above 30 per cent. of her gross tonnage (which was the case of the St. Colomba, the plaintiff's steamer), is to consist of the tonnage of the space actually occupied for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, "with the addition, in the case of ships propelled with paddle-wheels, of one-half, and, in the case of ships propelled with screws, of three-fourths of the tonnage of such space, and the measurement and use of such space shall be governed by the following rules." Then follow in that section rules numbered (1), (2), (3), (4) and (5).

By the measurement of the tonnage of the St. Colomba, (which was a paddle-wheel steamer), made under the rules in question of the Commissioners of Customs, no such addition of one-half of the tonnage of the said space to the deduction allowed for the space occupied by the propelling power was made, as required by section 23.

The Solicitor General (Giffard and C. Pollock with him), for the appellant.—The 21st, 22nd and 23rd sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), are all tonnage rules. Section 21 is called in the margin Rule I. and it enacts that the tonnage, previously to the ship being registered, is to "be ascertained by the following rule, hereinafter called Rule I." Section 22, called in the margin Rule II., says that ships which "cannot be measured by the rule above given shall be measured by the following rule, hereinafter called Rule II." Then comes section 23, and that in the margin is called "Rule III." It is submitted that the whole of that section is a tonnage rule, and can therefore be altered by the Commissioners of Customs, with the consent of the Board of Trade, under the authority of the 29th section. What are called rules in that 23rd section are, it is submitted, sub-rules of Rule III., and it is a mistake to suppose, as the Court below considered, that these sub-rules only are the rules to which the power to make the alteration in the tonnage rules given by section 29. is limited.

Bovill (Watkin Williams with him) appeared for the respondents, but was not called on.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all agreed that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas should be affirmed. The substantial question is, whether the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, may make the regulations which they have made. By the 29th section of the act they may, with such approval, "make such modifications and alterations as from time to time become necessary in the tonnage rules hereby prescribed." Speaking for myself, I will observe that when an act is passed which apparently gives, as this does, power to individuals (whether it be with or without the approval of the Board of Trade) to make alterations in what the act has prescribed, we ought to look at the act with care, and endeavour so to ascertain the true sense of the language used in it, that while we give full effect to it we do not enable a private body to make an alteration in the statute which the legislature did not intend should be within such power. Now, on looking at the 23rd section of the act, it obviously consists of three parts, one part being represented by letter (a), and another part by letter (b), and those parts of the section direct the allowance which is to be made for the space occupied by machinery, and the manner in which it is to be made, and then they go on to say—"and the measurement and use of such space shall be governed by the following rules, that is to say," and then numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, are given, and I believe that there is nothing else in the act which can be called tonnage rules. Then section 29 enables the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, to make such alterations as may be necessary in the tonnage rules. We think, therefore, that the portions of section 23. marked with the letters (a) and (b) are not amongst the rules, and that consequently the Commissioners of Customs have made these alterations ultra vires; and we agree with the Court of Common Pleas that the Commissioners had no power to deal with the provisions of section 23. in the way they have done by these rules.

MARTIN, B.—I think the case is clear; and I doubt whether the Commissioners of Customs meant by these rules to make any alteration in the allowances for the space occupied by the machinery. I think, however, that they clearly had only an authority to deal with the rules mentioned in the 23rd section, and not with those portions of that section which are marked (a) and (b), so that they had no power to deprive the owners of vessels of the allowance which is there given. I have little doubt that for large vessels it might be more beneficial for the admeasurement to be made according to these new rules, but for small vessels, such as that of the St. Colomba, they would tell much against them.

CHANNELL, B.—I concur in thinking that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The words at the end of the 29th section give power to the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, to make alterations "in the tonnage rules hereby prescribed, in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principle of admeasurement therein adopted." These latter words, I think, define what power was intended. The legislature says in substance, in (a) and (b) of section 23, that a space shall be allowed for the propelling power, with a percentage in addition thereto. Now I think the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, have power to make regulations for measuring that space, but they have no power to cut off the percentage.

MELLOR, J., PIGOTT, B., and LUSH, J. concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMAS v. WELCH AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. C.P. 200; L. R. 1 C.P. 192; 12 Jur. N.S. 316.

Patent—Complete Specification not noticing all in the Provisional Specification—Limitation of Claim—Disclaimer striking out Claiming Clauses.

PATENT.—The provisional specification of a patent for improvements in apparatus for sewing or stitching stated the improvements to consist, first, in moving the work after each stitch by an instrument acting on the surface of the fabric which the needle enters, and that this instrument, "or another acting therewith," acts to hold the work, &c. The complete specification described the formation of an instrument (marked g in an annexed drawing) for holding and moving the fabric during the operation of making the stitches, and stated that "it is the arranging an instrument g, as herein described, which, whilst it is the means of holding the fabric during the insertion and withdrawal of the needle is also the means by which the step by step movement is given to the fabric for the succession of stitches, which constitutes the peculiarity of my invention":—Held, that an omission in the complete specification of all notice of the other instrument referred to in the provisional specification did not make the specification void, it not appearing that such omission was made fraudulently, or that any one had been misled thereby.

Held, also, that the patentee did not claim every kind of instrument in which the means of holding are also the means of moving the fabric, but only the holding and moving instrument described in the specification, or other like instruments used in the way so described there.

It is no objection to the specification that a disclaimer strikes out all the claiming clauses at the end of the specification, if the rest of the specification sufficiently describes the nature of the invention and the mode of making it.

Action for the infringement of a patent. The declaration alleged the grant to the plaintiff of letters patent for "improvements in apparatus for sewing or stitching." It also alleged the filing of the specification, and of a disclaimer, and the infringement of the patent by the defendants.

Pleas, inter alia, first, not guilty; fourthly, that the invention was not new; seventhly, that the plaintiff did not duly file an instrument particularly describing the nature of the said invention; ninthly, that the disclaimer extends the exclusive right granted by the patent; tenthly, that the invention described in the specification, as altered by the disclaimer, was different from that for which the patent was granted. Issue was taken and joined on these pleas.

It appeared that in the provisional specification it was stated that "the improvements consist, first, in moving the work after each stitch by an instrument acting on that surface of the fabric which the needle enters, to facilitate which movement the face of the instrument which acts upon the fabric is serrated or roughened. This instrument also, or another acting therewith, acts to hold the work during the insertion of the needle, and again during its withdrawal."

One of the objections taken by the defendants was, that the complete specification does not shew what other instrument there was acting with the instrument referred to in the provisional specification.

The complete specification contained a description of a drawing which was annexed to it, and in which the nature of the machinery for sewing or stitching was delineated; and in such description the patentee referred to an instrument indicated in the drawing by the letter g, by which the work was held correctly in position during the insertion and withdrawal of the needle, and the fabric was moved a distance equal to the length of stitch required. How the various movements to this instrument were to be effected were then described, and the patentee stated that he sometimes formed the instrument in two or more parts, as shewn by figure 5 in the drawing; and that, although he preferred that arrangement he did not confine himself thereto, but that he sometimes formed the instrument as shewn by the detached views, figure 6, in which case a roller was the holding means. The arrangement of this instrument was stated in the specification to constitute one of the peculiarities of the invention, but at the end of the specification there were five distinct claims. The plaintiff afterwards filed a disclaimer, which contained in its recital the following statement: "As so much of the invention described in my said specification, which consists in the combined apparatus for acting on that surface of the fabric on which the needle enters, to hold and to move the fabric, has become of great value, I desire to confine my claim of invention to such combined apparatus." By this disclaimer all the claiming clauses at the end of the specification were struck out, and the statement in the specification respecting the arrangement of the combined holding and moving instrument being a peculiarity of the invention, was, when altered by the disclaimer, as follows: "It is the arranging an instrument g, as herein described, which, whilst it is the means of holding the fabric or material during the insertion and withdrawal of the needle, is also the means by which the step by step movement is given to the fabric or material for the succession of stitches, which constitutes the peculiarity of my invention."

At the trial, before Erle, C.J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Trinity Term, 1865, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff for five guineas damages (the further damages to be referred, if necessary), with leave to the defendants to move to set the same aside, and to enter a verdict for them on points reserved. The Court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

A rule nisi to that effect was afterwards obtained by Sir H. Cairns for the defendants, on the grounds inter alia of the want of novelty; that the complete specification differed from the provisional specification; that all the claims being struck out, there was no sufficient description of the nature of the invention, and that the specification did not distinguish between what was new and what was old, and that the claim was too wide, and would apply to all machines which held and moved the fabric.

Grove, Bovill, Hindmarch, Webster, T. Salter and Aston shewed cause.—There is no objection to striking out all the claims, provided the patentee leaves what sufficiently describes his invention, and the means of performing it. With regard to the objection that the final specification differs from the provisional one, the provisional specification says, "This instrument also, or another acting therewith, acts to hold the work," &c. The objection is, that the complete specification only describes one instrument, and contains no reference to any other acting therewith. The patentee was not bound to describe this other instrument. If there be two modes of carrying out an invention, and the inventor afterwards finds out that one of the modes is inefficient, the inventor is not bound to describe this in his complete specification—Newall v. Elliot (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 269; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 337). Oxley v. Holden (8 Ibid. 666; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 68). There is a mode of arranging the instrument which consists of two parts, one of which does in fact answer to the description of another instrument acting therewith. As to the last objection, that the claim is for every instrument which is the means of holding and moving the fabric, that is not so; the claim is limited to the instrument "as herein described"—Barber v. Grace (1 Exch. Rep. 339; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 122). A sufficient description of the nature of the invention claimed is given in the body of the specification. Foxwell v. Bostock (12 W. Rep. 723) is different from this, as there the claim was general and applicable to every sewing-machine with needle and shuttle. The striking out the claiming clauses in the present case has not made the invention different, and therefore the case of Ralston v. Smith (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 471; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 102) is distinguishable.

Manisty, Mellish and Macrory, in support of the rule.—The complete specification differs from the provisional specification, for the other instrument therein alluded to as acting with the instrument which operates on the fabric is nowhere described in the complete specification. Next, which is the main objection, the invention claimed after the claiming clauses had been struck out includes various parts of the sewing-machines which are old. The decision of Lord Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock (12 W. Rep. 723) is in point. The specification should clearly shew what parts of the arrangement of the instrument are new. How far are the generality of the words used limited by the words

“as herein described”? It is submitted that the claim is of a principle common to the three forms of the instrument g. Now, what is the peculiar character of the invention common to the three forms but the combined holding and moving means? It follows, therefore, that every instrument which combines that is included in the claim.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. One of the objections which have been taken is, that the complete specification is void, because it does not take notice of and specify everything that is referred to in the provisional specification. The latter describes an instrument, and says that this instrument, “or another acting therewith,” acts to hold the work during the insertion of the needle. In the complete specification no notice is taken of this alternative,—at least, I will assume, for the present purpose, that there is nothing in the complete specification shewing what other instrument there is to which the provisional specification refers. Now, I think that if there was not any such other instrument this objection ought not to prevail. It may be that the patentee at the time when he prepared the provisional specification had something which he considered a valuable invention in his mind, but which he afterwards, before the time of filing the complete specification, found out to be worth nothing. If it had been in the complete specification he could have cured it by filing a disclaimer; but being only in the provisional specification, I think in such a case as this, where nobody can be prejudiced or misled, the omission of all reference to such other instrument does not render the complete specification void. That is independent of the question whether the complete specification does not shew such other instrument. The main instrument is the movable foot; the solid foot is one form of the instrument and the jointed foot is another; and it may be that the additional part which would be analogous to the heel of the jointed foot is the other instrument referred to, and, if so, the objection would fail in point of fact; but if it does not so fail in fact, I think it fails in point of law. The real questions are, whether the patent is void for want of novelty, and whether there has been an infringement; and these two questions depend upon the construction of the specification. What was the mechanical combination in the mind of the patentee? and what was the purpose to be effected by such combination? This, the substance of the invention, is sometimes to be found in what are called the claims at the end of the specification, but by the disclaimer all the claiming clauses which were in the specification have been struck out. However, in the middle of his specification, the patentee has declared what is the peculiarity of his invention, and which is the substance of his claim, and it is “the arranging an instrument g, as herein described, which, whilst it is the means of holding the fabric, is also the means by which movement is given to the fabric;” and the specification goes on to shew how that material part of his invention is to be effectuated. It is always by an instrument referred to by the letter g, and the letter g refers to three different kinds, one being what I call the solid foot, another being the jointed foot, and the third the roller or ratchet-wheel; but the peculiarity of the invention lies in the movements that are given to the instrument “g”; and I agree with the learned counsel for the defendants that the invention claimed by the patentee goes to all the three kinds of the instrument “g” which I have spoken of, and which, whilst it is the means of holding, is also the means by which movement is given to the fabric. Now, has the patentee claimed every combination of instrument in which the means of holding are also the means by which movement is given to the fabric? I am of opinion that the claim ought not to be so construed. It is the arranging an instrument “as herein described,” and which is exemplified by the machine produced in Court, which is claimed by the patentee.—[The learned Judge then proceeded to explain how the plaintiff’s invention differed from and was an improvement on machines which had been previously used, and how the defendants had infringed the plaintiff’s patent by taking the substance of his invention.]

WILLES, J.—I also think the plaintiff is entitled to keep his verdict. With respect to the point as to the complete specification being at variance with the provisional specification, I consider that to be settled by authority. It is not suggested that the statement either in the provisional specification or in the complete specification was a dishonest statement, or that there was any intention on the part of the patentee but to comply with the conditions upon which the patent was granted; and I apprehend that it was never intended by the legislature to throw a new snare of this kind in the way of the patentee. With respect to the words "as herein described" sufficiently limiting the claim to the one thing alleged, viz., the instrument to hold and to feed in respect of its action upon the fabric, I think the effect of those words is so to confine the claim, for the reasons stated by the Chief Justice, which I cannot add to nor express with the same clearness. I also think that the point with respect to the infringement fails.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to what has been termed the departure of the complete specification from the provisional specification, it seems to me that there is no ground for holding the specification void, and that the words "or another acting therewith," even if they were not adverted to in the complete specification, would not be such a departure or a means of deception as should invalidate the patent. I also quite agree with the Chief Justice in thinking that if it were necessary that allusion should be made in the complete specification to satisfy those words, it probably has been done by means of the second form of the instrument referred to in the complete specification. With reference to the great question argued, no doubt if it could have been shewn that the patentee had claimed the principle, and not the particular means of carrying out that principle, the defendants might have made good their defence. It is not denied that the plaintiff has produced a valuable invention; but it is said that by means of the disclaimer the plaintiff has not confined himself to claiming the valuable improvement which he has made in these machines; but that he has thereby framed his claim so widely that what was effected by previous machines would be affected by his claim. However, for the reasons already given by the Chief Justice and by my Brother Willes, it seems to me that the claim is sufficiently confined to the instrument specified under the letter "g" in the specification; and I have therefore come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The main question has been whether the specification has made too wide a claim. The construction contended for by the defendants is, that the plaintiff claims every method of holding and moving the cloth by the same instrument during the insertion and withdrawal of the needle. I think that is not the construction of the specification; but that it is confined to the holding and moving instrument described, used in the way described, and to other like instruments used in the like way. The whole scheme of the specification as it stands after the disclaimer seems consistent with that view. Therefore, I think it would be hard upon the patentee to say that he had made a general claim of the means by which the holding and moving can be produced. That being the general construction, the evidence is, that the patent has not been anticipated. With regard to the other points, I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has been said by the rest of the Court.

Rule discharged.

Railway Company—Bill of Exchange.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE. COMPANY.—A railway company, incorporated by a special act of parliament containing the usual clauses inserted in such statutes, cannot accept bills of exchange.

The plaintiffs in these actions, as indorsees, sued the defendants, as acceptors, of certain bills of exchange; and the defendants pleaded that they did not accept.

The defendants were a railway company, constituted under the 22 & 23 Vict. c. lxiii. This special act was in the usual form, both as to the powers given to and the restrictions placed on the company, and as to the incorporation of general acts; and there was no difference between the cases, except that in the last case evidence was given of the defendants having actually commenced business.¹

The bills were directed to the Mid-Wales Railway Company, and were accepted in the following form: "Accepted by order of the board of directors, and payable at the Agra & Masterman's Bank, John Wade, Secretary," with the seal of the company affixed under these words. And there was no question but that there was a resolution of the board of directors to the above effect.

At the trial, a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for themselves, on the grounds, first, that the defendants had no power by law to accept the bills, and, secondly, that the acceptances were not binding on them, and that even if bills could be accepted by them, the bills were not accepted in such a form as to be binding on them.

Rules nisi having been obtained, pursuant to such leave, in all three actions: in the first two actions

Edward James and Sir G. Honyman shewed cause.—No such point arises here as arose in the case of Chambers v. the Manchester and Milford Railway Company (5 Best & S. 588, 723; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 268), where the question was, whether what are called Lloyd's bonds were valid or not. But the questions are, first, can a railway company accept bills of exchange? secondly, if they can, is the form of the bills of exchange in the present cases sufficient to bind them? First, then, has a railway company power to accept bills of exchange? It is submitted they have. It may well be that the old kind of corporations, not constituted for trading purposes, may not be able to do so, but that the new kind of trading companies which of later years have sprung up can. The present cases are not like Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), because here the company is constituted

(1) It appears, however, that this was admitted at the trial in the first two actions, and no point was made of it in the argument.

to carry on business. In Story on Bills, s. 79, after saying that corporations, according to the old law, could generally (though there always were some admitted exceptions) contract only under their seal, but that the rule was relaxed as to objects and purposes within their charters, the author goes on: "But the question is more nice as to the right of a corporation to become drawers or indorsers or acceptors of bills of exchange, or to become parties to any other negotiable paper. That an express authority is not indispensable to confer such a right is admitted. It is sufficient if it be implied as an usual and appropriate means to accomplish the objects and purposes of the charter." He then alludes to the 3 & 4 Ann. c. 9, and says, "It implies that by the custom of merchants they may, in some cases at least, draw, indorse, accept or sue upon bills of exchange. But where drawing, indorsing or accepting such bills is obviously foreign to the purposes of the charter or repugnant thereto, there the act becomes a nullity and not binding on the corporation." This is the correct rule as to whether they have power or not. Now here the company have authority to carry goods and passengers, and must buy goods, e. g., coke, rolling stock, &c., in order to carry on their business, and surely they may accept bills of exchange in the usual course for payment for these matters: they surely are not restricted to cash payments. The statute 3 & 4 Ann. c. 9, clearly assumes that a corporation may make a promissory note, for it provides as to notes "made and signed by any . . . body politic or corporate." With respect to authorities, the first case relied on by the other side is Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1). The Judges there relied on two grounds for coming to the conclusion that the defendants could not accept: one was, that there would be a violation of the rights of the Bank of England; the other, that the defendants were not a trading company. The former ground is now untenable, as by alterations in the law there would be no such violation at present; as to the latter ground, it is only necessary to say that it is not for the plaintiffs to contend that the Court were wrong in deciding that the particular company was not a trading company. Here the accepting of bills is not contrary to the objects for which the company was constituted, but just the reverse. In Slark v. the Highgate Archway Company (5 Taunt. 792) all that was decided was, that if the power of issuing bills be given to a company specially for particular purposes, they cannot do so for any other purpose. In The East London Waterworks Company v. Bailey (4 Bing. 283) Lord Chief Justice Best says, "The same principle of necessity applies to corporations created for the purposes of trade, such as the Bank of England. The very object of that institution requires that it should have the power of issuing bills of exchange and promissory notes;" and then, after alluding to Slark v. the Highgate Archway Company (5 Taunt. 792), he says that he was correctly reported to have said, in Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), "When a company like the Bank of England or East India Company is incorporated for the purposes of trade, it seems to result from the very object of their being so incorporated that they should have power to accept bills or issue promissory notes. It would be impossible for either of these companies to go on without accepting bills." And it would appear that before their drawing, &c. bills was regulated by act of parliament, the East India Company had power to do so, for in Murray v. the East India Company (5 B. & Ald. 204) it is said that power was "recognized and regulated by act of parliament."

[BYLES, J.—All the cases where corporations have been decided to be capable of accepting bills seem to resolve themselves into two classes: first, where express power is given; secondly, where the corporation may be said to have been incorporated for the very purpose.]

The importance of a corporation having full liberty to contract for the purposes of trade like other persons, is shewn by the case of Henderson v. the Australian Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company (5 El. & B. 409; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 322), in which Crompton, J. says, "I concur in that important principle suggested in Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), that a modern corporation incorporated for trading purposes may make binding contracts in furtherance of the purposes of their incorporation without using their seal." And in the present case not only were the defendants entitled to, but actually did carry on the trade of carriers, and there seems no reason why they should not, as incidental thereto, have power to accept bills of exchange. Further, if the defendants be right, they even ought to have demurred or ought to move in arrest of judgment. They cannot ask for a verdict on the issue; that must be for the plaintiffs. But secondly, assuming that the defendants have such a power, are the bills of exchange accepted in a binding form? The other side rely on 8 Vict. c. 16. s. 97; but that act merely gives a cumulative power. At common law the company would have been obliged to contract by seal, but the act, in consequence of that being inconvenient, allows, in certain cases, another process to be adopted: this, however, does not interfere with the already existing power.

That section was to prevent companies from improperly raising money by loan notes; and the preamble would seem to recognize the general power, but to say that companies shall not issue notes as a security for money advanced unless by authority of some act of parliament.

Karslake and Holland, in support of the rules.—First, neither in the special act nor general ones is any power given to accept bills; nor was it necessary. Prima facie, a corporation can only contract by deed, i. e., not merely by the corporate seal, but by an actual deed. A seal put on a bill does not make it a deed; and, further, if the matter be ultra vires, the seal does not avail—The South Yorkshire Railway and River Dun Company v. the Great Northern Railway Company (9 Exch. Rep. 84; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 305), per Mr. Baron Parke; Payne v. the Mayor of Brecon (3 Hurl. & N. 579; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 495), per Mr. Baron Martin; Chambers v. the Manchester and Milford Railway Company (5 Best & S. 588, 728; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 268). But even if a corporation have power to bind themselves by simple contract, yet it does not follow that they can bind themselves by a bill; for there is a marked difference between the cases of ordinary simple contracts and negotiable instruments. The crucial test on the question of whether a corporation can enter a particular contract is necessity. Is it necessary for the purposes of the corporation? This is shewn by the following cases—The East London Waterworks Company v. Bailey (4 Bing. 283), Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), Slark v. the Highgate Archway Company (5 Taunt. 792), Murray v. the East India Company (5 B. & Ald. 204), The Mayor of Ludlow v. Charlton (6 Mee. & W. 815; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 75), Dickinson v. Valpy (10 B. & C. 128), Steele v. Harmer (14 Mee. & W. 831; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 217). And the fact that no special power is given to railway companies to make bills and notes is the more marked, because power is given to certain other companies by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 45. But, further, a railway company is not a trading company. There is a distinction between a corporation that may by possibility trade and one formed for trading. Again, carriers were made traders by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122; they were not traders before; and as the Bankrupt Acts apply to persons as distinguished from companies, and as a railway company comes under the Winding-up Acts, they still remain non-traders. "Trading" means selling and buying, as distinguished from merely carrying on a business. This is shewn by the definitions of "trade" and "trader" given in Johnson's Dictionary, in Bailey's Dictionary, and in Richardson's Dictionary. As Mr. Justice Willes said, in Harris v. Amery (1 Law Rep. C.P. 154; s. c. 35 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 89), "'Business' has a more extensive signification than 'trade.'" Secondly, there is no power by the law merchant for a corporation to accept a bill under the common seal, unless special power be given them to do so. The ordinary rule is, that a corporation cannot contract, except by deed; and these bills are not deeds. Assumpsit can be brought on these bills—Halford v. Cameron's Coalbrook, &c. Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 442; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 160). These bills, therefore, are not deeds within the first clause of section 97. of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16; and they are not within the second clause, because they are not signed by two directors. The formalities of the statute must be complied with—The Leominster Canal Company v. the Shrewsbury and Hereford Railway Company (3 Kay & J. 654; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 768), per Vice Chancellor Wood; The Midland Great Western Railway Company v. Johnson (6 H.L. Cas. 819), per Lord Wensleydale; and this although there are no words of nullification, per Lord Campbell, in Halford v. Cameron's Coalbrook, &c. Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 442; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 160). And, lastly, these objections can be taken under the plea of non acceptit—Byles on Bills, p. 62, 8th edit., Hill v. the Manchester and Salford Waterworks Company (5 B. & Ad. 866; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 230).

In the third case,

Borill and Matthew shewed cause.—First, we have here bills of exchange under the seal of the company, and purporting to be issued by order of the directors, and the onus is thrown on the other side to get rid of the liability. There is prima facie nothing to prevent a corporation from accepting a bill of exchange; 3 & 4 Ann. c. 9. assumes that they can. The judgment of Mr. Justice Bayley in Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), if examined carefully, will be found to assume that in certain cases this is so; and the case of Serrell v. the Derbyshire, Staffordshire and Worcestershire Railway Company (9 Com. B. Rep. 811; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 371) shews that they may draw cheques. This, then, being granted, how does a corporation authenticate a contract? Why by seal. Specific modes are, no doubt, given to some companies, but that does not alter the common law power. As, therefore, prima facie the bills are binding, the other side must make out that there is some law which prohibits their issue; the onus is on them to shew they are ultra vires—per Lord Wensleydale, The Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company v. Stewart (3 Macqueen, 415), and per Chief Justice Erle, in Bostock v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (4 El. & B. 819; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 225). How is the contract prohibited? The defendants must shew that under no circumstances can it be necessary for a railway company to give bills, and that the legislature has said, though such a company may enter into contracts, and incur liabilities thereon to pay money thereon, it must use cash payments. Secondly, the statute 8 Vict. c. 16. was an enabling, not a disabling statute—Wilson v. the West Hartlepool Harbour and Railway Company (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 241); and as the intention governs, the seal does not prevent these from being bills—Halford v. Cameron's Coalbrook, &c. Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 442; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 160), Stark v. the Highgate Archway Company (5 Taunt. 792).

Holland, in support of the rule.—The matter has been already so fully argued in the previous cases that it is necessary to say very little now. With respect to the case of Wilson v. the West Hartlepool Harbour and Railway Company (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 241), in the first place, the judgment of Vice Chancellor Wood is opposed to that of one of the Lords Justices; and, further, the case was one where the equitable interference of the Court was prayed to enforce specific performance; again, the judgment in Halford v. Cameron's Coalbrook, &c. Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 442; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 160) shews the requisites of the statutes must be complied with. With respect to what has been said as to the onus lying on the defendants, there is a difference between corporations for specific purposes and the old common law corporations, and in the case of the former the onus lies on the other side to show capability. The contention of the defendants is fully borne out by the remarks of Mr. Justice Crompton in Chambers v. the Manchester and Milford Railway Company (5 Best & S. 588, 723; s. c. 33 Law

J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 268), by Lindley on Partnership, Grant on Corporations, and Byles on Bills.

ERLE, C.J.—These were actions by the indorsees against the acceptors of certain bills of exchange, and the defendants (who were defendants in all the actions) pleaded that they did not accept. It appears that the defendants are a corporation constituted for making a railway by virtue of a special act of parliament and certain general statutes incorporated therewith, a corporation constituted for the distinct purposes stated in these statutes. It has been perfectly established, that a corporation constituted for a specific purpose cannot be bound by a contract which is not connected therewith: such contract does not bind, because it is ultra vires. This company, then, being a corporation constituted for making a railway, can it be bound by a bill of exchange? I am of opinion that it cannot. A bill of exchange is a cause of action in itself, a contract of itself, which binds not only as between the original parties, but also in the hands of the third persons, the indorsees. And I consider that it is altogether contrary to the principles of the law of bills of exchange, that a bill can be valid or not according as the consideration between the original parties was good or bad, or, in the case of a corporation, whether or not it was accepted for the purposes for which the corporation was constituted. The consideration of bills of exchange given at the very same time by a railway company, might be partly for work done on the railway, a valid consideration, and partly for money borrowed in fraud of their borrowing powers, an invalid one, and it would be most pernicious to hold that the bills given for work were valid, and that those given to obtain money, invalid. So much for the principle of the matter. Now, what is the state of the authorities? I can find no case as to the acceptance of a bill of exchange where the bill has been enforced subject to the question of whether the original consideration was valid. The only cases in which it has been held that a corporation could validly accept a bill of exchange are the cases of the Highgate Archway Company, the Bank of England and the East India Company, and in all these cases the corporations were specially authorized to do so. And in Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), Mr. Justice Bayley entertained a doubt whether a holder of such a bill of exchange could sue without the proof lying on him that there was power to accept. What he laid down generally, applies a fortiori where the corporation is formed for specific purposes. This being so, I think, both on principle and authority, the acceptances were not binding on this company, constituted for purposes of which we have judicial notice.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The cases are important, and raise the question of whether it is competent for a railway company to accept a bill of exchange. We have asked for a precedent, and none can be produced. This is a corporation created by statute. But even if it were a common law corporation, there is authority for saying that it could not accept a bill of exchange. There are only three cases in which it has been held that a corporation can do so. First, the Bank of England, created specially for banking purposes; secondly, the East India Company, whose authority is ratified by two statutes; thirdly, the Highgate Archway Company, where express power was given. With these exceptions, there is no authority for saying that a common law corporation can accept a bill of exchange, and there is more difficulty in saying that a statutable one can. In Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1), it is clear that Mr. Justice Bayley thought a corporation could not issue bills of exchange. Even, therefore, if we knew nothing more than that the defendants were a railway company, it is plain they could not accept. But we have judicial cognizance of the constitution of the company by means of the acts of parliament, and we find that it is constituted to make a railway, just as in Broughton v. the Manchester Waterworks Company (3 B. & Ald. 1) the company was constituted to make waterworks. Even if this were not before us, the matter would be plain; but with this constitution of the company before us, it is still plainer. It is said that the present is not the proper method of raising the question, but the persons signing purport to be agents of the defendants, and the plea in effect says that they are not agents; and this, therefore, is a proper mode of raising the question.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary to go into the wider question discussed by my Brother Byles; in this case the question is whether this particular company can accept a bill of exchange. I rest my decision on the act of parliament. It is clear that the legislature has guarded against their powers of raising money, by statutory provisions, as to the sum that may be raised, and although certain general acts are incorporated with the special act, neither in the special act nor the general ones is any power conferred on the company to accept a bill of exchange. One of the general acts refers to the mode of contracting. And if the legislature had intended that the company should have this power, it would be found in some of the acts. It is said that it seems absurd that a railway company, which, as carriers, must buy, &c., must not pay by a bill of exchange. But it is an entirely different thing to say that a company shall be liable to parties who supply goods, and to say that they may be liable on negotiable instruments, which may pass into the hands of third parties, and be void or not, according as the purposes for which they were issued were ultra vires or not. It seems to me the case may be decided on the simple ground that the legislature did not intend to intrust the company with this power. I think that they cannot accept a bill of exchange, and I also think that the objection may be taken in the present form.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs as indorsees sue the defendants as acceptors, so that the action is not between the immediate parties to the bills. I think a railway company is not competent to accept bills of exchange. A railway company is incorporated to make and maintain a railway; its powers and resources are limited by the incorporating statutes; but if they may accept bills of exchange, they either may do so to any extent, or there would have to be an inquiry whether the purposes for which the bills were accepted were within their powers in each particular case. I think the legislature did not intend to give them the power. It is admitted that there is no authority in favour of it; and there is a great abundance of authority to shew that in the analogous cases of mining, water-works, gas, and other companies, the companies cannot draw bills of exchange, though they are more trading companies than a railway company. The first object in the constitution of a railway company is to make a railway, though, it is true, they may and practically always do become carriers. Corporations for the purposes of trade have the power of issuing bills of exchange as incidental to such trading; but this doctrine only applies where the primary object is trade, buying and selling. In addition to the authorities referred to there is the distinct authority of various eminent text-writers that such a company as this cannot accept a bill of exchange. Amongst others, Mr. J. W. Smith, in his treatise on Mercantile Law, says, "However it has been considered that a trading corporation may differ from others, as to its powers of contracting, and its remedies on contracts relating to the purposes for which it was formed. Thus, such a corporation may in some cases bind itself by promissory notes and bills of exchange; and it was even held that the Bank of England might without deed appoint an agent for such purposes. But a corporation will not have these extraordinary powers unless the nature of the business in which it is engaged raises a necessary implication of their existence" (Page 114, 5th edit. by Dowdeswell). Now, clearly, here there is no express power, nor is there any necessary implication. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the defendants were not competent to accept a bill of exchange; and on the other point I also agree with the rest of the Court.

THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, appellants, v.
TAYLOR, respondent.

35 L. J. C.P. 210; 1 H. & R. 471; 14 L. T. 363; 14 W. R. 639.

Referred to, Att.-Gen. v. Manchester Corporation, [1906] E. R. A.; 75 L. J. Ch. 330; [1906] 1 Ch. 643; 54 W. R. 307 (Ch. D.).

Common Carrier—Reasonable Time for Delivery—Negligence of Third Persons—Railway Companies—Running Powers—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 87, 92.

CARRIERS.—In the absence of a contract to deliver at a particular time, the duty of a common carrier is to deliver goods intrusted to him at a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case; and since his first duty is to carry safely, he is justified in incurring delay and delivering after the usual time where delay is necessary to secure the safe carriage.

By virtue of an agreement made under the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and confirmed by a private act, the M. Railway Company exercised running powers over the line of the G. N. Railway Company. Goods intrusted to the G. N. Company were, solely by the negligence of the M. Company, in the exercise of those powers, delayed in the transit and delivered so late as to cause loss to the consignor:—Held, that since the powers of the M. Company were conferred on them by statute for the benefit of the public traffic, the G. N. Company were not responsible for the negligence of the M. Company in the exercise of those powers, and that the G. N. Company having used all reasonable efforts to forward the goods, and having delivered them at a reasonable time, were not answerable to the consignor for the loss occasioned by the delay.

Appeal from the County Court of Boston, the Judge having stated the following

CASE.

This is an action, by the respondent, against the appellants, who are common carriers of goods along their line of railway from Boston to London. The appellants having admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to a certain sum, the only dispute is as to a balance of 4l. 16s. 6d.

On the 1st of June, 1858, the appellants, under the provisions of the 8 Vict. c. 20. s. 87, entered into an agreement with the Midland Railway Company for the use, by the latter company, of that part of the said line of railway lying between Hitchin and London; and since the date of the agreement the Midland Company have always used the said part between Hitchin and London in accordance with the terms thereof.¹

The appellants are in the habit of despatching from Boston every evening a goods train, which, under ordinary circumstances, arrives in London in time for the early markets on the following morning. Meat and poultry sent by this train are understood by the company to be intended and are

(1) This agreement and the 23 Vict. c. lxxvii., which, by section 16, confirmed the agreement, formed part of the case.

The preamble of the act recited, inter alia, that it was expedient that better provision than then existed should be made in London for merchandise and general traffic coming from or destined for the Midland Railway. The preamble of the agreement recited that by means of the London and Hitchin line and the Midland lines a continuous railway communication between London and many parts of the midland and northern districts of England, might be effected with advantage both to the public and to the two companies respectively. By article 53. of the agreement the Midland Company agreed to indemnify the Great Northern Company against all penalties, damages, costs, claims, &c., to be in any way occasioned by reason of any act or default of the Midland Company or their servants in relation to the working by them of the said line. or of their traffic thereon.

usually delivered in time for these markets. The rate for the carriage of perishable articles (including meat and poultry) is and is authorized by the company's act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. lxi., to be higher than the rate for the carriage of non-perishable articles.

On the 30th of August last the respondent, a poulterer in Boston, there delivered to the appellants three hampers of poultry for conveyance from Boston to London, and paid the appellants 13s. 9d., being the ordinary charge for the carriage of poultry from Boston to London.

The appellants were aware that the said poultry was intended for the early London market on the following morning, but no special contract was made for its carriage, unless any such contract can be implied from the circumstances above stated. No time-bill of the times of arrival or departure of the said train has ever been published. The respondent's poultry would have arrived in London at the usual time, so that it could have been delivered in time for the early market but for the occurrence between Hitchin and London of an accident by which both lines of railway were blocked up. The accident was caused by a passenger train belonging to the Midland Company, and then running over the said line of railway between Hitchin and London by virtue of the said agreement, which came into collision with a coal train belonging to the appellants. At the time of the accident the said passenger train was under the charge and control of the servants of the Midland Company solely, and the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the servants of the Midland Company. Immediately after the occurrence of the collision, every possible step was taken to clear the line and restore the traffic, but in spite of every exertion that could be made the line remained blocked up for some hours, and several trains of the appellants, including that conveying the respondent's poultry, were necessarily detained until the line was sufficiently cleared to admit of their proceeding. Upon the clearing of the line, the said goods train was despatched to London, but, solely in consequence of the delay caused by the collision and the time necessarily occupied in clearing the line, arrived in London six hours after the usual time. Upon its arrival, the poultry was delivered in the ordinary course, but, solely in consequence of the late arrival caused in the manner mentioned, was not in time for the early market, and the respondent sustained thereby damage to the amount of 4l. 16s. 6d. Upon this state of facts, it was contended, on behalf of the respondent, that there was an implied contract by the appellants that the poultry should arrive in time for the market. That the appellants being common carriers, and in the nature of insurers, were not excused by the negligence of the Midland Company for the non-fulfilment of the contract. That the appellants were responsible for any negligence of the Midland Company who used the line by their permission. And further, that the facts shewed a breach of contract to carry and deliver within a reasonable time.

For the appellants, it was urged that there was no contract to deliver in time for the early market; and that the delay, caused, as it was, solely by the negligence of the Midland Company, was not unreasonable. I was of opinion that there was no implied contract to deliver in time for the early market, but merely a contract to carry and deliver within a reasonable time; and I held that as the Midland Company used the said railway by the permission of the appellants, the latter were responsible for delay caused by the negligence of the servants of the former company, and therefore that the delivery in this case was not within a reasonable time, and I gave judgment for the respondent for the whole amount claimed.

The question for the opinion of this Court is, whether I was right in holding that the appellants were responsible for delay caused by the negligence of the servants of the Midland Company under the circumstances above stated.

If the Court shall be of opinion that there was an implied contract to deliver in time for the early market, or that the appellants were responsible for the delay arising under the circumstances above stated, the verdict is to stand.

If the Court shall be of opinion that there was no such contract, and that the appellants were not responsible for such delay, the verdict is to be reduced by the sum of 4l. 16s. 6d.

Cave (Mellish with him), for the appellants.

[Hayes, Serj., for the respondent, here admitted that he could not now contend that there was an implied contract on the part of the appellants to deliver in time for the early market, since the county court Judge had found, as a fact, that there was none.]

Then the question is, whether the appellants are responsible for the negligence of the servants of the Midland Company, the appellants having no control over those servants, and having only contracted to deliver within a reasonable time. There is no authority precisely on the point. The delay was caused not by the legitimate exercise of the powers granted to the Midland Company, but by the improper and negligent use of those powers. The delay having occurred by no fault of theirs, the appellants were not bound to do more than use reasonable expedition in forwarding the train, and the case expressly finds that they did everything in their power to clear away the obstruction, and restore the traffic. It has been held, that carriers are not responsible for obstructions caused by the act of God, such as a fall of snow—Briddon v. the Great Northern Railway Company (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 51). A carrier's first duty is to deliver safely, and if a waggon and horses are crossing the line, a driver of a train is justified in incurring delay to avoid a collision. It may be contended on the other side, that the indemnity clause in the agreement between the two companies would enable the appellants to recover from the Midland Company any damages which the respondent may recover from the appellants; but even if that were so, the respondent not being a party to this agreement, cannot, in any way, take advantage of it. He must stand upon his rights at Common Law.

Hayes, Serj. (Thesiger with him), for the respondent.—I am precluded by the finding of the Judge from arguing that there was an implied contract to deliver in time for the early market; but the case finds that there was a contract to deliver within a reasonable time, and that the appellants broke it. What then is a reasonable time? That which allows ample scope for the delivery. The invariable practice was to deliver in time for the market, and the goods were only sent for that purpose. If the appellants were not bound to deliver within that time, they might have kept the goods twelve months. The delay would never have happened if the appellants had not, for the purpose of profit, introduced on to their own line the traffic of the Midland Company, which is more than the line can bear. As the appellants obtain the profits, they must pay the penalty. A common carrier is an insurer, to carry safely and within a reasonable time, and nothing will excuse him but the act of God or the king's enemies—Chitt. Contr. 435, 7th edit., Briddon v. the Great Northern Railway Company (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 51.). The indemnity clause is designed to meet just this case, and if the appellants are not liable, the respondent is without compensation, for he cannot sue the Midland Company.

Cave, in reply.—A carrier is not an insurer of punctual delivery, but only of delivery within a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances. This agreement between the two companies is not merely voluntary, for by section 92. of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. any company or person is entitled to run trains over the appellants' railway on payment of tolls, and section 87, which authorizes the making of such an agreement as the present, merely enables the company to regulate the mode of exercising the running powers.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that our judgment should be for the appellants, and that the decision of the County Court Judge should be reversed. The action was brought against the Great Northern Railway Company for not delivering goods within a reasonable time, and the train which conveyed the goods was delayed between Hitchin and London by reason of a break-down of a train of the Midland Railway Company, which has running powers concurrently with the Great Northern Company over the part of the line between Hitchin and London. The Judge has found rightly, as I think, that the contract was to deliver goods, sent from the north, in London within a reasonable time. I think that the duty which the law imposes upon a common carrier to deliver the goods safely has nothing to do with the time for delivery; the time at which he is to deliver is part of the contract. I think that a carrier using all reasonable diligence to get goods to their destination would fulfil his duty to deliver them within a reasonable time. Now, the County Court Judge has found for the plaintiff against the Great Northern Company, on the ground that the Midland Railway Company having running powers over the Great Northern Company's line, and having broken down and caused a delay, the Great Northern Company were responsible for that delay, because they had permitted the Midland Company to use their line and so were responsible for what was done by the Midland Company. In that, I think, the Judge did not take a correct view of the relations between the Great Northern and the Midland Companies. As to the running powers, the legislature contemplated the exercise of them by the act 23 Vict. c. lxxvii., entitled 'An Act to authorize the Midland Railway Company to construct a station in the parish of St. Pancras, London, to effect arrangements with the Great Northern and certain other companies, and for other purposes.' The agreement which that statute confirms recites in the preamble that it was for the public interest that certain objects should be effected, and it gives the Midland Railway Company the rights in question for purposes of public convenience. It is clear also that the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which is incorporated with that act, when it provided for giving running powers over a railway to strange companies (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 92, and ss. 86-107), contemplated the facilitating of the traffic for public purposes. The Railway and Canal Traffic Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 3) also empowers this Court to issue writs of injunction to restrain railway companies from withholding facilities for forwarding the public traffic. I think that the Midland Railway Company, coming in as they did under the 23 Vict. c. lxxvii., a private act, by direction of parliament to run over the Great Northern Company's line, were exercising a right for which the Great Northern Company have no responsibility of the kind contended for, and if the Midland Company's train broke down, the Great Northern Company would not be responsible if they used all reasonable efforts to get the obstruction out of the way, and every reasonable exertion to get the goods to their destination consistent with the safety of their arrival. This is the view which the County Court Judge took in every respect, except as regards the rights of the Midland Company over the Great Northern Company. He thought the Midland Company were in the position of persons employed by the Great Northern; but I think they were not, as the Midland Company enjoyed the rights they did by virtue of a statutory power.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first duty of a common carrier is safely and securely to carry, and the next to deliver; and it is impossible to deny that this must be within a reasonable time, otherwise he might take twelve months about it. In a written judgment in this Court, Chief Justice Tindal speaks of a common carrier's "duty to deliver within a reasonable time being merely a term grafted by legal implication upon a promise or duty to deliver generally."² But my Brother Hayes seems to have treated the ordinary time for delivery as equivalent to a reasonable time, but I cannot agree with that. A carrier is not bound to deliver within the usual time, but within a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case. I was much struck by the illustration put by Mr. Cave. In approaching a crossing, suppose the servants of the company in charge of a train see a waggon and four horses in the act of crossing the railway. If they wait to allow them to get out of the way they will be behind their ordinary time. Are they to break the first duty of a carrier, namely, to carry safely, and render themselves liable for a collision? Their duty clearly is to be behind their ordinary time. Then in this case, as between the plaintiff and the Great Northern Company, an accident, that is, a thing happening without any power of control by the company? I think that is so, and the relations between the Great Northern and the Midland Companies are shewn by the statute. This case, therefore, is precisely similar to that of the supposed waggon and horses, and I have no doubt that the Great Northern Company are not responsible. It may be that, even if they were responsible to the plaintiff, they still have their remedy over against the Midland Company; but we are not called upon to decide that.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the county court Judge has found that everything was done by the Great Northern Company which ought to have been done when the stoppage occurred to have the obstruction removed within the shortest possible time. But the ground on which the Judge decided is stated in the paragraph where he says he was of opinion that there was merely a contract to carry and deliver within a reasonable time, and he held, that as the Midland Railway Company used the railway by the permission of the appellants, the latter were responsible for delay caused by the negligence of the Midland Company. It is not strictly correct to say that the Midland Company were using the railway by the permission of the Great Northern Company, so as to make the latter responsible for the negligence of the former, because, though it is true that the agreement was that the Midland should exercise the running powers by the permission of the appellants, still it was for the benefit not only of the appellants but also of the public. Though, possibly, it may be said to have been by the permission of the Great Northern Company in one sense, yet this is not so in the sense of making them responsible for the consequences of the negligence of the Midland Company.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt a common carrier is an insurer to the extent that the goods shall be delivered safely and securely, but there is no authority for holding that he insures their arrival at any particular time or according to any usual course of delivery. He is bound to deliver them within a reasonable time, and the usual course of delivery would in most cases be prima facie evidence of what is a reasonable time; but it must depend on all the circumstances of the particular transaction as to what is a reasonable time. His duty is to convey the goods within a reasonable time without unnecessary delay; but it may be necessary, in order safely to deliver, to make a delay or even to deviate, and if the delay or the deviation are necessary for that purpose, then delay or deviation may be incurred, and the delivery of the goods may be retarded without any responsibility being cast on the carrier to make good the loss occasioned by the delay. In Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 725) the Court, in holding a carrier liable for a loss to goods which happened during a deviation from the usual course, used the words "unnecessary deviation," and said, "We cannot but think that the law does imply a duty in the owner of a vessel to proceed without unnecessary deviation in the usual and customary course." But it can never be said that, where a road is so bad that a carrier cannot safely proceed along it, he may not deviate. There is no authority for such a proposition. The circumstances of the case shew that the cause of the delay was one over which the appellants had no control, and it is not necessary to refer more to the acts of parliament. It is as if a common carrier were run into and impeded on his road, and I cannot see that in such a case he would be liable for the delay.

Judgment for the appellants to reduce the verdict.

VALIERI AND ANOTHER v. BOYLAND.

12 Jur. N.S. 566.Shipping—Bill of Lading—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. s. 3.

SHIPPING.—The 3rd section of the "Act to amend the Law relating to Bills of Lading" enacts, that in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for value (without notice), they shall be conclusive evidence against the master or person signing them that the goods were shipped, though, in fact, they were not; "provided that the master, &c. may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by shewing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder or some person under whom the holder claims." The shipper having bought certain bales, his vendor put them on board; a dispute arose between the latter and the mate as to the number shipped; the mate gave a receipt for the larger number, with a note thereon, which by mistake stated that four "over" were in dispute, the master on seeing this note signed a bill of lading for the larger number, with a note, four "more" in dispute, the plaintiff as indorsee of the bill of lading claimed to be entitled to at least this larger number:—Held, that the taking such receipt by the vendor was evidence for the jury of fraud in him, and that the shipper could not separate himself from the effect of his acts.

The declaration alleged a default in the delivery of certain bales of skins, under a bill of lading signed by the defendant and delivered to one Katinakis, who had shipped them on board the defendant's ship, and indorsed the bill of lading to the plaintiff.

The pleas were, denials of, first, the agreement; secondly, the delivery of the bill of lading; thirdly, the indorsement; fourthly, the default; fifthly, the defendant being guilty; sixthly, the plaintiff's property.

The main question at the trial was, whether the bill of lading was conclusive as to the goods being on board, by virtue of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. s. 3, which enacts, that "every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration, representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel, shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods, or some part thereof, may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been, in fact, laden on board: provided, that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by shewing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder or some person under whom the holder claims."

The following facts appeared at the trial: One Katinakis bought a quantity of lamb-skins to be shipped on board the steamship Brenda, of which the defendant was master, at Constantinople for London. What quantity he had so bought did not appear. The vendor, as Katinakis's agent, proceeded to ship a large quantity of bales of skins, and as these were put on board, he and the mate of the ship kept count of them. A dispute arose as to the number marked K which had been shipped; the vendor alleged that sixty-nine had been shipped, the mate only sixty-five; and the mate, in giving his receipt, put down that sixty-nine were shipped with the written remark thereon, "four over in dispute," by mistake for "four less in dispute." A bill of lading was drawn up (by whom it did not clearly appear), which, as far as it is material, was as follows: "Shipped, &c. . . 119 bales skins, being marked and numbered as in the margin. . . .” and in the margin, “K 69; I 18; B 32; 119; K 4 bales more in dispute if on board to be delivered.” This bill of lading was brought to the defendant, who, on comparing it with the mate’s receipt (which was brought with it), signed it. This bill of lading was indorsed to the plaintiff, who duly demanded delivery according to its terms. It then turned out that there were only sixty-five bales marked K; and the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to have at least sixty-nine, and four more if it turned out they were on board.

The learned Judge left it to the jury to say whether sixty-five or sixty-nine had been shipped, and, if sixty-five only, whether there was fraud on the part of the shipper, and no negligence on the part of the captain, in which case the defendant would be entitled to a verdict. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the learned Judge reserved leave to the plaintiff to enter a verdict for 43*l.* 12*s.*, on the ground that there was no evidence of fraud on the part of the shippers, their agents or servants, which ought to have been left to the jury.

Sir G. Honyman now moved pursuant to such leave, and also for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and the verdict being against the evidence.—There was no evidence that these goods were not shipped, and inasmuch as the bill of lading states that they were, it lies on the other side to give evidence that they were not. Again, even if they were not, still there was no evidence of any fraud in the shipper Katinakis; he had bought the goods, and his vendor took them to the ship, and, therefore, even if there were more than a bona fide dispute, and any attempt at fraud by such vendor (of which it is submitted there was not the slightest evidence), yet the shipper was untainted with this; he relied on the mate’s receipt as much as the master of the ship, for checking his vendor, and is damnified by the mistake. The whole matter has originated in the mistake of the mate, which misled the shipper as well as the master.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule in this case, because I think that there was evidence to go to the jury, that the mistake in the bill of lading was caused by the fraud of the shipper. The shipper named in the bill of lading is Katinakis, and he or his agent brought the bales to be shipped, and I think that there was evidence that the person putting them on board was guilty of fraud. The mate said there were only sixty-five, this person said sixty-nine; the mate is induced to sign a receipt which contained a mistake, and there was evidence to go to the jury, that the person putting the bales on board was overreaching the mate,—that he knew there were not so many, and took advantage of the mistake of the mate.

BYLES, J. and KEATING, J. concurred.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Katinakis cannot be separated from the person who actually shipped the bales. There may have been an honest dispute as to the four bales, and if the mate had given a receipt for sixty-five, with a note that four more were in dispute, such receipt might have been honestly taken; but the person who shipped must have known that sixty-nine were not shipped without dispute, and his taking such a receipt imposed on the captain, and was no less a fraud because there was a mistake of the mate. The proviso in the 3rd section of the statute means, that those on board the ship must not be mixed up with the fraud.

Rule refused.

BAKER v. ALEXANDER.

35 L. J. C.P. 217; 12 Jur. N.S. 692.

Assignment of Debt—Set-off—Equitable Defence.

SET-OFF.—The plaintiff and the defendant had transactions in corn, which resulted in a claim by the plaintiff of a large sum; this balance he assigned to F, of which the defendant had notice; the defendant asserted that the balance was in his favour. An action was brought by F. in the name of the plaintiff, which was referred, and an award made in his favour; an action was then brought on the award. It turned out that one of the transactions previous to the assignment was that the defendant, as agent for the plaintiff, purchased a cargo of corn under a contract which provided that any dispute should be referred in a specified way; that the plaintiff had tried to avoid the contract by first asking the defendant to take the corn, then denying the agency, and then disputing the proper state of the cargo; and that the defendant compromised the claim of the vendor by giving two bills of exchange, one of which became payable before the first action, the other long after; but that neither in the account rendered by the defendant, nor in the set-off in the first action, nor in the arbitration, was the claim as to these bills mentioned. In the action on the award the defendant claimed to set off this amount:—Held, that he was entitled to do so.

The first count of the declaration stated that an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant was referred under a Judge's order, and that an award was duly made thereunder, deciding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in the said action 299l. 4s. 9d., and ordering the defendant to pay the said sum on a day which had elapsed before the action; and further, that the costs of the said action had been taxed at 17l. 6s.; which sums the plaintiff claimed from the defendant. The second count was the common count for goods sold and delivered, goods bargained and sold, work and materials, commission, money lent, money paid, money had and received, money due under an award, interest, and money due on accounts stated.

Under a Judge's order the defendant pleaded a set-off to the first count, and to the second count never indebted, with liberty thereunder to raise the equitable question hereinafter mentioned.

The plaintiff was a corn-merchant and the defendant a corn-broker, who had had large transactions in corn together, which at the end of the year 1864 resulted in a claim by the plaintiff of 976l. 15s. 3d. On the 18th of May, 1865, the plaintiff entered into the following arrangement with Messrs. Fowler & Son: "In consideration of the monies I am indebted to you, I hereby transfer to you as agreed the balance that is or may be due to me from Messrs. Alexander & Co. on settlement of accounts between us, and engage to execute a deed of assignment of same when required." The same day the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, "I beg to give you notice that I have transferred to Messrs. Fowler & Son whatever balance is or may be due to me on settlement of accounts between us, and hereby request you to hold said balance at their disposal." And on the 20th of May Messrs. Fowler & Son inclosed a copy of Baker's undertaking in the following letter: "We beg to hand you inclosed letter from Mr. R. Baker, and shall feel obliged by your confirming to us the contents of the same." Messrs. Fowler & Son made applications to the defendant for payment, the defendant rendered an account, claiming a balance of 101l. 9s. 8d. in his own favour, and Messrs. Fowler & Son then, on the 14th of July, 1865, brought in Baker's name the action mentioned in the declaration of the present action. On the 21st of September, 1865, "the cause" was referred under a Judge's order, the costs of the cause to abide the event; and on the 22nd of November, 1865, the award in the declaration mentioned was made.

It appeared that on the 5th of August, 1864, the defendant bought of Messrs. Pim & Co. a cargo of corn under a contract which (as far as it is material) was as follows: "Bought from Messrs. Pim & Co. the cargo of Ibraila Indian corn, of fair average quality when shipped; . . . payment in London in cash, less interest, at Bank rate on arrival of documents. . . . In case of any dispute this contract not to be void, it being agreed by buyers and sellers to leave the same to two London corn-factors mutually chosen, or their umpire, and to be bound by their decision. . . . Alexander & Co." On arrival of the documents Messrs. Pim & Co. asked the defendant to take them up, and he then communicated with the plaintiff, for whom he had bought. The plaintiff then desired the defendant to take the cargo himself or arrange with Pim & Co. to hold the documents till the arrival of the corn. The corn arrived, and Pim & Co. continued to press the defendant to pay. The defendant communicated with the plaintiff, who then asserted that he had not accepted the contract, but that a certain Messrs. Palmer & Co. were principals; and on further pressure denied that the cargo was shipped in good condition, it having certainly arrived damaged. Pim & Co. eventually sold the cargo at a loss of 523*l.*, which they proceeded to recover against the defendant, who compromised the matter for 461*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, which he paid by two acceptances, one for 226*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, payable two months after date, and due the 4th of July, 1865, the other for 235*l.* 1*s.*, payable eight months after date, and due the 4th of January, 1866. Neither in the account rendered, nor in the set-off in the previous action, nor on the arbitration, was this transaction mentioned. But the defendant now claimed to set off in the present action the amount of the said bills which he had paid; the question in the cause was, whether he was entitled to do so. Fowler had continued to make advances to the plaintiff till December, 1865.

At the trial a verdict was found for the defendant, and

Hawkins now moved for a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection and the verdict being against evidence.—First, there was no right of set-off against the present plaintiff, putting the question of Fowler & Co. aside for the present. No doubt, after the verdict of the jury, we must take the defendant to have been the agent of the plaintiff. But still there was a dispute as to the state of the cargo. The contract provides that certain steps are to be taken to settle such dispute; the defendant, as agent, had only authority to take those steps; he had no authority to compromise; and therefore he cannot set off these sums against the plaintiff, his principal. Secondly, even assuming that he had such right as against Baker, he still has no such right as against Fowler & Co., the real plaintiffs in this action. From the very beginning the defendant knew of the assignment to them, yet he never mentions this matter in his account, in his former set-off, or in the arbitration. He cannot lie by in this manner and then try to get rid of the effect of the award, and it is highly inequitable as against Fowler & Co., who, not knowing of this matter, were induced to go on advancing money to the plaintiff. If a person induces another to act on the assumption that a certain state of facts exists, he will not be allowed in equity by a denial of the existence thereof to damnify the person so induced—Williams v. the Earl of Jersey (1 Cr. & Ph. 91; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 149). And in Wilson v. Gabriel (4 Best & S. 243) the Chief Justice says, "I can conceive a state of circumstances in which equity would prevent a party setting off a debt, namely, where by his own act he has placed the assignee in a worse position than he was before, i. e. if he stands by and allows the assignor to assign the debt to him, knowing that there is a set-off. I quite agree that that is inequitable, and it is a rule that he who seeks equity must do equity." But at all events the costs of the action cannot be set-off, as there can be no set-off of costs to the prejudice of the attorney's lien—Practice Rules, Hilary Term, 1853, rule 63, Sympson v. Protheroe (26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 671), and Eisdell v. Conyngham (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 213).

BYLES, J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. The misdirection complained of is, that I did not tell the jury that the defendant was not in a position to avail himself of this set-off. Now, the reference was simply of the cause, and this set-off was secured by two bills of exchange, one of which was not due, and therefore could not be set off in the former action; and the other of which bills, though due, the defendant was not bound to set off, as he might reasonably think he had a sufficient set-off without it. The fact therefore of his not setting this matter off in the former action seems to me to be no objection to his doing so in this action on the award. The question then is, was there ever any right of set-off? If these bills had been given for the exact amount of the claim of the vendors and nothing more were known to us, I should think it clear that there would be a claim against the plaintiff; it is however said, that the defendant has given bills for less, and that he had no authority; but prima facie the plaintiff was liable to pay, and there is nothing to displace this state of things; and I therefore think, first, that there was a right of set-off against the plaintiff; and, secondly, that there is nothing inequitable in the set-off being made in this action.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think that the defendant should be allowed to plead this set-off. The plaintiff says that there was no set-off in law; but clearly there was. It is suggested that, though the plaintiff was prima facie liable, yet there was a dispute, and he was not bound to pay because the liability was not examined into, as provided by the contract. But the contract was to buy a cargo of corn, and though it is suggested that the plaintiff was not satisfied with the cargo, this is qualified by the fact that he wished to throw the contract on to Palmer & Co.; this shews him to be conscious of a liability, and there is ground to suppose that the dispute was an after-thought. The defendant was liable to pay, and he paid what he might have been compelled to pay, and he is therefore entitled to recover what he paid, unless he has precluded himself as respects Fowler & Co. It is suggested that he has, on the equitable ground that on the reference he had the opportunity of setting the matter off and did not do so, and thereby induced Fowler & Co. to think that there was no such set-off. But one bill of exchange could not have been set off, and the other he was not bound to set off. Is, then, his not doing what he was not bound to do such an inducement to Fowler & Co. to act as if there were no further set-off as precludes him now from availing himself of it? I am of opinion that it is not, and that it would be most inequitable to hold so. The proceedings were hostile, and the defendant had a perfect right to say, "Take your proceedings as you like, and I shall defend myself as I think advisable," and, further, to say that he is a stranger to the matter of the additional advances, and may set off now in the present action. I am therefore of opinion, that there is nothing inequitable in the present set-off. A distinction has been taken as to the 17*l.*, because it is said that Fowler & Co., have incurred a liability to their own attorney on the same matter; they, however, are not on the record, and I can see no distinction. It appears to me that in the present case there was clearly a legal set-off against the plaintiff, and that the defendant is not precluded by equitable considerations from availing himself of it, and therefore the learned Judge was right in ruling so.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a good legal set-off, and no ground for saying that a Court of equity would interfere. It has been argued that there is no legal set-off because the payment was without authority. It is true there was no direct authority, but there was ample evidence of implied authority. The foundation of the whole matter is the contract of the defendant on behalf of the plaintiff, which created a liability to pay for the corn on its arrival,—a liability to pay the whole price. A specific cargo was sold, and though an action might be brought for deterioration, yet the defendant was liable to pay the whole price, for it is not pretended that the cargo which arrived was not the cargo which was bought. The plaintiff refuses to take: what is the defendant to do? The vendors re-sell and call on the defendant to pay the difference, for which he is liable unless he can shew the cargo was deteriorated. But on whom does the onus of shewing this lie? Why on the plaintiff, for the cargo is prima facie to be accepted and paid for. The defendant made a compromise, which reduced the amount, and which any jury would find to be the reasonable thing to do; and therefore I think that there was ample evidence of an implied authority from the plaintiff to the defendant to pay the smaller sum. If, then, there is a legal set-off, what is there to indicate that a Court of equity would interfere? I find nothing whatever. If there were a legal set-off before notice, equity would not interfere unless the defendant had done something to lose his right. He has done nothing more than what he had a perfect right to do in his own interests; there was a claim and a counter-claim which overtopped it; the reference was of the action only, and therefore it was not necessary to put in the set-off where there was enough to overtop the claim; and it was to the defendant's interest not to bring the matter forward then, and unnecessarily prejudice it by a discussion. It was further said, that there was no legal debt payable before the assignment; there was, however, a liability, and those who call for the interference of equity must do equity. With respect to the question of the costs, there is no question here of an attorney's lien, and they follow the principal debt.

Rule refused.

Bill of Exchange—Fictitious Payee—Forgery—Acceptance for Honour—Estoppel.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.—A person calling himself P. presented to S. in England a Spanish bill of exchange, professing to be drawn by C, of Lima, on S, payable to order of R. and indorsed by R. & P. S, having stopped payment, sent to the plaintiffs the bills and a letter telling them that no doubt the defendant would intervene for the honour of C, and that with his signature they would perhaps not object to discount the bill; the plaintiffs sent the bill and letter to the defendant, who accepted for honour of C, and on the faith thereof the plaintiffs discounted the bill. The bill turned out to be a forgery on C, who had not drawn the bill, and did not know any such persons as R. & P.:—Held, that as the bill was discounted by the plaintiffs on the faith of the defendant's acceptance, they were entitled to recover against him. And if it had been necessary to decide the point, the Court were inclined to hold that the bill must be considered to have been accepted as a bill payable to bearer.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, as indorsees, against the defendant, as the acceptor for honour, of the bill of exchange hereinafter mentioned. By the consent of the parties and by a rule of Court there was stated for the opinion of the Court, without any pleadings, the following

CASE.

The plaintiffs are discount brokers in London. The defendant is a merchant in London, and is the correspondent and agent there of a firm carrying on business at Lima, under the name of "Canevaro & Co." In the month of June, 1864, a person calling himself 'Enrique Plana,' or 'Henry Plana,' presented to Henry H. Sultzberger, at Liverpool, for acceptance a bill of exchange in the Spanish language, of which the following is a translation:

"No. 771, Lima, 12th of May, 1864.

"For 400l.

"At sixty days' sight please pay by this first of exchange (second and third not being paid), to the order of Mr. Carlos Raffo, the sum of four hundred pounds sterling, value received, which place to account according to advice of "Canevaro & Co.

To Mr. H. H. Sultzberger, Liverpool."

At the time the said bill was so presented to the said H. H. Sultzberger it bore the following indorsements—

"Pay to the order of Mr. Enrique Plana,

"Lima, 12th May, 1864.

"Carlos Raffo,

"Henry Plana."

The said bill of exchange was a forgery on Canevaro & Co., and it may be taken that no persons named Carlos Raffo or Enrique, or Henry, Plana were known at Lima, or to Messrs. Canevaro & Co. A clerk of Canevaro & Co. named Arnaboldi absconded from Lima by the mail-packet which left for England on the night of the 13th of May, 1864. A person named José Moretti, who was not in the employment of Canevaro & Co., left Lima with Arnaboldi. It may be taken for the purposes of this case that Arnaboldi assumed the name of Plana, and that he was the person mentioned above as calling himself "Enrique," or "Henry, Plana." The written parts of the bill are undoubtedly in the handwriting of Arnaboldi, and it may be taken that the indorsement "Henry Plana" was written by him. It does not appear by whom the other indorsement was made, but it may be taken for the purposes of this case to have been made by Arnaboldi, or José Moretti. These facts, however, were not known to the said H. H. Sultzberger at the time the said bill was presented to him for acceptance, nor were they known to the defendant when he accepted the said bill as hereinafter mentioned, or to the plaintiffs. Mr. H. H. Sultzberger having stopped payment declined to accept the said bill, but wrote to the plaintiffs, with whom he was in the habit of dealing, the following letter:

"Liverpool, 21st June, 1864.

"Messrs. B. S. & J. Phillips & Co., 19, Birchin Lane, London. Dear Sirs,—I have this day given your address to Mr. Henry Plana, the holder of two drafts on myself for 400l. and 800l., which I was prevented from accepting in consequence of having lately been under the painful necessity to suspend my payments. Messrs. J. C. im Thurn & Co. will intervene and accept on behalf of the drawers, Messrs. Canevaro & Co., Lima (who themselves are safe for any amount), and as Mr. Plana is quite a stranger here and might have some difficulty to get the bills discounted, I wished to render him some service and therefore gave him your address, thinking that with Messrs. im Thurn's signature you will not object to discount the bills for him.

"I am, dear Sirs, yours truly,

"per H. Henry Sultzberger, Henry Schlatter.

"Mr. Plana tells me that he intends making some purchases, and would be glad to get the notes, if possible, by return of mail."

The bill for 400l. mentioned in this letter is the bill mentioned above.

This letter was accompanied by the following letter from the person calling himself "Plana" to the plaintiffs inclosing the bills referred to:

"Liverpool, June 21, 1864.

"Messrs. B. S. & J. Phillips & Co., 19, Birch Lane, London. Gentlemen,—I am indebted for your address to Mr. Henry Sultzberger of this town, in consequence of which I take the liberty of inclosing you two drafts of Messrs. Canevaro & Co. at Lima, for £400 at 60 days' sight and £800 at 90, on the said Mr. Sultzberger, who tells me that certain reasons prevent him from accepting them; but that Messrs. J. C. im Thurn & Co., London, will accept on behalf of the drawers. I now request you to get these two drafts presented for that purpose to Messrs. J. C. im Thurn & Co., and afterwards to get them discounted for my account as favourably as possible, and remit me the balance in notes, per registered letter, to the address at foot. In the event of your not feeling disposed to discount the bills, I request you to return them to me, provided with the needful. Excusing the trouble, I am, Gentlemen, yours respectfully,

Henry Plana.

"Care of Mr. H. Henry Sultzberger."

Upon receipt of these letters, the plaintiff shewed them, with the bills and the indorsements on them, to the defendant, and inquired whether he would accept for honour of Messrs. Canevaro & Co., and the defendant stated that he would. The plaintiffs afterwards informed Mr. H. H. Sultzberger and the person calling himself Plana that they would discount the said bills upon their being accepted by the defendant. The bills were thereupon duly protested for non-acceptance, and were then presented to the defendant, and were left in his office for acceptance for twenty-four hours in the ordinary course of business, and he accepted the same in the following form:

"Accepted for honour and account of Messrs. Canevaro & Co., with charges 4/-. London, 24th June. J. C. im Thurn & Co."

The plaintiffs thereupon discounted the said bills upon the faith of the acceptance of the defendant, and remitted the proceeds as directed in the letters before set out. Shortly after the plaintiffs had discounted the said bills, the defendant received the information of the facts above stated, and informed the plaintiffs thereof, and upon the bills being presented to the defendant at maturity, he refused to pay the same.

The Court is to be at liberty to draw any inferences from the above facts which a jury might draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, on the above-stated circumstances, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount of the bill from the defendant. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for 400*l.* and interest, with costs; if in the negative, judgment to be entered for the defendant, with costs.

Hannen, for the plaintiffs.—This case was formerly before the Court on a demurrer to a plea, which set up as a defence that the payee was a fictitious person, and which the Court held bad, because the defendant, as acceptor for honour, was in the same position as the drawer (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 694). The plaintiffs, innocent parties, take the bill to the agent of the drawer; he says that he recognizes the writing, and accepts for his honour, and he is therefore equally estopped with the drawer. It is precisely the same as if there were a genuine acceptance by Canevaro. The defendant is estopped from denying the existence of the payee. In Byles on Bills, 8th edit., p. 184, it is said, "By acceptance the drawee admits the signature and capacity of the drawer; . . . he, moreover, admits . . . the then capacity of the payee, to whose order the bill . . . is made payable, to indorsee." In Cooper v. Meyer (10 B. & C. 471; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. K.B. 171) Lord Tenterden says, "If there is, in reality, no such person (as the drawer), I think that the fair construction of the acceptor's undertaking is, that he will pay to the signature of the same person that signed for the drawer"; and that doctrine applies to the present case. Further, the defendant had the bill and the correspondence for some time before he accepted; he had full knowledge of the facts, and time for deliberation; and surely there is an estoppel. As was said by Mr. Justice Wightman in Ashpitel v. Bryan (3 Best & S. 474; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 91), "No doubt, as a fact, the bill was not indorsed by T.P.; and the question is, whether the defendant can be admitted, after what has taken place, to gainsay that which has been done by arrangement between the parties, and which he authorized and agreed to. . . . There are authorities which go to shew that after value received and agreement with the person who has given value and is the holder, that the bill is to be drawn and indorsed in a particular name, the acceptor is not permitted to shew that the name is false or fictitious, and to set up what would be a fraud on the person who has given value." So here, the defendant agreed to guarantee that the bill was what it represented itself to be, and that, as between the plaintiffs and himself, it was to be taken as such; on the faith of this, the plaintiffs advanced their money, and the defendant is therefore estopped from raising this defence. The bill, in effect, must be taken to be a bill payable to bearer, accepted by the defendant.

J. A. Russell for the defendant.—The meaning of the transaction is that the defendant took the existence of Raffo and Plana on the faith of Sultzberger and the plaintiffs, and on the faith of the representations to that effect accepted the bill. The defendant accepted for honour, and it is said that he thereby vouched the signature of the drawer: be that so, he still vouched nothing more; and the result of the facts is, that there has been a mutual mistake. No doubt the defendant is in the position of the drawer, but if the action had been brought against the drawer he could have defended himself on the ground of his not having signed the bill, whereas if the defendant is to be held liable, he has no remedy over and bears the loss without being recouped. But further, there is no authority which lays down that an acceptor "for honour" is able under no circumstances to deny the signature of the drawer, and at all events he is not estopped as to the other signatures. But then the other side say, that the bill must be treated as if drawn payable to bearer, and no doubt rely on Gibson v. Minet (1 H. Black. 569); but in that case the drawer and the acceptor knew all the facts, and as was said by Justice Willes, when it was cited in the case of Ashpitel v. Bryan (5 Best & S. 723; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 328), in the Exchequer Chamber, "In Gibson v. Minet (1 H. Black. 569), in the House of Lords, it was decided that if a bill of exchange be drawn in favour of a fictitious person, and the name of the payee be indorsed on it by the drawer, which fictitious indorsement purports to be to the drawer or his order, and the acceptor at the time of accepting the bill knew these facts, he shall not take advantage of his own wrong, and a bona fide holder may recover against him." A general acceptor might have denied the indorsements and the circumstances—Beeman v. Duck (11 Mee. & W. 251; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 198). The cases on estoppel divide themselves into two classes, first, where a direct representation has been made; and, secondly, where the parties have agreed that a certain state of facts shall be assumed, both knowing all the circumstances; but here there was a mutual mistake and the case falls within neither category.

Hannen, in reply.—It is said that there was a mutual mistake, but the question is, who took the first step; here the plaintiffs on the faith of the defendant's acceptance advanced their money. Again, the defendant is in the position in which Canevaro would have been if he really had drawn the bill, and he would have started the bill with a payee he knew to be fictitious; this would have constituted an engagement to pay to the order of the person who in fact signed, and the bill in effect would be a bill payable to bearer. Further, where one man induces another to alter his position on the representation of certain facts existing, the former is estopped from denying their existence—Freeman v. Cooke (2 Exch. Rep. 654; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 114).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. If it were necessary, I should be inclined to decide on the facts that this should be treated as a bill payable to bearer. The acceptor here cannot dispute the writing of Canevaro, and as there is no such person as Raffo, I should be inclined to hold that the defendant must be taken to be in the position of Canevaro, and he would have been held to be the acceptor of a bill payable to bearer according to the cases. I, however, rest my judgment on another ground. The bill in question was sent to the defendant, together with a letter written by Sultzberger to the plaintiffs, in which he expressed a hope that, with the defendant's signature as acceptor on behalf of the drawer, they would discount the bill; the defendant did so accept, and the plaintiffs discounted on the faith thereof. It is clear that the plaintiffs were induced by the defendant to advance their money on the faith of his guaranteeing that the bill was a properly indorsed instrument, and this being so, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in the present action.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Suppose the defendant had said, these signatures are so genuine that I will accept and guarantee the payment of the bill. If he had said so in words he clearly could not set up his present defence, and I think that what took place amounted to the same; and if it were necessary to consider the point, I should agree with the rest of the Court that, as Raffo was not in existence, and Canevaro, if he had drawn the bill, would have known it, the bill is therefore payable to bearer.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The facts are strong to shew that the defendant cannot contest the plaintiffs' right to recover. He knew that the plaintiffs were only prepared to give their money on the faith of his representations, and surely his acceptance was a representation which enabled Plana to obtain the money. The case is not only within the rule established in Pickard v. Sears (6 Ad. & E. 475), that if a man, by his words or acts, causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act in that belief, so as to alter his own previous condition, the former is estopped from denying the existence of such a state of things; but also within the principle that where one of two innocent parties is to suffer, the one who enabled the perpetration of the fraud is to sustain the loss. Here the defendant, by his acts and representations, has enabled Plana to obtain the plaintiffs' money, and he, therefore, must bear the loss. With respect to the other point, I also quite agree with the rest of the Court.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am disposed to agree, on the ground that it is here established that by the defendant's acceptance, and on the faith thereof, the plaintiffs were induced to part with their money. I am also of opinion that the bill is to be taken to be one payment to bearer. The defendant, by accepting for honour, admitted that the drawer had put his name to a bill which he had drawn and which was negotiable; and, as it turns out that Raffo, to whose order it is payable, is a fictitious person, then, under the circumstances, Canevaro must be taken to have drawn a bill payable to bearer.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Statute of Frauds—Goods Bargained and Sold—Memorandum in Writing.

SALE OF GOODS.—The plaintiff sent to the defendant, with certain cheese and candles, an invoice, specifying the names of the plaintiff and the defendant as seller and buyer respectively, the quantity of the goods and their price. The defendant returned the invoice with a signed memorandum on the back, saying that the cheese had arrived badly crushed, and therefore both the cheese and candles were returned:—Held, that this was a sufficient memorandum in writing of the bargain within the Statute of Frauds.

This was an action to recover the price of certain cheeses, tried before the Under Sheriff of Chester, under a writ of inquiry.

The defendant had given the plaintiff a verbal order for certain cheeses and candles. These articles were sent by railway to the defendant, with an invoice which contained, in the usual way, the names of the buyer and seller, the quantity of cheeses and candles, the price of the cheeses, 7l. 1s. 3d., and the price of the candles, 5l. 13s. 9d. The defendant returned the invoice to the plaintiff, with the following memorandum written on the back: "The cheeses came to-day, but I did not take them in, for they were very badly crushed; so the candles and cheese are returned. You seem to think that I complain without cause, so now you will be able to see them as they are. I was glad to find that it was the first complaint that you have had from seven counties. I hope it will be the last. I am sure it will be the (quære last) for me. Yours truly, T. Evans." An attorney's letter was sent to the defendant, who replied as follows: "Sir,—Yours this morning to hand, in which you requested payment for cheese. I have to inform you that I have nothing at all to do with it. The cheese and candles were in a very bad condition, and the candles he consented to take back. So if the company signed for the cheese in good condition, it is very likely they will allow the damage without suing them; but I do not think they would sign for those in good condition as they seemed to have very old crushes; some of the openings were quite green. As for you to sue the company in my name, you may do so if you think proper, but you must bear in mind that I will not bear anything towards the cost, and if summoned for witness, I must have my expenses paid. Had they been sent per canal, as I ordered them, they would not have been damaged, that is, if they would receive them in good condition. I suspect that he has the cheese in his warehouse, for I never received any notice from the company. Yours truly, T. Evans."

The candles were received back, and the action brought for the price of the cheese.

The Under Sheriff nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that there was no sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds.

A rule was obtained calling on the defendant to shew cause why a verdict should not be entered for 7l. 1s. 3d., or why there should not be a new trial.

M'Intyre shewed cause.—The question is, whether there is a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds, and the cases of Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 150) and Jackson

v. Lowe (1 Bing. 9) will, no doubt, be relied on. But what is required is a memorandum of the bargain; now, in Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 150), the letter written by the defendant acknowledging the bargain and its terms, and in Jackson v. Lowe (1 Bing. 9), the same was the case, whereas, in the present case, there is nothing of the kind. For in the first place, the letter on the back of the invoice rejects the cheeses on the ground of their being crushed, and there is nothing to shew that there was not a condition, not expressed in the memorandum, that the cheeses were to be in good condition, and be returnable if not; and in the second place, the price being merely in an invoice, we have in writing the price charged, but not necessarily the price agreed on; for instance, suppose goods ordered without the price being fixed, so that the price ought to be the proper or reasonable price, that the goods are sent with an invoice charging an exorbitant price, and the goods are returned for another valid reason indorsed on the invoice, surely the buyer would not be estopped from disputing the propriety of the price; and if this be so, the memorandum does not contain the price which is to bind, but merely the price charged. The present case is like Richards v. Porter (6 B. & C. 437), where an invoice was sent and the defendant wrote back, saying the hops he had bought had not arrived, but the invoice had; that case is on all-fours with the present, and it was there held that there was not a sufficient memorandum. Again, in Cooper v. Smith (15 East, 103), a letter recognizing the bargain, but saying the goods were not delivered in time, was held insufficient. So, again, in Smith v. Surman (9 B. & C. 561), where in answer to a letter of the plaintiff, the defendant wrote back saying he had bought certain timber, but that he had bought it to be sound and it was not so, it was held there was not a sufficient memorandum; so here, the defendant says in effect, the cheese ought to be sound, and it is not. And in Archer v. Baynes (5 Exch. Rep. 625; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 54) where the correspondence of the parties clearly acknowledged that the goods were bought, and the dispute was merely whether they were equal to sample, it was held that there was no sufficient memorandum within the statute.

Morgan Lloyd, in support of the rule.—The invoice contains the terms of the contract, and if the defendant had put his simple signature at the bottom the case would have been beyond argument. The fact of the signature being on the back can make no difference; this would hold even if there were a simple signature, but there is more, for the letter says, "the cheese," clearly referring to that which is on the other side. Further, the words of the letter are the same as those used in Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 150), and the cases therefore are identical.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute for a new trial. As must always be the case where the parties meet and contract there was a contract by word of mouth; the contract was simply an order for goods and a contract of sale, and nothing more; and the question now is, whether there is a sufficient memorandum in writing of this contract to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The invoice is in the usual form; it designates the buyer, the seller, the articles bought and their price, and on the back of the invoice is the following letter, signed by the defendant.—[His Lordship read the memorandum.]—I think that this is good evidence that the contract in the invoice contains all the stipulations, and that the objection in the letter is not as to the non-fulfilment of some term of the contract not contained in the invoice, but as to something which happened during the carriage of the goods. This view is confirmed by the letter of the defendant to the plaintiff's attorney, in which he says, "had they been sent per canal, as I ordered them, they would not have been damaged." The letters clearly recognized a contract at the price stated in the invoice. I think that the present case falls within the case of Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 150). There the defendant agreed to buy specific looking-glasses at a specific price; the glasses were damaged during the carriage, and he wrote, "The only parcel of goods selected for ready-money was the chimney-glasses, amounting to 38l. 10s. 6d., which goods I have never received, and have long since declined to have, for reasons made known to you." The only difference here is that specific goods were not ordered, but the plaintiff was ordered merely to send his cheeses and candles; as, however, no dispute arises on this it makes no difference. With respect to the cases which have been cited on behalf of the defendant, it will be found that in all of them the letter stated that there was a verbal contract, one term of which was not in writing. Thus, both in Richards v. Porter (6 B. & C. 437), and Cooper v. Smith (15 East, 103), the letters complain of the goods not being in time, and the defendants there said, there is another term which has not been fulfilled, so that there was clearly a term of the contract in dispute; and in both these cases there were two writings of two different contracts. So, again, in Smith v. Surman (9 B. & C. 561), the defendant alleged that there was another term in the contract, viz., that the trees should be sound and good; and in Archer v. Baynes (5 Exch. Rep. 625; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 54) that the flour ought to have been according to sample. So that in all these cases a necessity arose for oral testimony to determine the dispute. In order to satisfy the statute, there must be a writing which shews all the terms of the contract, and I think that this case is within Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 150), and that there is such a memorandum, and that the cases which have been cited on behalf of the defendant were all cases where all the terms were not so expressed, but it was a matter of dispute as to whether a particular term was part of the contract or not.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think there ought to be a new trial. If at the bottom of the invoice the defendant had written, "I have bought the above goods at the above price," and appended his signature, there would not be a doubt that there would have been a proper memorandum, and the usual implied conditions that the goods should be merchantable and in proper condition would attach. The only doubt I had was, whether what was written on the back of the invoice was sufficiently identified and connected with what was written on its face. But the words are, "the cheeses," "the candles"; this I think sufficiently refers to the cheeses and candles on the other side; and the case, therefore, in my opinion, falls within Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 150).

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that it is necessary that all the terms of the contract should be in writing; but I cannot doubt that the document here does afford evidence of the complete contract. There is a contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and there is no sound suggestion of a term being wanting.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant's letter refers to the invoice, and recognizes its terms, and the case therefore falls within Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 150). The defendant's letter does not alter or vary the terms expressed in the invoice. No doubt there are implied conditions that the goods shall be of a merchantable quality and in proper condition, but there is no complaint that the contract has been broken by non-compliance with such implied conditions. In Cooper v. Smith (15 East, 103) the letter which was relied on to bind the defendant, negatived the terms of the contract alleged by the plaintiff. The other cases cited for the defendant in the present case are also distinguishable in the way pointed out by my Lord; and I am of opinion that there should be a new trial.

Rule for a new trial.

VISCOUNT KYNNAIRD v. LESLIE.

35 L. J. C.P. 226; L. R. 1 C.P. 389; 14 L. T. 756; 14 W. R. 761.

Pedigree—Descendants of Children of a Person attainted before his Marriage.

ESTATE.—The descendants of one child of an attainted person may trace a heritable descent to the descendants of another child of such attainted person, even though the marriage, of which such children were the issue, took place abroad after the attainder.

This was an action of ejectment to recover a farm, called Amble Hope Farm, in the county of Northumberland, and thereby try the question, whether the plaintiff was entitled to large estates in the possession of the defendant.

The facts of the case (as far as they are material) were as follows: In the year 1716, Charles Ratcliffe, eldest surviving son of Edward Earl of Derwentwater, was convicted of high treason. After his conviction he escaped from England, and in the year 1724 married abroad, at Brussels, Charlotte Maria Countess of Newburgh, by whom he had five children, James Bartholomew, Mary, and three others to whom it is unnecessary to allude further, as they died unmarried, without issue. James Bartholomew married, and had a son, Anthony James, and a daughter who died unmarried. In the year 1799 His Majesty King George the Third granted to Anthony James, then Earl of Newburgh, and his heirs, certain estates in Northumberland, including the land referred to in the present action. Anthony James being seised of the said estates and also of estates in Gloucestershire and Sussex, died without issue, in the year 1814, leaving a will, and also a widow, Anne, him surviving. By this will he devised his estates in Northumberland, subject to various limitations, which all failed, to his own right heirs; and this will also contained a residuary clause, as to which (in consequence of the ultimate decision of the Court) it is only necessary to state that under it the said Anne, who died in the year 1861, claimed to have power to, and did devise the Northumberland estates to the plaintiff, whose claim rested on the two propositions: first, that there were no right heirs of the devisee, Anthony James; and, secondly, that in default thereof the residuary clause passed the estates in question to Anne, who devised to him.

The defendant held possession under the following title: He claimed that his wife, Dorothea Eyre, who died without issue in the year 1853, was, at the time of her will and death, right heir to Anthony James, and that he was entitled as her devisee. And the way in which he traced the heirship of his wife was this: he clearly traced the pedigree, by the proper exhaustion of stock, from Anthony James up to James Bartholomew, then to Mary, sister of James Bartholomew, and then down from the said Mary to his deceased wife Dorothea, who, claiming to be entitled as heir, had devised her interest to the defendant. And the question in dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant in respect of this tracing of pedigree was, whether it was necessary, in order to trace from James Bartholomew to Mary, to trace through their father Charles, in which case the corruption of his blood would be an impediment, or whether it was allowable to trace from James Bartholomew direct to Mary his sister, in which case no such impediment would exist.

At the trial a verdict was, by consent, taken for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for himself, on the ground that no person could take the estate in question who claimed as heir to Anthony James Earl of Newburgh, being in lineal descent from Charles Ratcliffe, who had been attainted, and that Anthony James having, for the above reason, no heir who could take the estate, the estate passed under the residuary clause in his will.

A rule nisi having been obtained, pursuant to such leave,—

The Attorney General (Sir R. Palmer) (Manisty, Charles Hall of the Chancery bar, and Quain with him) shewed cause.—Where a descent must be traced through an attainted person, the tracing is prevented, and there is an escheat; but then the tracing must be through him; that is, he must be mentioned for the purpose of tracing, and not merely as to blood. The law never went further than this. The blood of an innocent child is just as pure as if his father had not been attainted; if it be necessary, in order to trace to him, to trace through his father, the tracing is stopped, but if it be not, then he and his issue are unaffected by the attainder. So, in what is called a collateral descent, the tracing may proceed up to whoever is pure; and, if it be not necessary for the tracing to go up higher, an attainer higher up in the pedigree is of no effect. And the defendant contends, that in tracing the pedigree by which he claims to be entitled, he is not affected by the attainder of Charles; because, having traced up to one of this person's innocent children, he need not trace higher up, but may pass immediately to the other innocent child, on the ground that by law one brother or sister is immediate heir to the other; and the fact that the children in the present case were born after the attainder makes no difference. It is true, in Co. Litt. 8 a, it is said, "But some have holden, that if a man after he be attainted of treason or felony have issue two sonnes, that the one of them cannot be heire to the other, because they could not be heire to the father, for that they never had any heritable blood in them." This, however, is merely mentioned, and evidently not intended to be indorsed by Sir E. Coke, and Mr. Hargrave disapproves of it, and points out that it rests on a proposition which was decided in Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448) to be erroneous. Again, in Hobby's case (of which the argument is reported in Noy's Reports, 158, under the title of The King v. Boreston and Adams, and the decision in 4 Leonard, 5, and Palmer, 19), this point was not even suggested by Stephens, who argued for the escheat; nor was the point dealt with by Fleming, the Queen's solicitor, on the other side. No mention of such a distinction is made in the account of the judgment given in Leonard; and though in that given in Palmer two reasons are given, one of which is, that the children were born before the attainder, still this point was not necessary for the decision; and if it had been intended as a decision, it would have been unnecessary to decide the second point. And in 3 Cruise's Digest, 325, the learned author, having quoted the above passage from Co. Litt., says, "It is, however, now settled that the descent between brothers is immediate; therefore that the attainer of the father does not prevent his sons from inheriting from each other; for though the father is medium differens sanguinis, yet he is not medium differens hereditatis." In Collingwood v. Pace (of which an elaborate history will be found in 1 Siderfin, 193, and of which the judgment will be found in 1 Ventris, 413), it was decided that the sons of an alien could inherit inter se; and in Siderfin (pp. 200, 201), it is said, "Mes attainer de un lineal auncester ne impeder collateral discent come l'attainder del pier ne hinder le discent inter freres, et pur ceo le pier nest le meane per que discent inter freres est derive ou pluis pier nest que medium deferens sanguinis et le frere est medium deferens hereditat." In Ventris Lord Chief Baron Hale, after (p. 416) pointing out that descents are of two kinds, lineal and collateral, and that each of these again may be immediate or mediate, goes on to discuss collateral descents (p. 416), and says, "A. & B. brothers; A. is an alien or attainted, and hath C. a denizen born; B. purchaseth lands, and dies without issue; C. shall not inherit, for A. (which was the medius ancestor or medium differens of this descent) was incapable. . . A. and B. brothers; A. is an alien or person attainted, and hath issue C. and dies, and C. purchaseth lands, and dies without issue; B, his uncle, shall not inherit, for the reason before going, for A. is the medius ancestor which was disabled. This was Courtney's case. . . but in any descents the impediment of an ancestor that is not medius ancestor between the persons from whom and to whom will not impede the descent. The grandfather and grandmother, both aliens or attaind of treason, have issue, the father a denizen, who hath issue the son a denizen; the son shall be heir to the father, notwithstanding the disability of the grandfather (for they are not medii antecessores between the father and the son, but paramount), and yet all the blood the father hath he derived from his disabled parents. And this observation states, in effect, the case. For if the descent between brothers be an immediate descent, and the father be not medius antecessor between them, then the disability in Robert the father will not impede the descent from John the Earl to George his brother, or to John his brother's son. But if it be a mediate descent, and the father be a medius antecessor between them, then the disability in Robert the father may and must in this case impeach the descent." He then (p. 422) alludes to the statement found in Sir E. Coke, that the sons of an alien cannot inherit inter se as being bad law, and says (p. 423), "The reasons that satisfy are these three, in order as they are propounded. My first reason is, because the descent from brother to brother, though it be a collateral descent, yet it is an immediate descent, and consequently upon what has been premised at first, unless we can find a disability or impediment in them, no impediment in another ancestor will hinder the descent between them,"—a reason which he supports on the grounds that, in pleading, brother derives from brother without mentioning the ancestor, that brother to brother makes one degree, and that in the descent from brother to brother the half-blood does not inherit. He then goes on, (p. 425), "My second principal reason is to prove that the disability of the father doth not at all hinder the descent between the brothers immediate is this: If the father, in case of a descent between brothers, were such an ancestor as the law looks upon as the medium that derives the one descent from the other, then the attainder of the father would hinder the descent between brothers. But the attainder of the father doth not hinder the descent between brothers. Therefore the father is not such a medium or nexus as is looked upon by the law as the medium deferens, or means deriving such descent between the two brothers." He then shews how this is supported by Grave's case (10 Eliz. Dyer, 274), Courtney's case (Cro. Car. 241), and Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19), and in discussing Courtney's case (Cro. Car. 241) actually puts the very case which is now under discussion, for he says, "But suppose that the grandfather of Edward was attaind and not Henry" (Edward's father), "this could not have hindered the descent from Edward to to his aunts, because the attainder had been paramount that consanguinity which was between Henry and his sisters, as brothers and sisters," as he shews is proved by Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19). He then notices the two objections taken at the bar, that the father is the vinculum, and that all the blood of the children comes from their parents, and if their parents' be stained so must be theirs, and answers the one, by saying that the very point was decided in Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19), that though both father's and mother's blood is necessary, yet if one be a denizen the children inherit at least from that parent, and that it is the law which is the vinculum; and he answers the other by saying, that though the parents are the natural, the law is the civil fountain which, finding them natural legitimate brothers with civil rights, closes up the consanguinity. And, lastly, as his third reason, he points out that our law is tender of such disabilities. A clearer exposition of the law as to the effect of attainder and the reasons on which it is founded is impossible. And it is made manifest that in tracing a pedigree by our law, you may trace from one brother or sister to another, without tracing through their father, that their own blood is pure and unaffected by the corruption of blood existing in their father, whether arising before or after his marriage; that this rests on a broad and general principle of our law, and not on any absurd and frivolous distinction based on pleading, and applicable merely to the simple case of descent from brother to brother, but that it equally applies when you are tracing from the descendant of one brother to the descendant of another. And although 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 106.

does not apply to the present case, inasmuch as here the descent took place in 1814, whereas that act applies only to a descent on or after the 1st of January, 1834, it may be referred to as shewing what was accepted by the legislature as the previous law on this point; and by section 5, which was to alter the law, we find it enacted, "that no brother or sister shall be considered to inherit immediately from his or her brother or sister, but every descent from a brother or sister shall be traced through the parent." And a further difficulty seems to be presented to the other side by section 10, which enacts, "that when the person from whom the descent of any land is to be traced shall have any relative who having been attainted shall have died before such descent shall have taken place, then such attainer shall not prevent any person from inheriting such land who would have been capable of inheriting the same, by tracing his descent through such relation, if he had not been attainted, unless such land shall have escheated, in consequence of such attainer, before the 1st of January, 1834.—(He also previously to arguing this point, argued at great length the question of whether, in default of heirs, the estate would pass under the residuary clause; but inasmuch as the Court, after hearing the other side on the question of corruption of blood, were of opinion that there was none which affected the tracing of the pedigree, and intimated that it was useless to argue the other point, it becomes unnecessary to allude to the argument as to the residuary clause.)

Rolt and Mellish (Fleming, of the Chancery bar, Kemplay and Trevelyan with them), in support of the rule.—The general rule of the corruption of all heritable blood by attainer is founded on the nature of the offence of high treason, and has no exception, or if it has any exception, the only exception is one arbitrarily limited, and the present case does not fall within the exception. The statute 7 Ann. c. 21. modified the law as to corruption of blood after the death of the Pretender, but that statute was repealed by the 39 Geo. 3. c. 93. The effects of attainer on hereditary blood are stated in 2 Black. Com. 16th edit. pp. 251 to 253, and at p. 253 Sir W. Blackstone says, "There is yet a further consequence of the corruption and extinction of hereditary blood, which is this, that the person attainted shall not only be incapable himself of inheriting or transmitting his own property by heirship, but shall also obstruct the descent of lands or tenements to his posterity in all cases where they are obliged to derive their title through him from any remoter ancestor." And in 1 Hale, P.C. 356, it is said, "In cases of collateral descent of lands in fee simple, if there be father and two sons, and the eldest is attainted in the life of the father and dies without issue in the life of the father, the younger son shall inherit from the father, for he need not mention his elder brother in the conveying of his title; but if the elder son attain survive the father but a day, and die without issue, the second cannot inherit, but the land shall escheat pro defectu hæredis, for the corruption of blood in the elder son surviving the father, impedes the descent—31 Edw. 1. Barr. 315." According to Foster's P.C. 63, to kill a person who is attainted without warrant of law is murder, for which the murderer is liable "to an appeal at the suit of the widow. For though his heir is barred by the attainer, which corrupteth his blood, and dissolveth all relations grounded on consanguinity, yet the relation grounded on the matrimonial contract continueth till death." Now the general rule as to tracing a descent is, that you must trace from the terminus a quo to the terminus ad quem; be it mediate or immediate; whatever be the method of pleading in the particular case, and whatever be the pedigree to be traced, the rule is exactly the same. This subject is treated of in 3 Cruise's Digest, 319, and it is clear that in tracing merely from father to son you must prove the marriage of the father and birth of the son; and it is exactly the same if you are tracing from brother to brother, whether the descent be mediate or not. That is the substance. The question now to be decided may be thus stated: If there be two first cousins, and one die seised as purchaser, can the other claim as his heir notwithstanding the attainer of the grandfather? On the specific question there is no decision, but there are three or four decisions which bear on it, from which the Court must draw an inference. The other side contend that, although the attainder of the father of the one cousin or the uncle of the other would corrupt the blood, yet that of the grandfather will not have the same effect. Whether this be correct is the question now to be decided. The plaintiff contends that the attainder of any one who must be named in tracing a pedigree causes a corruption of blood, which prevents the tracing of the pedigree; and that in tracing between cousins you must go up to a common ancestor, and then down. Now, two things are quite clear, from the authorities already cited, and indeed admitted on the other side: first, that the attainder of a person through whom you have to trace stops the tracing; secondly, that as a general rule you have to go up to a common ancestor; but the other side say that there is an exception to this, viz., that wherever in your pedigree you trace up to two brothers you may trace from the one to the other, ignoring the father. Now, Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19) is the only authority which at all supports the case of the defendant, but that case has always been considered to be an exception to the general rule, and does not govern the present, even supposing it to be good in law, which is not admitted, for even, apart from the reasons to be presently given, it appears from the judgment of Chief Justice Sir Orlando Bridgman in Collingwood v. Pace (in Bridgman's Reports, 448), in which Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19) is examined, that the Crown did not proceed in the writ of error which had been brought on the judgment in the Exchequer, because the Queen had recovered, in the mean time, the lands by another title.

[The Attorney General referred to Foster v. Ramsay (2 Sid. 25, 51, 148, 151); where Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19) is cited as an authority.]

Assuming Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19) to be law, it has always been treated as an exception, and it only applies to the case where there has been a brother who has died seised of land, leaving a brother or sister who had been born before the attainder of the father. There was a technical rule of pleading, that in case of brothers you might say "brother and heir"—see Clere v. Brooke (2 Plowd. 442); a cousin or an uncle must shew how he is heir. In Hobby's case (Noy's Rep. 158; s. c. 4 Leon. 5; Palmer 19), Stephenson, in argument says, "Also the brother, in making his descent, shall not make mention of the father, nor shew as he his brother as cozen shall make;" and the Solicitor General says (p. 164), on the other side, "I will first answer, then reason, and, after the cases that in form of pleading a descent between brothers, it sufficeth to say that one brother is dead without issue, but that the other is his heir, without mentioning how they are brothers. I willingly grant that if the father and mother be mentioned the pleading is not evil, . . . so then this reason consisteth in formality of pleading and not upon the substance of the matter;" and Mr. Justice Dodderidge, upon the argument of Godfrey and Dixon's case (Godbolt, 275), said, "That if a man claim as cousin and heir, he must shew how he is cousin and heir; but not when he claims as brother or son and heir." So in York's Treatise on the Law of Forfeiture, 4th edit. p. 83, though the corruption of blood prevents one inheriting through the party attainted, it is said, "As between two sons of attainted father, nothing prevents one brother from inheriting to the other, since, agreeably to the rule of law, the descent is immediate, he can make himself heir to the person last seised without the mention of the father." 1 Stephens's Com. 4th edit. p. 437, shews that why the brother may inherit is because the descent from one brother to the other may be considered "as immediate and without regard to the commune vinculum." And Vice Chancellor Kindersley—In re Don's Estate (27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 98),—also states the rule of law to have been, "That between brothers the descent was immediate, but as between other collateral relations you traced up to the common ancestor and down again." It being clear law that an attainder of a father prevented the tracing through him, and would have prevented brothers from inheriting inter se, but there happening to be a rule of pleading which allowed brothers to claim as heirs without naming him, in Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448) advantage was taken of this by the Judges to favour certain Scotch descents. The absurdity of this was insisted on over and over again by Sir Orlando Bridgman (whose judgment will be found in Bridgman's Reports), it being admitted that the mere circumstance of the attainted person being one who could not take makes no difference. In this judgment the different reasons on which Lord Chief Baron Hale relied are most conclusively answered, and it is further pointed out that there is a difference between the father being an alien and attainted; a distinction which, apart from all other considerations, makes the case of Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448) no authority in the present case. With respect to the argument which has been drawn from 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 106, it is clear that the act merely alludes to the case of a direct descent between brothers and sisters. Thus, then, it appears that there is a general rule that in tracing a pedigree you must trace from the terminus a quo to the terminus ad quem, and that you must trace up to a common ancestor; and that in the one particular case of a brother claiming from a brother, where an exception has been engrafted, is one only based on a technicality and absurdity; the Court therefore will not extend this exception further, but will in this case apply the general rule. But there is a further fact in this case, the marriage took place and the children were born after the attainder, and it is submitted that there was therefore no heritable blood for the father to impart, and that the marriage was nugatory at all events as far as relates to heritage in this country. In Co. Litt. 8 a. the law is thus stated, "If a man hath issue two sons, and after is attainted of treason or felony, and one of the sons purchase land and dieth without issue, the other brother shall be his heir, for the attainder of the father corrupteth the lineal blood only, and not the collateral blood between the brethren, which was vested in them before the attainder, and each of them by possibility might have been heir to the father. But some," he says, "have holden that if a man after he be attainted of treason or felony have issue two sons, that the one of them cannot be heir to the other because they could not be heir to the father, for that they never had any inheritable blood in them," citing Bract. lib. 3, fol. 130 and Brit. fol. 15. To the same effect is Ratcliffe's case (3 Rep. 41, a, b.). The attainted person is civilliter mortuus—Co. Litt. 133, a. b. Also, according to Code Napoléon Civil, lib. 1, tit. 1, s. 25, in the case of civil death, "il est incapable de contracter un mariage qui produise aucun effet civil."

[WILLES, J.—Perkins's Profitable Book, s. 28, shews that an attainted person may grant and convey before offence found. There must be offence found to vest the property in the Crown.]

ERLE, C.J.—We do not think it necessary to trouble you, Mr. Attorney General. We have been very much impressed with the learning, research and powerful arguments which have been brought before us on behalf of the plaintiff, and have applied our minds very carefully to their consideration, but in the result we have come to the conclusion that they are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to have this rule made absolute. The action is an action of ejectment, and the plaintiff claims to take the land of which Anthony James Earl of Newburgh died seised; and I need not go further into the plaintiff's title than to say that I take it to be admitted between these parties that the defendant is entitled as heir to the property, unless his apparent title be defeated by the objections which have been relied on in the argument of this case. According to the pedigree which lies before me he is naturally collateral heir, and he would, ordinarily speaking, be entitled to take. The reason why he is said not to be so entitled is because he is connected in consanguinity with Anthony James, from whom the inheritance is claimed through the common ancestor, Charles Ratcliffe, which common ancestor was attainted before he was married; and the contention on the part of the plaintiff is, that the defendant, as the consanguineus of Anthony

James cannot take this land, it being a clear rule of law that no one can claim an inheritance by descent if he is bound to claim through an attainted person. The main contention then is, that in tracing through the common ancestor he has been compelled by law to name the common ancestor as a person through whom the inheritance has descended to him. That is one main ground. The other ground is, that the marriage of the common ancestor took place after he was attainted, that it was, therefore, no marriage, and the children not legitimate, and so there is no consanguinity between them. Now, the first point is almost answered in the statement of the rule of law. I admit the rule of law to be, that the inheritance cannot pass through an attainted person; but I say the inheritance is collateral consanguinity passes directly from brother to brother, and that it passes directly from brother to brother whether the claim is made on behalf of one brother to succeed to a deceased brother, or whether it is made on behalf of a descendant from one brother claiming as of right from the descendant of another brother. I therefore am of opinion that the common ancestor is named only for the purpose of proving consanguinity, and is not named as a person through whom the inheritance passes. The rule of law that the inheritance passes from brother to brother, has been the subject of most remarkable legal disputes, and Lord Hale, and Sir Orlando Bridgman and the other Judges of that day, seem to have put forth all their powers of research and argument upon the matter, and they came to the conclusion that the inheritance passes directly from brother to brother; and from the date of Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448), so far as I have gathered from the argument, the law has been taken to be so, and the law is expressed in direct terms to be so by Blackstone, whose authority in many respects is great, especially upon matters as to real property. In the 2nd book of his Commentaries, p. 226, after explaining that the common ancestor is the root of the inheritance, and the consanguinity must be traced through him, he goes on to say—"But though the common ancestor be thus the root of the inheritance, yet, with us, it is not necessary to name him in making out the pedigree or descent. For the descent between two brothers is held to be an immediate descent; and therefore title may be made by one brother, or his representatives, to or through another, without mentioning the common father." He lays down the law distinctly that the claim is good from brother to brother; and he also lays down the law that this claim is good for the representative of a brother claiming land from the representative of another brother, that the representative of a deceased brother would have all the rights of the party he represents, and that the claim is in effect a claim from brother to brother. And Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448), and the cases there cited, shew most distinctly that the inheritance passes direct from brother to brother. Now, that decision was given by persons very well acquainted with the law and its origin, and most particularly acquainted with the phrases and words used in respect of shewing what the law is; and it has been argued that, on referring to Lord Hale's words maintaining that this is the rule of law, it appears that this was an exception, brought in by some casualty or chance in the course of pleading, and that those Judges who were desirous of favouring the claimants to some Scotch inheritance, turned aside from the law which has come down from our ancestors, and brought in an anomalous exception. I think the extreme gravity of the minds of those learned men who entered upon this discussion does away with the notion that there was any superficial adoption of a chance idea, and that such a proceeding would hardly have been in character with them; and, in reference to the form of pleading, Lord Hale says, in very clear language, this is the rule of law, and one evidence of its being the rule of law is, that the course of pleading is so. Our law has come down through many generations, and that is, no doubt, the uniform course of pleading. I have no doubt that the very best that could be done for the argument was done for it by the learned counsel for the plaintiff on this occasion; but, after giving it all due consideration, I think that the learned Judges intended to lay down that the rule of law was such as I have laid it down, and that they did not mean it to be a rule of law merely depending on the casual finding of a phrase that suited them in some of the precedents. The reason of it is apparent, because, at the time that this rule prevailed, the brother might, but the father could not, take the land; it passed directly from brother to brother. And counsel, in argument, could not but admit that it was an absurd thing that land should not pass from cousin to cousin, tracing it through the brother, whilst by an anomalous exception, introduced by means of a rule of pleading, it might from brother to brother. In my view there has been a course of authority recognized, and preponderating in favour of our present decision, and if it is to be altered it must be altered by a higher tribunal.

With respect to the other point, that the marriage was a null marriage, I cannot find any authority in our law for it; and it certainly would be a most revolting conclusion to come to, that because a person, who had actual physical capacity in the land where he was abiding, after he had been attainted in England, had the actual capacity to marry in Brussels, and to be the father of the children through whom these parties claim, that, because he had been attainted before the time when he went abroad, the wife whom he might have taken in a foreign country should be affected with nullity of the marriage and the children with the illegitimacy consequent thereupon. If the law here was so, if the man who was civiliter mortuus was by our law perfectly incapable of marriage, I should be the last person to think of interfering with the rule of law. I think in France he is held to be civilly dead and incapable of marriage; but I do not find that there is such a rule in our law, and I therefore think that the marriage at Brussels did make the children legitimate, and did give them a capacity for transmitting the inheritance from one to the other down to their descendants. I think, therefore, that the rule should be discharged.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case certainly presents some very remarkable aspects, because the person who is alleged to be disabled from taking by reason of the attainder of her ancestor is in this position, that the claim is made here, not on the part of the superior lord of the fee, but on the part of some heir who, in the ordinary course of events, could not succeed, living the defendant. If it could be made out that the present defendant is incapacitated, I am far from being satisfied by the argument that the result would follow that the present plaintiff would be entitled. The case appears to have been argued before us as if for this purpose attainder and alienage stood on the same footing; and it seems to have been assumed that, inasmuch as, if the person next in succession be an alien, the law takes no notice of the existence of such person, and the person next in turn to inherit obtains the inheritance; so, in like manner, if the person next in turn to inherit is disabled by reason of the act of attainder of an ancestor, the inheritance passes on to the person next in succession. Without at all deciding this matter, (which I am not prepared to do without further consideration), I think it right to say, that I am not satisfied that any such conclusion would follow as that contended for, or that the distinction between alienage and attainder, pointed out in the 2nd book of Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 254, would not be applicable to this case; and that what would happen would be not a transmission of the inheritance to the person next to take, but an escheat. I think so, for obvious reasons connected with the origin of the law of attainder. That law is, of course, quite distinct from the law by which a person convicted either of treason or felony forfeits his present property absolutely. The law of attainder corrupting his blood was introduced with reference to the law of escheat, which was founded upon the condition in the feudal compact that the land should continue to descend so long as he did not take any step in violation of it, of which the attainder was an absolute proof. The consequence was, that whenever a state of things arose in which, if the attainted person was alive, he would be the person designated to take the inheritance, those who claimed under him were rendered incapable of taking. The land did not pass on to some other heir, but was escheated to the lord. But, however this may be, I am clearly of opinion that the corruption of blood in this case was paramount to the pedigree from which it is necessary that the defendant should derive a title. I apprehend that the corruption of blood, so far as it affects the person himself attainted, may be accurately described as an incapacity either to take an inheritance, or to transmit an inheritance; and I apprehend that the effect of the corruption of blood there ceases. With respect to the persons who have to claim from the attainted person, the effect it has upon them is a simple incapacity to take an inheritance which the attainted person could not transmit; or, as it has been put in another way, an incapacity to take by means of a pedigree in which the attainted person is what has been called the lineal ancestor,—the person through whom the descent has arrived, the medium of descent of the inheritance. In order to affect the transmission of the property it is not sufficient to shew that the person attainted was the common stock of the relationship between the person last seised and the person who claims; it is necessary further to shew that you must trace through the attainted person. Now suppose that, instead of the land having been granted to Anthony James, it had been granted to James Bartholomew, and that instead of the claimant being the grandson of Mary, the sister of James Bartholomew Ratcliffe, the claimant had been Mary. In that case it is admitted to be perfectly clear that Mary could have made out her title as heir to James Bartholomew without claiming through the attainted person her father, and that she could have established a title as heir to her brother. Therefore one starts with what Mr. Mellish was compelled to admit to be an absurdity, that the further you go away from the attainted person, the further the parties are removed by this distance of relationship, the greater the reason there is for saying that the inheritance shall not prevail by reason of the attainder. That is an absurdity which is not only shocking to a man who applies his common sense to it, or to any person who deals with it as a matter of rational legislation, but it is an absurdity (in the only way in which we ought to allow our minds to be swayed by an absurdity) with reference to the origin I have already stated of the law as to corruption of blood in respect to escheat. Then, speaking of it as a feudal question: for whose benefit is this forfeiture to take place? For the benefit of the superior lord of the fee granted to Anthony James, when there would be no forfeiture, or for the benefit of the superior lord of the fee granted to James Bartholomew, neither of whom was the superior lord of Charles Ratcliffe, or in any way affected by his treason? Therefore, it would be admitting a clear absurdity. The only question is, whether there is positive law to be advanced in its favour by which we are bound. We have not been informed of any decision from which we might arrive at such a conclusion. The best ground upon which Lord Hale and his companions could found their judgment in Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448) was that, as between brothers, the descent was immediate, and that they claimed respectively under the description of brother and heir. Whereas Sir Orlando Bridgman adds, if a cousin has to claim, he must shew how he is a cousin. I have listened, with all that attention which it deserves to everything which fell from the learned counsel who argued for the plaintiff, and to the authorities which they brought before the Court. I have also endeavoured by research to find out for myself whether there was any rule for putting the descendants from a brother in a worse position as to pleading than the brother himself. Neither in the authorities cited, nor in my own research, do I find any such law in the books. The authorities which have been cited are a proof that they could plead as the brothers could. It appears to be a rule of the law of inheritance that the descendants are in the same condition as their ancestor would be if he were alive. I see no reason whatever for saying that they do not represent him in a matter of pleading as in other rights, if those rights affect the title to property. The reason given why brothers in relation to one another claim as brother and heir is simply this (I am speaking still with reference to the feudal law). At first it would seem, it was held that if a brother purchased a fee and died, leaving his father and a brother alive, that such brother could not inherit, because it was a rule of the law of inheritance that the descent must be through a person having the blood of the first taker; no doubt that was the original law. The lawyers got over that by a reason even more technical, certainly more ingenious, than that with respect to the pleadings in Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 413; Bridg. Rep. 448), because they said that, though it was shewn to be in feudom, the law would assume (and it might be pleaded) on the death of the brother who purchased, that it had descended from a common ancestor, so that the other brother could take, because he would have the blood of that ancestor in him. That was the reasoning upon which the lawyers arrived at the conclusion that the brother could take. But, now, suppose the father was attainted, or the father was an alien, what follows? In the first case that happened after that state of the law was recognized the ancestor was an alien. Then, said the objectors to the descendant from the brother, assume this to have been pleaded, it is impossible that the brother could succeed because the brother was an alien or attainted, and therefore the course of descent was stopped. This reasoning, it appears, was at first acceded to, and it was held that the brother could not inherit under such circumstances. Afterwards a new subtlety was invented, that as the law assumed an ancestor from whom the property descended, it might as well assume that the ancestor was a capable ancestor, and in consequence of the imaginary ancestor being introduced by a fiction of law the brother succeeded. All that reasoning, from beginning to end, is equally applicable to the descendants of respective brothers. Assuming there were no ground for departing from the ordinary rule of inheritance, that descendants are to be taken as standing in the place of their ancestors, then (as respects what the pleadings should be in a case of this kind, if it were necessary to set out the title) the pleadings would be that Anthony James died seised, whose issue failed, who was the only son of James Bartholomew who had no other child (passing over the daughter), all whose brothers and sisters, with the exception of Mary, the grandmother of Dorothea, died without issue, and then trace the descent from Mary. Why is the description of Mary, as succeeding to James Bartholomew in the line of descent, worse in the pleadings than if it was a claim direct from James Bartholomew? I must own that some things are difficult and do not appear plain because one does not thoroughly understand them. This appears to be a perfectly plain point, and the difficulty in dealing with it is by reason of being unable to get hold of what there is in it, and I cannot say that I entertain any doubt on this part of the case. Then, with respect to the other point, that involves a very serious question,—a question entirely new, and which does not seem to have been suggested in any book on the law of this country, with reference to the validity of a marriage. This question may be divided into two heads: first, assuming the marriage to be valid, were the children who were born after the attainder in any worse position than the children born before the attainder? secondly, was the marriage void altogether by reason of the husband being an attainted person? With respect to the first head, no doubt in the early history of the law it was a point of considerable importance. I have looked at the passage in Bracton referred to by Mr. Rolt, and though I doubted at the time whether the passage was to the effect he relied on, I now think he was correct. The other passage referred to in Britton rather indicates that it had reference to escheat, and it was laid down that the forfeiture should be strictly enforced in favour of the Crown, not for the benefit of third persons who might inherit on the failure of heirs. That is also laid down in Co. Lit. and in other eminent works, in which the authorities are collected which shew that to be the law. Again in the 2nd book of Black. Com. p. 255, the writer points out that Coke makes the distinction between issues born before and issue born after attainder; and he says that notion was in his time exploded, and treats it as clear that the children born after the attainder stand in the same position, as to inheriting from each other, as children born before the attainder. And I observe in Mr. Williams's note to Watkins on Descent, at page 3, refers to these authorities, and shews that children born after the father's attainder may inherit from one another in the same way as those who were born before. The corruption of blood does not personally affect the descendants, but only affects the power to transmit the inheritance. Now comes the only other question that was raised, viz., whether an attainted man may contract marriage. I cannot help thinking that my Lord entirely swept away the objections on this point when he referred to the circumstance that this marriage was contracted abroad. Whatever might have been the case, if it had been contracted in this country, I apprehend there is no doubt at all that, with reference to a marriage contracted by an innocent woman, who knew nothing whatever of the attainder of the man whom she was marrying, the law of the place where the marriage contract was performed governs the validity of that contract and must prevail. And I would go further and say, it is a mistake to suppose that an attainted man, though for certain purposes he is said to be dead in law, can be considered as other than a human being in existence. Independently of the late Divorce Act, which stands alone, upon what grounds could a marriage of persons who were capable of contracting a marriage be dissolved in this country? The answer of every lawyer is simply, by death or by divorce. There is no divorce in this case. The law of this country does not, like the law of the Code Napoléon, referred to by Mr. Rolt, declare that existing marriages should be void. There is no death in the sense in which death is used in the law of marriage; that refers to natural death, not civil death. One need not cast about for the purpose of finding instances of persons who have been attainted, who have returned to their wives and to their country. Then the capacity for the matrimonial state is not destroyed. An attainted person cannot pray in aid the assistance of the Queen's Courts for the purpose of establishing any rights which he may have acquired. But he has the ordinary capacities of all men: those persons with whom he contracts may acquire rights from him, even in respect of an inheritance which is forfeited to the Crown, and such inheritance may pass by his grant and be vested in the grantees until the contrary is found. Furthermore, any such contracts may be the subject of suits against him in Her Majesty's Courts, and he cannot set up the disability of his own attainder. I apprehend, therefore, that he was capable of contracting marriage. I find it nowhere laid down that attainder prevents a man from marrying, still more that it does so from marrying out of this country. In the Code Napoléon there is also an express enactment that the marriage of such a person shall not imply any civil rights, that is to say, that he may marry; but although there are no civil rights, that will not affect the marriage. This enactment applies to a marriage out of France as well as to a marriage in France, according to a decision of the Court of Cassation, and no doubt is a very remarkable law. A law not only not found in our own country, but wholly foreign to the law of marriage in this country, with the exception of a few traces in the books of what is called legitima concubina, which no one will say are authorities in this day. There are no two sorts of marriage in England. It is either a marriage or no marriage. There is no such thing as a marriage without civil rights, such as is mentioned in the Code Napoléon. The only other analogy to be found is the sort of marriage which took place under the Roman law between two slaves, which was a marriage for decency's sake, not for imposing any civil rights. The only remaining instance to be found in modern times is the singular compromise between a man and his wife for decency's sake, called in Germany a left-handed marriage; and any one who has the curiosity to look into that will find that, as regards such a marriage, although the wife cannot claim her husband's family rights, nor the children, yet they are legitimate inter se, and capable of inheriting from one another. This is a most interesting case, and one that is certainly calculated to attract a very considerable share of attention; but I must own that the conclusion at which I have arrived is, that it is a perfectly plain case, and the rule ought to be discharged.

KEATING, J.—I concur in the opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The learned counsel who argued so ably on the part of the plaintiff did not for a moment conceal the difficulties they had to encounter in arguing the principal point that has been discussed, viz., that whereas a brother can inherit direct from a brother without naming the attainted father, they were obliged to contend that, nevertheless, the children of the brothers could not claim the one from the other without naming the attainted grandfather. The learned counsel, Mr. Mellish, characterized that as a consequence which would be almost an absurdity. Without exactly adopting that phrase, still it would be most difficult to sustain that proposition. Even if it were an absurdity, still, if it was a matter of positive law, of course we should be bound to give effect to the positive law. Mr. Mellish, however, on that point was driven to admit that there was no decision in favour of the proposition for which he contended, and he was driven further to admit that there was no express dictum in favour of that proposition. I confess that in the absence of either decision or dictum in its favour, the very ingenious analogies drawn in the various arguments that have been used and elaborated by the learned counsel for the plaintiff have not convinced me that we should come to the conclusion to which they seek to bring us. The reasons on which our judgment is founded have been already so fully adverted to by my Lord and my Brother Willes, that I do not propose to add anything, either on this first point or the second question that has been raised, as to the effect of the marriage after the attainder, with respect to which also I entirely agree with them.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the weight of reason and authority is on the side of the defendant. It is an established rule of inheritance that the descent between brother and brother is immediate; and the result of the cases that have been referred to in argument is, that the attainder of the father does not interfere with the descent. Certainly it seemed to me the logical and natural consequence of that canon of inheritance, that the descendants of the brothers might claim through them just as the brothers might claim from each other. There was the same reason for the brothers going up to the common ancestor as for their descendants—the same reason for the descendants stopping at the line of the brothers as for the brothers themselves claiming from each other. Probably the origin of the rule may have been that it was not necessary to go to the father, inasmuch as he could never have been in the line of inheritance: the inheritance could not have descended through him. Whatever may have been the foundation of that canon, there is no doubt of its existence; and the consequence follows so clearly and logically that Mr. Mellish is driven to argue that it was a mere technical rule, and that it was founded and had its origin in the rules of pleading. I cannot help thinking that the rule of pleading must have followed the rule of inheritance, and that it would not have been a good pleading unless it had so followed it. It is very difficult to say that the rule of pleading can be regarded otherwise than as evidence of what the law was. And when it is argued that in the case of Collingwood v. Pace (1 Sid. 193; s. c. 1 Vent. 418; Bridg. Rep. 448) the learned Judges strained for reasons for establishing that which Mr. Mellish treats as an anomaly, I think one can hardly so treat their decision. The Judges were not making the law; they were only declaring it; and we must take that case as declaring not what the law was then for the first time, but what the law of the country had always been. It seems to me, therefore, that the reason of the law is entirely on the side of the defendant; and that it follows from that canon of inheritance to which I have adverted that the descendants may avail themselves of it in the same way that the brothers would do. And the fourth rule or canon of descent which is to be found in Blackstone states that the lineal descendants of any person should represent their ancestor, and that they should stand in the same place as that person would have done had he been living. The descendants of the brother stand in the same position as he did, and may claim in the same manner as he did.

With regard to the other question, I agree with the rest of the Court, and do not think it necessary to add anything to the reasons which have been so fully expressed.

Rule discharged.

Practice—Setting aside Execution—Power to impose Terms of Bringing no Action.

EXECUTION. PRACTICE.—Where, execution has been issued prematurely, and the defendant has applied to a Judge at chambers to set the execution aside with costs, the Judge has power on granting such application to impose the terms that no action be brought, and the Court will not afterwards review the exercise of such power.

Kenealy moved to rescind that portion of an order made by Willes, J., on the 12th of March last, which prevented the defendant from bringing any action.

It appeared that the defendant had been served, on the 28th of February last, with a writ, specially indorsed according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852; and that the defendant not appearing thereto the plaintiff duly signed judgment on the 9th of March for the sum indorsed on the writ. The plaintiff, though not entitled by the statute to issue execution on such judgment before the 16th of March, levied the amount of such judgment upon the defendant's goods on the 12th of March. Immediately after such levy, the defendant took out a summons before Willes, J., at chambers, to shew cause "why the writ of fi. fa. and all subsequent proceedings thereon should not be set aside, with costs of and incidental to such application," on the ground of the execution having been prematurely issued. On the hearing of such summons, that learned Judge made an order, but on the terms of bringing no action, and, accordingly, indorsed on the summons "Order—no action," notwithstanding that the defendant's advocate urged that it was a case in which no such terms should be imposed; but it did not appear that any offer was then made by the defendant to waive the costs. The debt and costs in the action were paid by the defendant on the 16th of March, and the sheriff withdrew from execution; but the defendant stated in his affidavit that he had not drawn up, nor in any way proceeded to act on the Judge's order.

It is submitted that the learned Judge ought not to have imposed those terms. The defendant had a right ex debito justitiæ to set aside the execution which had been issued before the time limited by the 27th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. It was held, in Cash v. Wells (1 B. & Ad. 375), that the application for setting aside a judgment as against good faith was ex debito justitiæ, and that the Court would not impose on the defendant, as a condition for setting it aside, that he bring no action.

ERLE, C.J.—We are all of opinion that there should be no rule in this case, as it was entirely within the discretion of the learned Judge to impose the terms of bringing no action. The summons asked for costs, and the order was made on that principle.

Rule refused.

Office during Clerkship—Steward of a Manor.*

SOLICITOR.—During the term of service under articles of clerkship to an attorney, the clerk was appointed to succeed his father as steward of a manor. The inheritance of the manor devolved on the mother and family of the clerk, and he held the appointment at their desire and to protect the property, in which he and they were all interested. The duties were discharged by a deputy, but the clerk had gone and held courts on three days during a year and a half of his clerkship, with the consent of the attorneys to whom he was articled. Under these peculiar circumstances, the Court ordered the examiners, who had examined the clerk de bene esse, to grant him a certificate of admission, notwithstanding the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. s. 10. prohibits any articled clerk, during the term of service, from holding any office or employment other than that of clerk to the attorney to whom he is articled.

R. E. Turner applied, on behalf of Walter Peppercorn, for an order to the examiners appointed to examine candidates to be admitted attorneys, to grant a certificate pursuant to Reg. Hilary Term, 1853, of the applicant's fitness to act as attorney. It appeared from the affidavit of the applicant that he was articled in February, 1861, and that he had served his term of five years, and had, de bene esse, passed his examination, but that the examiners had refused to grant the certificate without the order of the Court, on the ground of his having during the term of service held an office or employment other than that of clerk to the attorneys he served under his articles.

With respect to this, the affidavit of the applicant stated that his father was steward of the manor of Headington, in the county of Oxford, up to the time of his death, which happened in July, 1864, and upon his death it became necessary to appoint a steward in his place. That, upon the death of the applicant's mother, the manor would become divisible amongst himself and his brothers and sisters, in equal shares; that his father always expressed a desire that after his death the applicant should be appointed steward of the said manor in his place, and upon such death the applicant's brother-in-law, who was lord of the manor, accordingly, and also by desire of the applicant's family, appointed him such steward, and in which capacity he first acted in December, 1864. That the applicant appointed a solicitor to act as his deputy, and that the general business of the manor had been transacted by him; that the only way in which the applicant acted in the business of the said manor has been to be present at the courts to admit the tenants and take the surrenders, and as the conduct of the manor would be left to him when he should be admitted, he considered it his duty to become as much acquainted with the customs of the manor and duties of a steward as possible. The applicant stated that he had been absent during his articles on three occasions of one day each, for the purpose of being present at the courts as aforesaid, with his principals' consent, and that the fees of the courts had, by agreement, been divided between himself and his deputy steward. He stated that he was aware that an articled clerk could not legally take fees as a solicitor during his clerkship, but that as the appointment of steward of a manor does not necessarily fall on a solicitor, he never for an instant imagined that he was doing wrong in taking the appointment, and that he did so more with the view of looking after his own and his relations' interests than with any idea of emolument, and that the money he had received had been hardly sufficient to defray his expenses out of pocket, and that the whole control of the manor having been with his family for so long, he looked upon his appointment more in the light of private property than otherwise. An application for such certificate had been made upon a similar affidavit to the Court of Queen's Bench, and had been refused, that Court considering that the applicant had held an office within section 10. of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, and that the Court had no discretionary power in the matter.

That section enacts that, "no person hereafter bound by articles of clerkship to any attorney or solicitor shall, during the term of such service mentioned in such articles, hold any office or engage in any employment whatsoever other than the employment of clerk to such attorney or solicitor and his partner or partners (if any) in the business, practice or employment of an attorney or solicitor, save as by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. or this act otherwise provided; and every person bound as aforesaid shall, before being admitted an attorney or solicitor, prove by the affidavit required under section 14. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, that he has not held any office or engaged in any employment contrary to this enactment, and the form of such affidavit as aforesaid shall be varied by such addition thereto as may be necessary for this purpose."

It must be admitted that the office which the applicant held was within the letter of the statute, and that his case does not come within those expressly excepted by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, or by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127; still, it is submitted that the applicant has not held an office within the fair spirit and meaning of the statute. The applicant only acted as steward during three days, when he went and held courts, with the consent of the attornies with whom he was serving his articles.

[BYLES, J.—In In re Taylor (4 B. & C. 341) the Court considered that a clerk who had been surveyor of taxes during the term of his clerkship had not served his whole time in the proper business of an attorney as required by the 22 Geo. 2. c. 46.]

The Court of Queen's Bench has held that a clerk discharging the duties of auditor of a poor-law union after the usual office hours of his master, did not render the service insufficient—Ex parte Llewellyn (2 Dowl. P.C. N.S. 701; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 138). That, however, was before the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127.

[ERLE, C.J.—Have the Judges made any rule as to the form of affidavit required under section 14. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73?]

No. The form in use states that the clerk did not during the period of his service hold any office, or was engaged in any employment, other than that of clerk to the attornies he served under the articles of clerkship. The form is, however, by section 10. of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, to be varied by such addition as may be necessary.

Cur. adv. vult.

The opinion of the Court (Erle, C.J., Byles, J., Keating, J. and Montague Smith, J.) was now (May 3) delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the service of the applicant under his articles has been sufficient within the meaning of the statutes, and that his affidavit explains the very peculiar circumstances under which he became for a time steward of the manor of Headington, so as to entitle him to his certificate. It appears thereby that the inheritance of the manor itself devolved on his family on the death of his father, and with it the office of steward in a manor devolved on him as the legal member of the family, holding it at the request of his mother, brothers and sisters, performing the duties by deputy, and having consumed only two or three days in two or three years in visits to the manor court, with the leave of his employers, acquiring thereby professional knowledge and at the same time protecting a property in which he has an interest. We have conferred with the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench.

Order for a certificate.

Bill of Sale—Stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. s. 1.—Trading Company giving Bill—Description of Occupation of Company—Attesting Witness to Seal—Directors.

BILLS OF SALE.—A trading company may give a bill of sale of its effects as a security for a debt due from the company, in respect of goods supplied for the purpose of its trade.

The company who gave the bill of sale was called "The Glucose Sugar and Colouring Company":—Held, that its name was a sufficient description of its trade or occupation to satisfy the requisites of the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. s. 1), as to stating the occupation of the persons giving the bill of sale.

A bill of sale given by a company had the seal of the company affixed to it, and opposite such seal were the signatures of two directors, with the word "directors" after such signatures, and also the signature of the secretary, with the word "secretary" after it. It was proved to be the practice of the company to affix the seal in the presence of the board and for two directors to attest the sealing, and also for the secretary to attest, and that the articles of association of the company authorized the directors to make regulations for the use of the company's seal:—Held, that the two directors did not sign as attesting witnesses, and that therefore their residence and occupation was not required to be stated in the affidavit of verification.

Interpleader issue tried, before Erle, C.J., at the Middlesex Sittings after last Hilary Term, to determine whether certain machinery and effects, seized in execution by the defendant under a judgment obtained by him against the "Glucose Sugar and Colouring Company, Limited," were the property of the plaintiff as against the defendant. The plaintiff was a shareholder of the company, and had supplied the machinery and effects, the subject of this suit, and which had been required by the company in their manufactory; and on the 17th of August, 1865, the company had executed a bill of sale in favour of the plaintiff of such machinery to secure the payment of the balance then due from them to the plaintiff, and it was under this bill of sale the plaintiff now claimed the property which had been so seized in execution. The bill of sale had the seal of the company affixed to it, and opposite such seal were the signatures of two directors, countersigned by the secretary, thus:

Edmund Vansittart Neale, }
B. Price, } Directors.

J. E. B. Curtis, Secretary

The evidence given at the trial by the company's secretary was, that the company carried on the manufacture of Glucose sugar only; that there was no resolution with respect to the way in which the seal should be affixed, but that it was the practice to affix the seal in the presence of the board, and for two directors to attest the sealing, and also for the secretary to attest.

The bill of sale was registered under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, and the affidavit filed for the purpose of such registration was made by the secretary of the said company, and stated that he saw the said bill of sale sealed with the seal of the said Glucose Sugar and Colouring Company, "and countersigned by Edward Vansittart Neale and Bonamy Price, who are two of the directors of the said company, and whose signatures appear subscribed thereto," and "that the said company has its principal office at No. 9, Booth Street, Spitalfields, in the county of Middlesex." In the articles of association under which the company was formed, the object for which the company was established was stated to be, "first, the manufacture of Glucose sugar, starch and gum; secondly, the manufacture of colouring matter from glucose sugar; thirdly, the purchase of the patents granted to Alexandre Mombré for such manufactures; and, fourthly, the doing of all such matters and things as shall be incidental or auxiliary to the attainment of the above objects or any or either of them, or that may appear to the company to be conducive thereto or expedient to be done, or carried on in connexion therewith." The articles also contained the following clauses, viz.: Clause 38.—"The directors may, from time to time, as in their judgment they may deem expedient, borrow for the purposes of the company, without any further authority than a resolution passed at a meeting of the board, any sum or sums of money, but so that the sum so raised shall not exceed in the aggregate at any one time the sum of 10,000*l.*, and the directors may, with the sanction of a general meeting, borrow any further sum or sums of money in such manner, upon such terms, and upon such security, as such meeting shall determine." Clause 39.—"Any bond, mortgage, debenture or security bearing the common seal of the company, and issued for valuable consideration, shall be binding and obligatory on the company, notwithstanding any irregularity touching the authority of the directors to issue the same." Clause 78.—"The directors may make such regulations for the use and for the safe custody of the seal of the company as they may from time to time think fit."

A verdict having been found for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on points reserved.

Huddleston (J. O. Griffiths with him) now moved accordingly.—In the first place it is submitted that the company had no power to give the bill of sale under which the plaintiff claimed. Clause 38 of the articles of association merely authorizes the directors to borrow money; but this bill of sale was given for a previous debt, and not to raise money, and the plaintiff being a shareholder must be taken to have known the limited powers of the company. Next, the affidavit of verification of the bill of sale is defective; it does not state the trade or occupation of the company, which, in this case, must be taken to be the person giving the same. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. s. 1. says the bill is to be filed, "together with an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being made or given, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving the same." The affidavit ought to have said for what the company was formed, according to its articles of association. Thirdly, the affidavit is also defective in not stating the occupation and residence of the attesting witnesses to the bill of sale, which the 1st section of the act expressly requires to be done. Here, it appears, that opposite to the company's seal to the bill of sale are the signatures of two directors, and the evidence shews that it was the practice to attest the affixing the seal by two directors. The occupation and residence, therefore, of Mr. Neale and Mr. Price, whose names appear as attesting witnesses, ought to have been given in the affidavit.

[ERLE, C.J.—This point would be a good point if those gentlemen signed as attesting witnesses. The affidavit states only that the bill of sale was countersigned by them. MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Did they not rather sign as parties than as attesting witnesses?]

In either case the affidavit would have to state their residence. It is submitted, however, that they signed as witnesses. It would be proper that the company should have witnesses to see that the seal was rightly affixed.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule in this case. The first point which has been raised is, whether the giving of the bill of sale was ultra vires. The company being a trading company, it seems to me that they had power to buy and sell things necessary for their business, and therefore to give this bill of sale as a security for what was due in respect of the things they had so bought. Then the act of parliament requires the affidavit to give a description of the occupation of the person giving the bill of sale. I think as the company giving this bill of sale had a known place of residence, the description "Glucose Sugar and Colouring Company" is a sufficient description of the business and occupation of the company, and any person wishing to know more about it, might go and ascertain the same at the place where the company's articles of association are registered. With respect to the last point, if these two directors signed as attesting witnesses, the point would be a good one; but I think they put their names to the bill of sale according to the customary practice of the company, and that they did so in their capacity of directors, and that the secretary countersigned as the secretary according to the known practice by which corporations put their seals to instruments.

BYLES, J.—As to the last point, I had at first some doubt; but on looking at the 78th clause of the articles, it is, I see, provided that the directors may make such regulations for the use of the seal as they may think fit, and the description of these two as signing opposite the seal as directors is consistent with that clause.

KEATING, J.—It is clear, I think, that these parties did not sign as attesting witnesses, but as directors only.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I concur on all points.

Rule refused.

LANE AND ANOTHER v. NIXON.

35 L. J. C.P. 243; L. R. 1 C.P. 412; 14 W. R. 641; 12 Jur. N.S. 392.

Shipping—Marine Insurance—Warranty of Seaworthiness—Lighters for Discharge of Cargo.

MARINE INSURANCE.—On an insurance of goods on a voyage policy, until the same be safely landed at the port of discharge, "including all risks to and from the ship," there is no implied warranty that the lighter used at the end of the voyage to convey the goods from the ship to the shore shall be seaworthy for that purpose.

Declaration upon a policy of insurance, subscribed by the defendant, as insurer of 100l. upon goods and merchandises on board the ship called the Queen of Beauty, on a voyage "from Liverpool to Melbourne, including all risk to and from the ship," "beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at Liverpool," and so continuing "until the said ship, with all the ordnance," &c., "and goods and merchandises whatsoever, shall be arrived at Melbourne," "and upon the said goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed." There was a warranty of said goods, &c. free from particular average, unless stranded, sunk or burnt. Averments of shipment of goods on board the said ship, and of plaintiffs' interest therein, and that the said ship, with the said goods on board, departed from Liverpool on her said voyage; and that, during the continuance of the said risk, the said goods were, by the said perils insured against, and by being sunk, within the meaning of the exception in the said warranty from particular average, injured and damaged. The claim was for such average loss.

Sixth plea—That the said injury or damage happened after the said goods had been discharged from the said ship, the Queen of Beauty, and while they were in a certain ship or lighter,¹ intended to convey them from the said ship, the Queen of Beauty, to the shore; and, further, that the said other ship or lighter was not seaworthy for the purpose on which she was so employed.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.²

W. Williams, in support of the demurrer.—The question raised by the sixth plea is, whether, on a voyage policy, there is an implied warranty that the lighter used for the discharge of the cargo at the end of the voyage shall be seaworthy. It is entirely novel, and there is no decision on the point. In the first place, it is submitted that the discharge by lighters is part of, and the final stage of the voyage; and therefore it is not the case of two voyages and two risks, where there may be an implied warranty that the ship should be fit for the purpose at the commencement of each—Biccard v. Sheppard (14 Moo. P.C. 471). The practice of landing goods by lighters is a very ancient practice, and the boat used for that purpose has been regarded as part of the ship, so far as the insurance is concerned. In Pelly v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (1 Burr. 348), Lord Mansfield says, "Therefore, when goods are insured 'till landed,' without express words, the insurance extends to the boat the usual method of landing goods out of a ship upon the shore." Rucker v. the London Assurance Company (2 Bos. & P. 432, note a) and Hurry v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 Bos. & P. 430) furnish instances of landing goods by lighters, and shew that a loss when they are in such lighters is covered by a policy insuring the goods until safely landed. There is a distinction between using lighters for the purpose of taking goods on shore, and where, in effect, a new voyage is begun—Emerigon, 'Traité des Assurances,' c. 13. s. 2. It is also stated in 1 Phillips on Insurance, 537, s. 970, that "the risk on a cargo insured, 'till safely landed,' will continue in lighters, where that is the usual mode of landing similar goods, or goods from vessels of like size." Stewart v. Bell (5 B. & Ald. 238) also supports the contention, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the discharge by lighters formed part of the voyage. Next, the implied warranty of seaworthiness does not extend to the lighters employed in so landing the goods. If there be such warranty, when does it attach? Does it attach when the lighter leaves the shore or when the goods are put into it? There is nothing in the plea to fix the warranty to any particular time. The authorities shew that the implied warranty of seaworthiness is founded on custom, and on the presumption that the owner has the means of knowing the condition of the vessel at the time it is given which the underwriter does not possess. Taking the meaning of "seaworthiness" to be as stated by Chief Justice Erle in Thompson v. Hopper (6 El. & B. 181; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 240), "that the ship is fit for its duty in the ordinary degree," it is a relative term depending on the nature of the ship, as whether it be a river steamer, as well as of the voyage insured—Burges v. Wickham (3 Best & S. 669; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 17), Knill v. Hooper (2 Hurl. & N. 277; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep.

(1) During the argument the plea was amended by alleging that the lighter was a Melbourne boat, and did not belong to the Queen of Beauty.

(2) There was also a seventh plea demurred to. That plea alleged that the damage and injury complained of occurred from the acts and defaults of the plaintiffs and their servants and agents; but the Court, during the argument, considered it an ambiguous plea, and ordered it to stand over until after the trial, with a recommendation to the plaintiffs to apply at chambers to strike it out as embarrassing.

(n.s.) Exch. 377) and Clapham v. Atkinson (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 49). It is true that Alderson, B., in giving his opinion in Gibson v. Small (4 H.L. Cas. 390), says, that "if the policy on that adventure, on the face of it, states different stages in which the perils are different, then the implied warranty follows each stage, and requires that as each occurs the ship shall be seaworthy for that stage." It is submitted that that is not correct, and that what that learned Judge meant to say was that the warranty is satisfied if the vessel at each stage is fit for each stage, like the case of Bouillon v. Lupton (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 113; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 37). In that last case, the voyage insured being from Lyons to Galatz, the Court held that the vessel whilst descending the Rhone must be fit for the river navigation, and whilst proceeding from Marseilles to Galatz must be fit for the sea portion of the voyage, but that case does not decide that there was an implied warranty that the vessel when it left Marseilles should be seaworthy for the sea voyage, only that the warranty would be satisfied if the vessel was then fit for the sea voyage; but it is submitted that the warranty would have been also satisfied if the vessel in that case had left Lyons fit for the sea voyage as well as for the river navigation. Phillips v. Headlam (2 B. & Ad. 380) and Dixon v. Saddler (5 Mee. & W. 405; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 48) shew that there is no warranty that the vessel shall continue seaworthy.

Sir George Honyman, in support of the plea.—The underwriter insures against the perils of the sea, but he does not insure against any accident arising from any vice in the thing which is to be carried, or where the loss arises from the vessel in which it is carried not being fit for the purpose. It is, perhaps, not easy to say on what principle the warranty of seaworthiness exists in a voyage policy; but it is not because the assured has a better opportunity than the underwriter of seeing that the vessel when she starts on her voyage is fit for the same, because, if that were the case, it would not extend, as it does, to an insurance on goods. In Burgess v. Wickham (3 Best & S. 669; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 17), Chief Justice Cockburn thus considers the ground on which the doctrine of implied warranty of seaworthiness rests: "The insurer is entitled to expect that the shipowner will do all that it behoves a careful and conscientious man to do to secure the safety of the crew who are to navigate the vessel, and of the merchant's goods which are to be conveyed in it, so that the risk covered by the insurance shall be limited to those perils incidental to navigation against which the care and skill of man cannot provide." It is said, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the ordinary risk covered by the insurance extends from the ship to the shore; and it is admitted that the ship's boats used for the purpose of conveying to the shore should be fit for that purpose, and that the underwriters would not be liable if the vessel had started on her voyage with boats which were not fit in this respect. The plea alleges that the lighter used in conveying the goods in question from the ship to the shore was not seaworthy for that purpose; and it is now to be considered that the plea has been altered, and that such lighter was no boat which had come out with the vessel, but was a boat belonging to Melbourne, and had come off from the shore to the vessel. Under these circumstances, it is submitted that there is an obligation on the part of the assured that such lighter should be seaworthy, that is, fit for the purpose for which she was so employed. That "seaworthy" has such a flexible meaning is well pointed out by Lord Wensleydale, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Small v. Gibson (16 Q.B. Rep. 128; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 152). What is contended for on behalf of the defendant is—there were here various stages of the insured voyage, to each of which the warranty of seaworthiness extended, as put by Chief Justice Erle in Thompson v. Hopper (6 El. & B. 181; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 240), where that learned Judge says, "It is also clear that when once fulfilled, so that the policy has attached, it is not always at an end. The case of a policy on a ship at and from London on a whaling voyage to the North is almost too trite to be quoted; the warranty is for four gradations: fit for dock in London, fit for river to Gravesend, fit for sea to Shetland, then fit for whaling. The policy attaches if the ship is fit for dock, but the warranty is broken if the other stages of fitness are not completed." It would be altogether illusory to suppose that the assured has satisfied the warranty when he has put the goods in a vessel fit only for half the insured voyage. If, for example, the Queen of Beauty went only to the Cape of Good Hope, and the goods were to be transhipped there into another vessel, it would surely not be contended that there was not an implied warranty on the part of the assured that each of the vessels should be fit to encounter the ordinary risks each would be exposed to in performing the purposes for which each was so employed. That is the rule which was followed in Biccard v. Sheppard (14 Moo. P.C. 471), and it is therefore submitted that there is an undertaking by the assured that the boat used for taking the goods to the shore shall be reasonably fit for doing so when the goods are put therein.

W. Williams, in reply, cited 2 Duer's Marine Insurance, 670.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The action is on a policy upon goods on a voyage from Liverpool to Melbourne, until the same should be there safely landed. The vessel arrived at Melbourne, and the goods were put in a lighter to be conveyed to the shore, and the plea is, that such lighter was not seaworthy, and the question is, if that is a good defence. There can be no doubt that the warranty was not complied with in this case, if there be any such warranty. This practice of using lighters has been in use for more than 100 years, and no instance has occurred in which the question has been before raised. Two cases have come before the Court respecting a loss on a policy where the goods have been put in lighters; in one the owner of the goods took his own lighter, and in the other he dispensed with using the ship's boats. Whatever may be said of the merchant taking the goods in his own lighter (and when the time comes that may be reconsidered), there is certainly no authority that this plea is a good defence; there was here no warranty that the ship should not only set out seaworthy, but that at Melbourne she should continue to be there seaworthy. Then the defendant in this case undertook to insure the goods until they were safely landed at Melbourne, and one of the usual incidents, and which is covered by the policy, is the employment of local lighters to take the goods to the shore.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Williams has cited many cases to shew that the insurance covers the risk attending the transit of the goods from the vessel to the shore. In addition to the authority of Emerigon, there is, as I collect, the case of Rucker v. the London Assurance Company (2 Bos. & P. 432, note a.) and the case of Hurry v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 Bos. & P. 430). There is also the American case of Parsons v. the Massachusetts Fire and Marine Insurance Company (6 Mass. 197), and further, there is the case of Stewart v. Bell (5 B. & Ald. 238). It therefore seems to me to be plain that the insurance ordinarily extends until the goods have been landed; and if such a case as this be an exception to the rule, it is strange that no case to that effect can be found to be cited in support of it, and I think it only reasonable to suppose that no such case exists. I rather agree with Mr. Williams as to the foundation of the warranty of seaworthiness. If a shipowner insures his vessel, the condition of seaworthiness is one which he can perform; and even if the owner of the cargo insures it, he can see the vessel in which he puts it, or, at all events, he has his remedy against the shipowner; but how different is the case of lighters used at the end of the voyage? What does the owner of the cargo know as to what lighters may be employed to land the goods, and what means has he of seeing that they are fit? He has no means of ascertaining this, and he has no control over the matter. Besides, if he is to be responsible for the fitness of the lighter, the same would apply to the use of rafts or of catamarans off the coast of Madras, so of elephants or of coolies, wherever these might be employed. I therefore think that this insurance extends to the case in question upon this demurrer, and if any doubt were to be entertained on the subject, we should create alarm amongst persons who effect insurances especially on cargoes.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the doctrine of implied warranty of seaworthiness is sought to be extended to what it has never before been extended to. If this were the case in which the voyage consisted of several stages, there might have been such undertaking that there should be seaworthiness for each stage in the way that has been pointed out; but this, in truth, was nothing but the usual mode of landing the goods, and we should, I think, be taking a very dangerous step if we were to extend the warranty to the lighter so employed, as we are asked to do by this plea.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The warranty of seaworthiness is one which the law has grafted on the express contract of insurance, and I think we ought not to carry it any further than the law has already carried it. If we were to decide this case in favour of the underwriter, I think we should be so extending it. It has been argued that a voyage may consist of several stages; if this case had been fairly one of several stages, it might have come within that principle, but I think this was rather an accessory to or an incident of the voyage than forming a separate stage. Here, by the contract, the owner of the goods has most distinctly insured against loss from the ship, so that the parties have in the policy distinctly contemplated this risk and provided expressly for it. To extend the warranty of seaworthiness to the lighter at the end of the voyage would be attended with considerable inconvenience. The goods may often be taken from the vessel to the shore when off a dangerous coast, and if the master was to inquire as to whether the lighter sent was seaworthy, it might increase the risk by the delay it would occasion, and moreover the master might be altogether unable to ascertain the seaworthiness or not of the lighter. I think, therefore, that the implied warranty of seaworthiness does not attach to the lighter, and that the plea is bad.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Sheriff—Action for Escape of Execution Debtor—Measure of Damages—Value of Custody of Debtor.

SHERIFF.—In an action against the sheriff for the escape of an execution debtor, the measure of damages is the value of the custody of the debtor at the time of the escape; but in estimating such value the jury are not limited to the consideration of the actual available means of the debtor, but they may consider, according to the evidence of the case, the value of the chances of the creditor obtaining payment by continuing such imprisonment.

Action against the sheriff of Gloucestershire, for the escape of an execution debtor.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff had recovered a judgment in this court, against Thomas Hartland, for 1,157l. 1s. 9d., and had sued out a ca. sa. upon the said judgment, directed to the Sheriff of Gloucestershire, and that the writ was duly indorsed, with a direction to the said sheriff to satisfy 1,157l. 1s. 9d. and interest at the rate of 5l. per cent. from April, 1865, and was delivered to the defendant, then being such sheriff, to be executed, and that by virtue thereof, the defendant took the said T. Hartland. Breach, that the defendant, against the will of the plaintiff, voluntarily suffered the said T. Hartland to escape out of the custody of the defendant, as such sheriff, by reason of which the plaintiff had lost the said sum and interest so indorsed on the said writ.

Plea, not guilty, and issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Byles, J., at the Middlesex Sittings, after Hilary Term last, when the escape of the execution debtor, through the negligence of the sheriff, was admitted, and the only question was the amount of damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Hartland was arrested on the ca. sa. at the suit of the plaintiff on the 25th of September, 1865, and he made his escape from the sheriff's custody on the 3rd of October following, and evidence was given on the part of the defendant, that at the time of Hartland's escape he was altogether insolvent, and had no property or means of his own wherewith to pay any part of the plaintiff's debt. It appeared, however, that the judgment which the plaintiff had recovered against Hartland was founded on bills of exchange which had been indorsed by Hartland as surety for the other parties to such bills, and that, after judgment had been signed, and within a fortnight of the arrest, Hartland's attorney, Mr. Edmonds, had, on behalf of his client, offered to pay a composition of 6s. in the pound on the plaintiff's debt, provided the bills on which the judgment had been obtained were given up, in order that Hartland might recover thereon what he could from the other parties. The offer was not accepted. At the trial, Mr. Edmonds stated that this offer was made by him, nominally, in his client's name, but really with the view of applying what monies he might recover from the other parties to the bills in reduction of a debt of 800*l.* which was owing to him from Hartland. There were, however, only two persons whose names were on the bills from whom Mr. Edmonds stated he expected to recover, and one of these had been released previously to such offer, having compromised his liability to the plaintiff for 500*l.* This 500*l.* had been paid since the escape, so that the balance due to the plaintiff was reduced to 657*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* It further appeared from the cross-examination of one of the defendant's witnesses, that Hartland had a father living, who was a man of wealth and of a very advanced age, being in his 100th year. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say to what extent the plaintiff had been prejudiced by the escape, telling them that the true measure of damages was, what was the value of the chances that if the imprisonment had been continued the remaining debt, or any part of it, would by that imprisonment have been extorted.

A rule nisi was subsequently obtained to set aside such verdict and for a new trial (unless the plaintiff would consent to reduce the verdict to nominal damages), on the ground that the above direction was a misdirection, and that the Judge also misdirected the jury in not telling them to consider only the means or resources of the execution debtor himself, and that the damages on the evidence should be nominal; and also on the ground that the jury found a verdict for substantial damages against the evidence.

Karslake and Henry James now shewed cause.—The question arises on the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98. s. 31, which has limited the remedy against a sheriff for an escape on final process to an action on the case for such damages as the execution creditor may have sustained by reason of such escape. The case of Clifton v. Hooper (6 Q.B. Rep. 468; s.c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 1), which was referred to by the counsel for the defendant at the trial, does not really touch this case; and the only case in which the question of assessing the damages in such an action as this has been considered is that of Arden v. Goodacre (11 Com. B. Rep. 371; s.c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 184). There it was decided that the true measure of damages, in an action against the sheriff for an escape, is the value of the custody of the debtor at the moment of the escape. This case is referred to by Mr. Sedgwick in his Treatise on the Measure of Damages, 2nd edit. p. 512, who, remarking on it, says, "It is plain that this leaves the whole subject at very loose ends. What is meant by the value of the security of the body of a debtor who cannot pay? Are his physical and mental qualifications to be gone into, and the chance of his subsequently acquiring property to be estimated? Are the chances of his friends being induced or coerced by reason of his imprisonment into paying the debt to be inquired of?"—"It is plain that the whole subject in England is in a state of perplexing uncertainty." It is submitted that the direction of the learned Judge was right, and that the true mode of ascertaining what the value of the custody of the debtor is to the execution creditor is, not as suggested by the defendant, by considering only what means the debtor himself has of satisfying the debt, but by seeing whether the custody was not likely to result in the debt, or some part of it, being paid. A man may have no money, but he may have credit or friends, by which the money may be borrowed or got. In the present case there was an offer of a composition in the pound made on behalf of the debtor shortly before the arrest; and there was also the circumstance that the debtor was the son of a very wealthy man; and all these were matters well worthy the consideration of the jury in determining the value of the debtor's custody at the time of his escape. The cases of Duckworth v. Johnson (4 Hurl. & N. 653; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 25) and Pym v. the Great Northern Railway Company (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 249) were decisions as to the damages recoverable under Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, in case of death by negligence.

Macnamara, in support of the rule.—It is submitted that in estimating the damages recoverable against a sheriff for an escape, the jury ought not to look beyond the means and resources of the debtor at the time of his escape; that is the only way of ascertaining the value at that time of the custody of the debtor to the creditor, which, according to Arden v. Goodacre (11 Com. B. Rep. 371; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 184), is the true measure of the damages in such an action as this. It may be that it is not limited to only such means of the debtor as were actually available at the time of the escape; but they ought to be such as the debtor then had such a possessory interest in, or title to, as would enable him then to realize and make available. Least of all, the jury had no right to look at the circumstances of any of the relations of the debtor. If once the rule now suggested be departed from, and the inquiry extended to the means of friends and relatives, there would be nothing but great uncertainty and confusion. The cases under Lord Campbell's Act are not parallel cases with the present. There the question is, what compensation shall be awarded to the children of one who has been killed by negligence? But here the only question is, what is requisite in order to put the execution creditor in the condition he was in before the debtor escaped?

[KEATING, J.—What if the debtor was the heir-at-law to an estate?]

There would be then something tangible for estimating the value. That is very different from this case. The debtor here was hopelessly insolvent at the time of the escape, and he had nothing from which he could raise the means of paying anything. The case of Arden v. Goodacre (11 Com. B. Rep. 371; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 184) is in favour of the defendant's proposition; it shows that the damages are confined to the value of the custody of the debtor at the time of the escape, "if the execution debtor," says Chief Justice Jervis in delivering the judgment of the Court in that case, "had not the means of satisfying the judgment at the moment of the escape, the plaintiff will have lost only the security of the debtor's body, and the damages may be small." With respect to the offer of 6s. in the pound made by Edmonds, that was made by him as a speculation of his own, and on the condition only that the bills were given up with power for him to sue the other parties whose names were on those bills. Besides, there was nothing to shew that there was any probability of that offer being renewed. According to the American authorities, the burden of proof is thrown on the officer; but if it shew that the execution creditor has lost nothing by the escape, and that the debtor is insolvent, the damages will be only nominal—Sedgwick on Damages, 2nd edit. pp. 509 to 517.

KEATING, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The rule was moved for on the ground that the learned Judge misdirected the jury in telling them to consider the value of the chances, that if the imprisonment had been continued the debt would have been thereby extorted. Now, this was an action against the sheriff for the escape of an execution debtor, and it has been suggested on the part of the defendant that the learned Judge at the trial should have confined the attention of the jury to what were the actual resources of the debtor at the time of his escape. I am of opinion that that would have been a misdirection, because in an action of this kind the means of the execution debtor would not be the true measure of the damages. The detention in custody of the debtor's body is valuable only to the creditor as a means of pressure to obtain payment of the debt. The rule as to the measure of damages in these actions is stated to be the value of the custody of the debtor at the time of the escape. That seems to me to be a correct rule, but then comes the question, how is that value to be ascertained? I think it can only be ascertained by seeing what is the value of the pressure. It is extremely difficult to draw the line, and still more difficult to express it in terms. I therefore look at the circumstances of the present case. Here it appears that the execution debtor was insolvent, that is to say, he had no actual existing resources available to obtain his discharge. But there were certain facts on which the jury might act; first, there was the offer by the attorney of the execution debtor to pay 6s. in the pound. It is true he explained what induced him to make that offer, but the jury might or might not be satisfied with such explanation. Secondly, there was the evidence that the execution debtor was the son of a man of property who was of an advanced age. I think it was clearly within the rule, that the jury might look at the offer of 6s. in the pound, coupled with the position of the debtor, with reference to his being connected with a family of wealth, and consider how far the latter circumstance might be a solution of the reason of the offer having been made. Therefore they might consider the chance of any part of the debt being so paid, and thus they might find what the value of the result of pressure might reasonably be expected to be. If this be so, I think there is no ground for disturbing the verdict, because if the jury took that view of the matter the damages would be extremely moderate. There is no ground for saying that the damages should be only nominal, and they seem to me to be most reasonable.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only guide which the learned Judge had was the rule laid down in Arden v. Goodacre (11 Com. B. Rep. 371; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 184), that the measure of damages is the value of the custody of the debtor at the moment of escape. The question is, how that value is to be ascertained? It is said by the learned counsel for the defendant, that there is no value in the custody of the debtor except from the actual resources of the debtor available at that time. I think that is too narrow a construction, for I think the value is made up of the possibilities of the debt being paid by reason of the duress. In all cases it must be entirely problematical whether anything will be paid, and, therefore, the chances of payment must be considered with reference to the surrounding circumstances, and the decision in this case can form no ground for the measure of damages in any other class of cases. This action is a peculiar one. Originally the sheriff was liable for the whole amount of the debt; but the legislature, considering that a hardship, has relieved him from the payment of the entire debt, but left him open to an action on the case for the damages sustained by the person at whose suit the debtor was imprisoned, without giving any rule for assessing such damages. Consequently, the question is, what is the value of the custody of the debtor at the time of the escape? And I think my Brother Byles was right in asking the jury to consider what in their opinion was the value of the chances of payment by continuing the imprisonment. It appears that there was evidence of an offer having been made of 6s. in the pound, and the jury might have thought that that offer would be repeated. Then there was the other fact, that the debtor was the son of a wealthy man, who was nearly 100 years old. Supposing the father's wealth consisted of land, and the debtor was the heir-at-law, it would be difficult to say that the jury should not estimate the probability of his inheriting the land; and so, if the wealth consisted of personalty, and the debtor was the next-of-kin, there equally seems to be no reason why this should not be considered by the jury. On the whole, it seems to me that my Brother Byles did right in asking the jury to consider what was the value of the chances (according to the evidence in the case) of the creditor obtaining payment from the imprisonment if the debtor had not escaped.

BYLES, J.—I have nothing to add to what has been said by the other members of the Court, except that I think that the damages given by the jury were both moderate and reasonable.

Rule discharged.

KIDSTON AND OTHERS v. THE EMPIRE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

35 L. J. C.P. 250; L. R. 1 C.P. 535; 15 L. T. 12; 15 W. R. 63; 12 Jur. N.S. 665: affirmed, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 156; L. R. 2 C.P. 357; 16 L. T. 119; 15 W. R. 769 (Ex. Ch.).

Ship and Shipping—Insurance—Chartered Freight—Expenses in conveying Cargo to save Loss of Freight—Suing and Labouring Clause—Particular Average—Usage.

MARINE INSURANCE. SHIPPING.—The plaintiffs, whose vessel was chartered to bring a cargo of guano to the United Kingdom for certain freight, payable after arrival at the port of discharge, effected an insurance with the defendants on the chartered freight by a policy containing the usual suing and labouring clause, and also the exception, "warranted free from particular average, also from jettison, unless the ship be stranded, sunk or burnt." In the course of the voyage the ship was driven by weather to put into Rio, where she became a total loss, without being "stranded, sunk or burnt"; but the cargo was safely landed at Rio, and, without notice of abandonment by the plaintiffs, was sent on in another vessel to the port of discharge, and the plaintiffs afterwards received the chartered freight.—Held, that the expenses of conveying the cargo from Rio to the port of discharge, having been incurred to save the subject-matter of insurance from a loss, could be recovered under the suing and labouring clause, notwithstanding there had been no abandonment; since such clause is not limited to cases where the assured abandons.

Held, also, that the right to recover such expenses under that clause was not excluded by the warranty against particular average, as there was a danger of the total loss of freight by reason of the loss of the ship by perils insured against and the expenses were incurred for the benefit of the defendants in averting loss for which they would have been liable.

Semble—That evidence that by the usage, in the business of marine insurance, the term "particular average" does not include expenses of recovering or preserving the subject-matter of the insurance, would be admissible, since it would not contradict the express terms of the policy.

Action to recover 1,145*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* upon a policy of insurance for 2,000*l.*, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, on chartered freight, valued at 5,000*l.*

The declaration contained a count on the policy, and the common money counts.

The only claims in the declaration which are material for the purpose of this case are, first, a claim of the sum of 2,000*l.*, insured on the ground of the total loss of the chartered freight; secondly, a claim, under the suing and labouring clause of the aforesaid policy, for the charges and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs, by reason of the plaintiffs, their factors, servants and assigns, suing, labouring and travelling in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the subject-matter of the insurance; and, thirdly, a claim for money paid to the defendant's use.

The defendants pleaded to the first of the above-mentioned claims, in substance, that the ship was not stranded, sunk or burnt, and that the loss was a particular average loss. And, to the second of the above-mentioned claims, their pleas were, in substance, first, that the charges and expenses so incurred as aforesaid constituted and were only particular average losses, from which the subject-matter of the insurance was warranted free; secondly, that a loss or misfortune did not arise within the true intent and meaning of the policy; and, thirdly, that there was no suing, labouring or travelling in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the subject-matter of the insurance, within the true intent and meaning of the policy.

To the common counts they pleaded never indebted.

Upon these pleas issues were joined; and the plaintiffs also demurred to the plea, setting up that the charges were particular average losses.

The cause was tried, before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865, when the following facts appeared in evidence:

The plaintiffs, who were owners of the ship Sebastopol, chartered that vessel to Messrs. Thomson & Co., by a charter-party, according to which the ship was to proceed to the Chincha Islands, there to load a cargo of guano, and thence to proceed with the said cargo to the United Kingdom for the stipulated freight of 75*s.* sterling in full per ton of 20 cwt., net weight, of guano at the Queen's beam, such freight to be paid as follows: viz., 1,000*l.* in cash on arrival at port of discharge; three months' interest, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent., being deducted; and the balance forty-eight hours after the delivery of the whole cargo.

On the 18th of August, 1863, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants the policy of insurance, on which this action was brought, on a chartered freight, valued at 5,000*l.*, in respect of goods laden on board the Sebastopol, warranted free from particular average, also from jettison, unless the ship should be stranded, sunk or burnt. The voyage insured by the said policy covered the aforesaid chartered voyage to the Chincha Islands, and thence to the United Kingdom. The policy also contained the usual suing and labouring clauses.

The Sebastopol loaded a cargo of guano at the Chincha Islands, and sailed therewith for Cork; but in the course of the voyage she was compelled, by heavy storms and the damage she sustained, to put into Rio Janeiro, where the cargo of guano was discharged and warehoused. The ship, being found to be so damaged by the perils of the seas as not to be worth repairing, was sold by the master at Rio, on the 31st of March, 1864, and it was admitted that she was then a total loss.

On the 12th of March, 1864, the master of the Sebastopol chartered the ship Caprice, at a freight of 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ton, for the purpose of bringing the said cargo of guano from Rio to the United Kingdom, and afterwards the cargo was accordingly loaded on board the Caprice, and conveyed by that ship to Bristol, and there duly delivered to the owners of such cargo, Messrs. Thomson & Co., who then paid the chartered freight of 5,000*l.* in full to the plaintiffs, no part of which, however, was received by the defendants. The plaintiffs did not give any notice of abandonment to the defendants.

All the expenses incurred at Rio in discharging, warehousing and transshipping the goods did not, together with the freight payable to the owners of the Caprice, exceed 3,000*l.*

It was contended at the trial, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they were entitled to recover the expenses incurred by them in conveying the aforesaid cargo of guano to the Caprice from the warehouses at Rio, which expenses were less than 100*l.*, and also the sum of 2,467*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*, which they had paid to the owners of the Caprice for carrying the said cargo from Rio to the United Kingdom. The plaintiffs claimed, therefore, in this action the defendants' proportion of these sums according to the amount insured by the said policy, and which came to 1,145*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* The defendants, on the other hand, contended that they were not liable on the said policy to repay to the plaintiffs any part of the said expenses, nor any part of the said sum of 2,467*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*

At the trial, several average adjusters and other witnesses were called to prove the meaning of the term "particular average" in the business of marine insurance, and the jury found that up to the time of the policy in question there had been in the business of marine insurance a well-known and definite meaning, affixed by long usage between the assured and the underwriters, to the term "particular average," as contradistinguished from the term "particular charges" in the manner described by the witnesses, viz., that particular average denotes actual damage done to or loss of part of the subject-matter of insurance; but that it does not include any expenses or charges incurred in recovering or preserving the subject-matter of insurance, and that expenses incurred in warehousing and forwarding goods are not particular average, but are termed "particular charges."

Upon this finding of the jury a verdict was, by the consent of the parties and by the direction of the learned Judge, entered for the plaintiffs, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to set aside the verdict, and to enter a verdict for the defendants or a nonsuit.

In Hilary Term last a rule was accordingly obtained by the defendants, calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict be entered for the defendants, or a nonsuit pursuant to the leave reserved, on the grounds, first, that the charges in question were not within the clause in the policy respecting suing and labouring, and that no other part of the policy was applicable to the case; secondly, that the custom alleged was a universal custom, and not a custom of any particular place or trade; thirdly, that there was no evidence that the alleged custom prevailed in Liverpool, where the policy was made, at the time the policy was so made.¹

It was agreed that the demurrer should abide the result of the rule.

E. James and Sir G. Honyman shewed cause against the rule.—These charges are recoverable under the suing and labouring clause in the policy. That clause is for the benefit of the underwriters, and to remove what might otherwise be a temptation to the assured not to endeavour to save the subject-matter of the assurance. The defendants will rely on The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders (1 Best & S. 41; s. c. 2 Ibid. 266; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 218; 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 206) and Booth v. Gair (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 291; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 99); but in those cases the money sought to be recovered had not been paid to avert a total loss, and therefore the principle of those cases do not apply to this case. The shipowner was not bound to have sent the goods on after the loss of the vessel, and if he had not done so the defendants in this case would have been liable on the policy for a total loss of freight—Shipton v. Thornton (9 Ad. & El. 314; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 73), Farnworth v. Hyde (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 835; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 207), Vlierboom v. Chapman (13 Mee. & W. 230; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 384) and Cuadra v. Swann (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 772), in which last case all the authorities are to be found collected. Further, the evidence was properly admitted to shew that the term "particular average" is a term of art and has acquired a meaning very different from the charges incurred here in forwarding the cargo. What is "particular average" is very fully explained in a learned note by Mr. Maclachlan, in his edition of Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit. p. 739; and Taylor on Evidence, 4th edit. ss. 1059, 1060, 1062 and 1063. Clayton v. Gregson (5 Ad. & E. 302) and Gorriessen v. Perrin (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 681; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 29) shew how evidence of usage may be resorted to in explaining the meaning of words in written instruments. Then, if the policy here be read with the meaning which according to the finding of the jury ought to be given to "particular average," the charges which the plaintiffs seek to recover are not particular average charges excepted by the warranty.

(1) The above statement of facts has been taken from the case settled for appeal to the Exchequer Chamber.

Mellish and Cohen, in support of the rule.—There was no actual total loss of freight, neither, it is submitted, was there a constructive total loss. If the goods were in such a state that they could be carried to their port of destination, and the master was not prevented from earning the freight, there would be no total loss of the freight—Michael v. Gillespy (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 627; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 306) and Philpot v. Suann (30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 358). As long as the goods remained and there was no notice of abandonment, there was always a prospect of earning the freight, and therefore no total loss, but only a partial loss. The master merely abstaining to send the goods on by another ship would not necessarily constitute a total loss—Phillips on Insurance, s. 1632, where it is said, "If the ship is rendered innavigable and cannot be repaired for the prosecution of the voyage, and another can be procured within a reasonable time and distance, and the master has means to procure such other at an expense materially less than the amount of the freight for the voyage, the underwriter on freight or profits is not liable to be prejudiced by the master's neglect to tranship any more than the underwriter upon the cargo, and the loss will be adjusted as if the cargo had been transhipped and forwarded, and will be partial or total according to the amount of the loss." The policy in this case being with a warranty of free from particular average, the suing and labouring clause, the origin of which is given by Emerigon, c. 17, s. 7, cannot apply unless the expense has been incurred to avoid a total loss. There being here only a partial loss and not a total loss, the expense incurred was a particular average which, being within the warranty, could not be recovered from the underwriters. The case is not distinguishable from that of The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders (1 Best & S. 41; s. c. 2 Ibid. 266; 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 218; 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 206). Then, as to the evidence of the meaning given by usage to the term "particular average," all the authorities shew that that term applies to and includes the expenses incurred in relation to the property insured—Emerigon, c. 12, s. 39, Benecke's Practice of Indemnity, 165, 166, Droit Mar. 481, Code de Commerce, lib. 2, tit. 11, art. 403, 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit. p. 826, Phillips on Insurance, s. 1422; and Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court in The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders (1 Best & S. 41; s. c. 2 Ibid. 266; 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 218; 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 206), adopts what is said by Phillips on Insurance, s. 1767, where he says that an insurance against total loss only and an insurance with the exception of particular average are equivalent forms. The usage set up and relied on by the plaintiffs would contradict the written policy, for it would alter the meaning of the term "particular average" as known in the law, and that cannot be done—Hall v. Janson (4 El. & B. 500; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 97).

WILLES, J., now (May 8) delivered the judgment of the Court (Erle, C.J., Willes, J., Keating, J., and Montague Smith, J.).—Many points were made upon the argument of this rule, upon one of which only is it necessary to pronounce an opinion. That turned upon the construction of the suing and labouring clause in the policy, and it may be considered under the following heads: first, whether the expenses incurred were of a character to be within the clause; secondly, whether the occasion upon which they were incurred was such as to be within it; thirdly, whether, if it was such, the application of the clause is excluded by the warranty against particular average. As to the first question, it was hardly disputed that the expenses incurred were of a character to be within the clause. Without incurring them, the subject-matter of the insurance would never have had any complete existence. They were incurred in order to earn it, and they represented so much labour beyond and besides the ordinary labour of the voyage rendered necessary for the salvation of the subject-matter of insurance by reason of a damage and loss within the scope of the policy, the immediate effect of which was, that the subject-matter insured would also be lost, or rather would never come into existence, unless such labour was bestowed. As the goods lay at Rio, no part of the chartered freight had accrued due, and no freight, even pro rata itineris, could have been claimed by the shipowner. His only right in respect of chartered freight was to detain the goods for a reasonable time in order to send them on in another vessel to their destination, and then claim an amount equal to that of the chartered freight. In order to do so labour must be used and expenses incurred. It can make no difference whether the shipowner happens to have at the port of distress a vessel of his own which he can employ in this service, in which case the labour of forwarding would be strictly that of himself or his servants, or whether he forwards in the vessel of another upon paying for his labour and that of his servants. Nor can it make any difference in the application of the clause, whether, as here, the goods are in a port of large resort, or where, by reason of the rate of freight, a forwarding vessel is easily procured, or whether the vessel becomes a wreck in an out-of-the-way place, and by unusual enterprise and skill the master is enabled to communicate with a vessel, either of his owner or of some other person, by which he forwards the cargo to its destination. The amount of labour is different in degree in the two cases, but in each it is a consequence of a peril insured against; it is incurred in preventing the destruction of nonentity of the subject-matter for which, in the event of its loss, the underwriters must be answerable; there is in each case a loss or misfortune threatening the safety of the subject-matter of the insurance, and by the operation of which, unless averted by labour, that subject-matter will be imperilled and the underwriters may become liable.

As to the second head, whether the occasion upon which the expenses were incurred was such as to be within the suing and labouring clause, this depends upon the true answer to the question, so thoroughly discussed in the course of the argument, namely, whether the clause ought to be limited in construction to a case where the assured abandons, or may perchance abandon, so that the expense incurred is not only in respect of a subject-matter in which the underwriters are interested, but upon property which by the abandonment actually becomes or may become theirs; or whether it extends to every case in which the subject of insurance is exposed to loss or danger for the consequence of which the underwriters would be answerable, and in warding off which labour is expended. In the former construction the clause is inapplicable to the present case; in the latter it is applicable, and the assured is entitled to contribution. The question manifestly depends upon the construction of the language of the clause; and quite apart from the proved usage, we think the latter is the true construction. The words of the ordinary suing and labouring clause (to which in this policy is superadded an express provision as to abandonment, upon which one need only say in passing that it does not alter the question in favour of the underwriters) are used in the same form as must have been in common use before 1783, when Emerigon published his great work on Insurance, in which, amongst the various forms of the clause used at different ports, that of the London policy then used is given.² The words are quite general, and ought to be so construed, unless some good reason is given for restraining them, that "in case of any loss or misfortune it shall be lawful" to "sue, labour and travail for, in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter," "without prejudice to this insurance" (not "abandonment," as in the French ordonnance hereinafter cited), "the charges whereof the said company will bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured" (not "the amount saved," as in the French ordonnance). Up to this point there is not a word about abandonment, and that is the whole of the usual clause. The meaning is obvious, that if an occasion should occur where, by reason of a peril insured against, unusual labour or expense is rendered necessary to prevent a loss for which the underwriters would be answerable, and such labour or expense is incurred accordingly, the underwriters will contribute thereto, not as part of the sum insured in case of loss or damage, because it may be that loss or damage for which they would be liable is averted by the labour bestowed, but as a contribution on their part, as persons who have avoided detriment by the result, in proportion to what they would have had to pay if such detriment had come to a head for want of timely care. Take, for instance, the case of a policy on goods warranted free of average under 5l. per cent. wetted in a storm which drives the ship into a port of distress, when by drying, at an expense of less than 5l. per cent., the goods might be saved, or only damaged under 5l. per cent.; whilst if not dried they would decay and become damaged over 5l. per cent., they existing in specie, so that freight would be payable. In this case there is no abandonment, and, may be, no prospect of one, and yet it is the duty of the master to use all reasonable means to preserve the goods, and obviously for the interest of the underwriters to encourage him in the performance of that duty by contributing to the expense incurred. Not only the generality of the words, but also the subject-matter to which they relate, therefore, point to the application of the clause to all cases in which the underwriter is saved from liability to loss, whether partial or total, and whether an abandonment does or may possibly take place or not.

There remains to be considered, thirdly, whether the application of the suing and labouring clause is excluded in this particular case by the warranty against particular average—"warranted free from particular average, also from jettison, unless the ship be stranded, sunk or burnt;" and this depends upon whether the expression "particular average" in the context, and construed, according to the golden rule, by what goes before and what follows in the policy, includes expenses which fall within the suing and labouring clause, so that in effect the suing and labouring clause is expunged by the warranty. This is a question the answer to which involves most important consequences, because, if the warranty against particular average, or, to use a more accurate expression with the same meaning, the insurance against total loss only, excludes the operation of the suing and labouring clause, even where an impending total loss is averted by extraordinary exertion and expense, it must be because the word "average" has some fixed and definite meaning, so rigid and inelastic that it cannot be modified or limited so as to apply to loss of or damage to the thing insured (the sense in which it has been hitherto understood by average staters), but that it must needs also include contribution to any labour incurred in the defence and safeguard of the thing insured, so that even an express clause left standing in the policy, with reference to such labour (the suing and labouring clause) must be rejected as inconsistent with the warranty. If that be so, it must equally be true of all memorandum goods which are warranted free from average under a certain percentage, and the operation of this would be so general, is not universal that the suing and labouring clause would be confined to the cases excepted in the memorandum alone. Two results would follow, both novel in practice, and one at least very remarkable. The first would be unfavourable to the underwriters in a novel way, because the memorandum was framed to protect them from frivolous demands in respect of small losses, which are most likely to have arisen from natural deterioration or wear and tear. The exception of stranding tends to shew that this was the scope of the memorandum, for it is the exception of such a loss as makes it probable that the deterioration of the goods, though under the given per-centage, was, nevertheless, not to be attributed to the perishable nature of the goods themselves. Accordingly, the rule has been to pay for damage to memorandum articles only when it exceeded the specified per-centage, and not to allow this per-centage to be eked out by expenses falling within the suing and labouring clause. Thus, in the case already put, of goods wetted by a storm, the amount of expense reasonably incurred in preserving the goods is according to the present practice contributed to under the suing and labouring clause, however small in the result the loss or damage to the goods, whilst the loss or damage of the goods is paid if it amounts to the stipulated per-centage, but not otherwise, and the amount of expenses is not added in order to make up that per-centage. Thus take the agreed per-centage at 5*l.* per cent., if the expense amount to 2*l.* per cent., and the loss or damage to 3*l.* per cent., only the expenses are paid, and not the average. But if we hold that the warranty excludes the application of the suing and labouring clause, the whole must be paid, and the underwriters will be exposed to the very inconvenience which the memorandum has been supposed to obviate. Upon the other hand, if the expenses should be less than the per-centage and a loss is thereby prevented, altogether, or reduced to an extent less than the per-centage, as if in the case put the expenses were 3*l.* per cent. and the damage only 1*l.* per cent., according to the present practice, the underwriters would pay the expenses; but if we decide for the present defendants, the underwriters, although saved from loss, would be altogether exempt from contribution. In our view, however, we are not compelled to adopt so inconvenient and impracticable a conclusion. The word "average," far from being a term of art (except in so far as, according to the evidence, usage may have limited its meaning to loss or damage to the goods themselves), or a word with a rigid or unchanging signification, necessarily including expenses in the defence or safeguard of the subject-matter insured, is a word used in a great variety of phrases, as applicable to different subject-matters, and not with any fixed or settled application. It would be tedious to go through the various uses to which it is applied, and we need do no more than refer to the instances cited in argument, and more especially to the very learned note of Mr. Maclachlan in 2 Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit. p. 739. Amongst the various uses to which the word has been applied, no doubt that of "small expenses" is one, as in the usual clause of a charter-party. So in the case of insurance itself, expenses must often be taken into account in determining whether there has been a loss or not, but only because a thing is lost in insurance law, which cannot be got back except at an expense equal to its value when recovered. The question, here, however, is not as to the extension of which the term "average" is capable, but of the sense in which it ought to be understood in the particular context with which it is, if possible, to be reconciled, and read so that effect may be given to every provision in the instrument. Nor is it to be forgotten that the suing and labouring clause, which, for the reasons already stated, specially provides for those cases, has been allowed to remain a part of the policy, and that a special provision as to a particular subject-matter is to be preferred to general language, which might have governed in the absence of such special provision. Generalia specialibus non derogant, specialia generalibus derogant. In our opinion, quite apart from usage, the true construction of the policy, as reconciling and giving effect to all its provisions is, that the warranty against particular average does no more than limit the insurance to total loss of the freight by the perils insured against, without reference to extraordinary labour or expense which may be incurred by the assured in preserving the freight from loss, or rather from never becoming due by reason of the operation of perils insured against; and that the latter expenses are specially provided for by the suing and labouring clause, and may be recovered thereunder.

Much reliance was placed for the defendants upon two recent decisions, which were said to have determined that there could be no liability under the suing and labouring clause when there was none under the policy—The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders (1 Best & S. 41; s. c. 2 Ibid. 266; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 218; 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 206) and Booth v. Gair (13 Mee. & W. 230; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 384). Before those decisions the liability of the underwriters appears to have been universally admitted and acted upon, even in the cases where the expenses were incurred to forward goods existing in specie at the port of distress, and warranted free from particular average, so that no liability could accrue to the underwriters by their not being forwarded. Probably the underwriters, up to the time of the first of those decisions, thought it so important to encourage honest efforts to preserve and forward the cargo, or otherwise to preserve the subject-matter of insurance, that they preferred paying in all unsuspicious cases, without nice inquiries as to whether the expenses had in the particular instance averted liability. In doing so they not only acted with liberality, but no doubt also best studied their own interest, and whilst they calculated the premium so as to include a remuneration for the extra liability which they were satisfied to bear, they, probably, at the same time found that the encouragement to fair dealing thereby afforded was their best security against the more serious losses that might arise from neglect of precautions of which the expense was to be thrown upon the assured. This practice, however, could not prevail to alter or enlarge the application of the suing and labouring clause, because although usage may impose a meaning upon a word such as "average" it cannot alter the rules of construction, and in the cases referred to the decision and the sole decision was, that freight and other expenses of forwarding from a port of distress to the port of destination goods warranted free of particular average, under circumstances in which the underwriter could not have been liable if the expenses were not incurred, was not within the true intent and meaning of the suing and labouring clause, which, in the contract of insurance, could only extend to suing and labouring by means of which the underwriters might obtain a benefit. In The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders (1 Best & S. 41; s. c. 2 Ibid. 266; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 218; 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 206) the goods were iron rails from Bombay, shipped to be paid for lost or not lost. They were insured with a warranty free of particular average, unless the ship should be stranded, sunk or burnt. The vessel on her way put into Plymouth, where she was a total loss, but she was not stranded, sunk or burnt. The rails were saved and sent on in other vessels, and for the freight paid upon such forwarding the underwriters were held not to be liable: and Mr. Justice Blackburn, in delivering the judgment of the Court, carefully abstained from deciding the question now before us, for he said, "It is not necessary to decide whether an underwriter on a policy against total loss only is under this clause liable for expenses incurred by the assured for the purpose of rescuing the subject-matter of an insurance from a state of peril which might have resulted in a total loss, but did not. There are reasons both for and against this stated by Mr. Phillips in his Treatise on Insurance, section 1777, and the question seems never to have been actually decided. But in the present case it does not arise. The expenses here were incurred for the purpose of forwarding the subject-matter of insurance to its destination at a time when the iron was not in any peril of total loss either actual or constructive. Had the insured chosen, instead of paying this extra freight, to sell the rails in England, as he might have done if he pleased, he could have made no claim on the underwriters, for it would not have been a constructive total loss, according to Rosetto v. Gurney (11 Com. B. Rep. 176; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 257), unless the amount of the extra freight exceeded the value of the goods when forwarded, which is not the case here; and an actual total loss is out of the question." That judgment was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (2 Best & S. 266; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 206), where Chief Justice Erle in like manner, delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "The expenses that can be recovered under the suing, labouring and travelling clauses, are expenses incurred to prevent impending loss within the meaning of the policy. Now, here, the goods were given up to the plaintiffs in perfect safety, and the question is, were those expenses incurred to prevent a total loss? Had the owners a right when the goods were given into their possession to turn the transaction into a total loss? Certainly not, for they had the goods in specie, and consequently that 82*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* had no reference to suing, labouring or travelling to prevent such a loss." That case was followed by Booth v. Gair (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 291; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 99), in which bacon was insured upon a voyage from Liverpool to New York "free from average, unless general or the ship was stranded, sunk or burnt." The vessel on her way by perils of the sea, but without being stranded, sunk or burnt, became disabled and put into Bermuda, where she was constructively totally lost. The bacon was landed in specie, and was not totally lost, either constructively or otherwise. No expenses appear to have been incurred in saving the goods from a total loss, which was negatived, for certain expenses were incurred in the way of extra freight, transhipment, warehousing, surveying and cooperage, all of which were treated as expenses of forwarding the goods. It was further proved that it was the practice of underwriters on goods to pay such expenses, under like circumstances, under the name of particular charges. The judgment was for the underwriters, upon the ground stated by Chief Justice Erle, namely, that "what the master did was in discharge of his duty in ordinary course, and there was no peril creating a risk of a total loss from which the underwriter was saved by the expenses in question. There were no other perils than such as are always attendant on the transit of goods by the voyage in question." No notice appears to have been taken of the practice of underwriters, probably for the reason already mentioned, that although usage might give to the words "average" or "particular average," or "average unless general," a conventional meaning, so as to make them include partial loss or damage of the subject-matter only, and not what are known as "particular charges" which fall within the suing and labouring clause, yet such usage could not control the construction of the policy, by which that clause must be limited in application to cases in which the underwriter might incur liability, and therefore might derive a benefit from the extraordinary exertion. These decisions, therefore, are inapplicable to the present case, and when examined prove to be anything but authority for the defendants. Passages from Emerigon were cited by the defendants' counsel, and much relied upon, in which a contrary opinion is supposed to have been expressed to that upon which we found our judgment. In the first volume, page 600, of Boulay-Paty's edition, treating of general and particular average as between the owner of ship, freight and goods, he says: "Les frais faits pour sauver la marchandise, sont avaries simples pour le compte des propriétaires." He refers to the 17th chapter, section 7, for a discussion of the question of liability as between the insurer and the assured, either with or without a suing and labouring clause, and in that which is the part of the work applicable to the present subject, he throughout treats the question as one depending upon the very words of the suing and labouring clause. Nothing can make this more clear than a reference to his treatment of the question, "Si les frais de sauvetage excèdent la valeur des effets sauvés, cet excédant est-il à la charge des assureurs?" To which he answers: "Suivant les clauses insérées dans les formules de diverses places de commerce, les assureurs, indépendamment des sommes par eux assurées, sont tenus de payer l'excédant des frais de sauvetage." He then sets out the forms of the suing and labouring clause used at Antwerp, Rouen, Nantes and Bordeaux, and refers to a similar one (Loccenius, page 981,) by which the underwriters undertake for expenses incurred in the safeguard of the goods, even although no benefit should follow; and he remarks thereupon, "Par ces formules les pouvoirs les plus libres sont donnés à l'assuré et à ses représentans, afin de les inviter à travailler au sauvetage, sans être arrêtés par la crainte d'en supporter eux-mêmes les frais; mais les assureurs, en souscrivant pareils pactes, contractent à l'aveugle un engagement dont les conséquences sont indéfinies." He then gives the London form of suing and labouring clause as still used, and he proceeds to say that the Marseilles policy (with which he was so familiar) contained nothing of the sort, and that an express authority to sue and labour was necessary in order to charge the Marseilles underwriters with the expenses. This view, so far as it bears upon the present argument, is in accordance with the view of the London average staters, and favours a distinction between loss and damage to the thing assured, and expenses incurred in its protection, and a separate provision for the latter. In fact, the key to the French authorities is to be found in the positive law of France upon the subject, by which, in the absence of express contract, contribution on the part of the underwriters was enforced in the case of the greater peril of shipwreck or stranding, and then only to the value of the property saved for the underwriter. Thus, by the Ordonnance de la Marine, of 1681, lib. 3, tit. 6, art. 45, "En cas de naufrage ou échouement, l'assuré pourra travailler au recouvrement des effets naufragés, sans préjudice du délaissement qu'il pourra faire en temps et lieu, et du remboursement de ses frais dont il sera cru sur son affirmation jusqu'à concurrence de la valeur des effets recouvrés." This is followed closely, though not exactly, by the Code de Commerce, art. 381, with the difference that the latter, by using the word "doit" instead of "pourra," makes such exertions the duty, and not merely the privilege of the assured. Read by the light of this text of the Ordonnance the views of Emerigon, so far from being opposed to, are in favour of the construction which we adopt.

Hitherto we have only adverted in passing to the evidence and the finding of the jury, upon the understood meaning in the business of marine insurance of the phrase "particular average." If necessary, we should have been prepared to hold that the evidence established such an understood meaning, according to which "particular average" does not include "particular charges," and to act upon such usage as equally sound with the express part of the contract. It is needless, however, to enlarge upon this part of the case, because, upon the facts proved and the true construction of the policy itself, we have, for the reasons already given, come to the conclusion, that there was a danger of the total loss of the freight by reason of the loss of the ship by perils insured against; that the measures taken by the plaintiff to avert that loss, and the expenses incurred therein, were taken and incurred to the benefit of the underwriters in averting loss for which they would have been liable, and so that they were within the suing and labouring clause, and that the underwriters are liable to contribute thereto. It is satisfactory, however, to think that in arriving at this conclusion upon the meaning of the contract into which the defendants have entered, we are deciding also in accordance with the approved usage of commerce.

The verdict for the plaintiff was, therefore, right, and the rule to enter the verdict for the defendants is discharged.

Rule discharged.

Money paid to Defendant's Use—Implied Request.

MONEY COUNTS.—The plaintiff, to whom the defendant had given a bill of sale of his goods as a security for a debt, with the usual power of sale, having upon default taken possession of the goods under the bill of sale, voluntarily and without being requested to do so by the defendant, allowed the goods to remain on the defendant's premises for three months, until rent had accrued due to the defendant's landlord, who then distrained for such rent, and the plaintiff paid the same to free the goods from the distress:—Held, that this was not such a payment by compulsion as would entitle the plaintiff to recover it from the defendant as money paid to his use, without an express request by the defendant to make it.

The declaration contained the common money counts for money lent, for money paid for the defendant's use, and for money due on accounts stated.

Plea, inter alia, never indebted.

The case was tried, before Montague Smith, J., at the Middlesex Sittings, after Michaelmas Term, 1865, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 8*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* They also found that the plaintiff had paid certain sums, amounting altogether to 42*l.* 9*s.*, and the question was as to the plaintiff's right to recover in this action the sums he had so paid, the jury having found that he had paid them to protect his own interest under a bill of sale, and not at defendant's request. The facts, so far as they relate to this point, were as follows: The defendant, who had formerly kept the Gospel Oak Tavern, Circus Road, Kentish Town, gave the plaintiff, on the 2nd of June, 1860, a bill of sale of all the furniture and effects, stock-in-trade and fittings, at that tavern, for securing to the plaintiff the sum of 180*l.* by weekly payments of 3*l.* The bill of sale was by way of mortgage, and contained the usual power of sale in case of default in the weekly payments.

On the 9th of July, 1860, the defendant was arrested, and he shortly afterwards petitioned for relief under the Insolvent Act. The plaintiff took possession of the effects under the bill of sale on the 10th of July, 1860, but instead of realizing thereunder he continued in possession until the 23rd of October following, the defendant's wife and family residing on the premises and carrying on the business of the tavern in the absence of the defendant, who still remained in prison; and on the said 23rd of October the landlord distrained for the quarter's rent which had accrued due on the 29th of September. The plaintiff paid the broker who so distrained 5*l.* 5*s.*, and 1*l.* 4*s.* for holding over and keeping a man in possession, and ultimately, on the 26th of October, he paid the landlord 36*l.* the rent due, and so released the property secured by the bill of sale from the distress. These three sums, amounting to the sum of 42*l.* 9*s.*, the plaintiff now claimed to be repaid by the defendant.

Montagu Chambers having, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial, obtained a rule nisi to increase the verdict by this sum of 42*l.* 9*s.*, on the ground that there was an implied authority or request of the defendant to make such payment, citing Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep. 318),—

H. T. Cole now shewed cause.—There was no express request to make this payment, and the law will not imply one. The case of Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep. 318) is very distinguishable. There the plaintiff had placed his carriage under the care of the defendant Partridge, who was a coachmaker, and the carriage having been seized for rent by the landlord, the plaintiff paid the rent under the pressure of such distress. That was a compulsory payment for the benefit of another who was liable to have paid it. That is very different from such a case as the present, where a man having taken as a security the goods of another instead of realizing, chooses to allow the goods to remain on the premises for several months, and so incur the risk of being seized for rent. The moment he acted on the bill of sale he should have sold the goods, or, at all events, have removed them, unless there was an agreement between him and the defendant for payment of the landlord's rent in case the goods were allowed to remain; but here there was no such agreement, and as the plaintiff voluntarily exposed the goods to the risk he must take the consequences.

Montagu Chambers and C. P. Butt, in support of the rule.—By the bill of sale the property in the goods had become vested in the plaintiff, and the goods having been seized for rent, which the defendant was liable to pay, the payment by the plaintiff was a payment which he was compelled to make in order to redeem his own goods, and, therefore, according to Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep. 318), the law will under those circumstances imply a request. The case of Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep. 318) is recognised as an authority in Rodgers v. Maw (15 Mee. & W. 444; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 137). The defendant's wife and family were on the premises, and the business of the tavern was really being carried on for the defendant's benefit, and for that purpose the goods were left by the plaintiff on the premises.

[BYLES, J.—The bill of sale was a security for a debt, and therefore it was to the interest of both parties that the most money should be got for the goods. MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Had the jury been asked, they would have found that the defendant never meant the rent to be paid by any one.]

The defendant continued in the house and got the benefit of the payment.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The facts are these: the plaintiff having taken possession of goods under a bill of sale on the 10th of July, let them remain on the defendant's premises until after the 29th of September following, when rent accrued due, and afterwards the landlord distrained the goods for the rent which had so accrued. The plaintiff then freed the goods from such distress by a payment which he seeks now to recover from the defendant. It is said that whenever the owner of goods places them on the premises of another, and the goods are distrained on by the landlord for rent, and the owner of the goods frees them from such distress, the payment is a payment by compulsion, which he has a right to recover from the person whose rent has been so paid, and the case of Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep. 318) has been relied on in support of this. I think that case is different from the present one. There the defendant Partridge was a coachmaker, and it was for his benefit and at his request that the plaintiff in that case left his carriage with him and the rent having been paid by the plaintiff in order to clear the carriage from a distress, the action was held to lie. Here, however, the goods were left on the defendant's premises for the benefit of the plaintiff, and without any request of the defendant: they had by the bill of sale become the absolute property of the plaintiff, and he had a right to take them away; and, indeed, it was his duty to have done so. It may be that his reason for allowing them to remain on the premises was, that he thought by so doing he should sell them for a larger sum. However, be that as it may, it was the same thing as that of a person having goods, and, not knowing where to warehouse them, put them on the defendant's premises without his leave, and they were afterwards distrained for rent by the defendant's landlord.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As I collect the facts the payment of the rent was exclusively for the plaintiff's advantage. There is not the slightest evidence that the payment was made at the defendant's request, and,

I think, under the circumstances, there is nothing to shew that the law would imply a request.

KEATING, J.—I also am of the same opinion. The case of Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep. 318) illustrates the rule of law, that where one person is compelled to pay a debt which another is legally liable to pay, the law will imply a promise by the latter to repay what has been so paid. The distinction between that case and the present is, that here the plaintiff was not compelled to pay the rent within the meaning of that rule of law, because it was voluntary and for his own advantage that he allowed the goods to remain on the premises whilst the rent was accruing until it became due. In making this distinction we do not, I think, infringe the rule of law.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The plaintiff, by his own voluntary act, and without any request to do so by the defendant, allowed the goods to remain on the premises. Probably, the plaintiff thought it better to wait until a fresh tenant took the house, when he should get more for the goods; but it was for his own benefit that the plaintiff left them to remain with a full knowledge of the liability he was incurring. According to the finding of the jury, there was no express authority on the part of the defendant to allow the goods to remain; and, considering the insolvency of the defendant and his want of money, I do not believe he would have given such an authority had he been asked to do so. The claim, moreover, is a very stale one.

Rule discharged.

In re THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY AND TROWSDALE
AND OTHERS.

Arbitration—Time for moving to set aside Award—Agreement.

ARBITRATION, REFERENCE AND AWARD.—Where two terms have elapsed after the publication of an award, it is too late to move to set the award aside, notwithstanding that both parties to the reference may have agreed to the motion being then made.

C. Pollock moved to set aside two awards made on the 31st of October, 1865, by Mr. Tone, who had been the principal engineer of the Wansbeck Railway Company before its amalgamation with the North British Railway Company. By a memorandum of arrangement made on the 15th of January last, between the last-mentioned railway company and Messrs. Trowsdale & Boulton, the following was agreed to by both parties: "The company to make Mr. Tone's two awards of the 31st of October last rules or a rule of the Court of Common Pleas forthwith. Messrs. Trowsdale to move the Court to set aside those awards, on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the arbitrator. The company in any event to pay the costs of Messrs. Trowsdale of the motion or motions, to be taxed (if required) as between attorney and client. If the Court decide that Mr. Tone had jurisdiction, Messrs. Trowsdale to be at liberty to move to set aside the awards on any grounds that they may be advised. If both applications are decided against Messrs. Trowsdale, or if the first be decided against them, and the second be not made, the cases are to be heard again before Mr. Tone. The reference made by Messrs. Trowsdale to Mr. Stephenson not to be further proceeded with till after the 31st of January inst." According to the above agreement, an application was made, last Hilary Term, to set aside the awards, on the ground that Mr. Tone had no jurisdiction to act as arbitrator in the matter, and the objection to the awards was limited to that ground. The Court, on the last day of that term, disposed of the case by discharging the rule, as it was of opinion that Mr. Tone had jurisdiction.¹ As by the terms of the above arrangement, Messrs. Trowsdale were to be at liberty to move afterwards to set aside the awards on any other ground, a rule nisi to that effect is now asked for, as, besides the question of jurisdiction, there are other objections to the awards.

[BYLES, J.—Is not the application now too late? ERLE, C.J.—How does it appear that the arrangement between the parties which has been referred to was made with the sanction of the Court?]

The arrangement was made at the request of and for the benefit of the railway company, who, moreover, undertook to pay the costs of the motion in any event. This they would not have done had not the motion been then confined to the objection of want of jurisdiction. But this was not to prejudice Messrs. Trowsdale taking afterwards any other objection they might have to the awards.

[KEATING, J.—Suppose both parties to a cause were to agree that either side might move for a new trial after the first four days of the term succeeding the trial, would the Court allow such agreement to be carried out?]

Where the reference is not under the statute, a party has been sometimes allowed to apply to the Court to set aside the award after the term next after the award has been made, on shewing sufficient reason for the delay.

[BYLES, J.—Here Messrs. Trowsdale had the whole of Michaelmas Term to move in.]

The delay has arisen from what has taken place respecting the question of jurisdiction, and the fact that the rule for setting aside the awards on that ground, was not disposed of until the last day of last term.

ERLE, C.J.—No instance can be given of an exception like the present to the general rule, that the application to set aside an award must be made during the first term after the award has been made. There are some precedents of exceptions to that rule, but this case does not fall within those precedents, and we cannot, therefore, grant this application.

Rule refused.

Acknowledgment by Married Woman—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 89.—Reg.

(1) The case is noticed in the Notes of Cases, p. 39. The question as to the power of Mr. Tone to arbitrate arose out of the terms of the contract made by Messrs. Trowsdale with the Wansbeck Railway Company, by which it was stipulated, that in case of difference touching anything to be done under such contract the same should be referred to John Furness Tone, "if and so long as he shall continue to be the company's principal engineer." The company was afterwards, by an act of parliament, merged in the North British Railway Company, but the act provided that all contracts should be valid notwithstanding. Mr. Tone still continued to act as engineer of the Wansbeck portion of the line, and disputes having arisen respecting the contract, the company claimed to refer them to Mr. Tone, who, accordingly, proceeded with the reference, notwithstanding protest on behalf of Messrs. Trowsdale. Mellish and J. A. Russell shewed cause against the rule to set aside the awards, on the ground that Mr. Tone had no jurisdiction; and C. Pollock argued in support of the rule.—The Court discharged the rule, on the ground that, according to the construction of the act of parliament and the intention of the parties, the stipulation referring disputes to Mr. Tone was to continue unchanged, notwithstanding the Wansbeck Railway Company had by such act become merged in the North British Railway Company.

Gen. Hil. Term—Filing Certificate after more than One Month from the Time of Acknowledgment.

FINES AND RECOVERIES.—Where several years had elapsed between the making the acknowledgment and the taking the certificate thereof to the office for enrolment, the Court allowed the same to be received by the officer for that purpose, on the delay being accounted for and shewn to have been unintentional, and on the Court being satisfied as to how the property had been dealt with, and the purpose for which the certificate was now wanted to be enrolled.

C. Pollock moved that a certificate of acknowledgment by Timeson Edge, and the affidavit verifying the same, might be received by the proper officer and enrolled, notwithstanding the lapse of time since the acknowledgment was taken. The acknowledgment was made by Mrs. Edge, on the 13th of March, 1860, but the affidavit verifying the same, though engrossed at the time, was not sworn until the 15th of November last.

By Reg. Gen. Hil. Term, 4 Will. 4, it is ordered "that the certificates and affidavits verifying the same shall, within one month from the making the acknowledgment, be delivered to the proper officer appointed under the said act, and that the officer shall not after that time receive the same without the direction of a Court or a Judge;" a similar application to the present has been made to Mr. Justice Keating at chambers, but that learned Judge declined making an order. The delay is thus accounted for by the solicitor who prepared the deed of settlement and certificate of acknowledgment: he states in his affidavit that, at the time such acknowledgment was taken, he was having his papers removed into new offices, and that the certificate and affidavit verifying it were by some means mixed with and put away with other papers in such new offices; that in consequence of this, and of his managing clerk, who had the management of this business, leaving him about that time, and not having occasion for an office copy of such certificate until October last, he was not until then aware that the certificate had not been duly enrolled; and he further states that the delay was quite unintentional. It appears also from the affidavit that the indenture acknowledged by the married woman, and which is dated the 13th of March, 1860, is a post-nuptial settlement, made pursuant to an agreement before marriage, by which certain property was settled to the sole use of the said Timeson Edge during her life, and after her decease to the use of Elizabeth Stamway and Josephus Pickford, children of the said T. Edge by a former marriage. The only dealing with this property since then is a mortgage of it on the 17th of March, 1860, and a subsequent transfer of such mortgage to Messrs. Edmund and Alfred Tennant, to whom, on the 5th of October last, Josephus Pickford conveyed his equity of redemption.

In a case of In re Walker, not reported, an acknowledgment was taken in 1836, and the application to file the certificate was not made until June, 1862; the delay there arose from the certificate having accidentally been put away with the title-deeds, and the omission to file it was only discovered when, the property being sold, it was wanted for the title.

BYLES, J.—It ought to be shewn that nothing has occurred by which any one interested in the property has been prejudiced. This should be shewn, as well as the object for which the filing of the certificate is now wanted, otherwise the rule of Court will be entirely useless.

On a subsequent day in this term,

C. Pollock (May 7) renewed the application on affidavit, shewing that the property had not been dealt with otherwise than as above mentioned, and that the only purpose for which the filing of the certificate was wanted was, to enable J. Pickford to complete the sale of his equity of redemption.

Per Curiam.—The certificate may be enrolled.

Order made.

Principal and Surety—Divisibility of Bond.

DEED AND BOND. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.—By an agreement between the plaintiff and one S, the plaintiff agreed to purchase of S. a ship called the Devonport, the price of such purchase being the payment of a sum of money and the transfer to S. of the plaintiff's ship called the Lord Dalhousie; and upon the delivery of the Devonport the plaintiff agreed to lend S. 6,000l. on mortgage of the Lord Dalhousie, and S. agreed to repair the Lord Dalhousie so as to class her eight years A 1 at Lloyd's, and anything remaining to be done to the Devonport was to be done by S. within two weeks after the ship's arrival in London. The defendant, as surety for S, gave a bond to the plaintiff, which, after reciting the above agreement, was conditioned to be void if S. forthwith repaired the Lord Dalhousie, and if that vessel should within three months be classed eight years A 1 at Lloyd's, and if S. should within two weeks after the arrival of the Devonport in the port of London do all that remained to be done to that vessel. The plaintiff and S. afterwards, without the consent of the defendant, made another agreement, by which the time for the completion of the Devonport was accelerated, and more things were required to be done to complete that vessel than remained to be done according to the original agreement:—Held, that the stipulations in the condition to the bond as to the Lord Dalhousie were so separate from those as to the Devonport, that the defendant was liable on the bond for a breach of the condition as to the Lord Dalhousie, notwithstanding his liability under the bond, so far as related to the Devonport, was discharged by the alteration which the second agreement made in the terms of the first.

Action on a bond.

The declaration stated, that the defendant, by his bond, sealed with his seal, and bearing date the 29th of March, 1865, became bound to the plaintiff in the sum of 6,000l., to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, subject to a condition thereunder written, whereby, after reciting that by agreement between the plaintiff of the one part, and John Smurthwaite of the other part, the plaintiff agreed to purchase a ship called the Devonport from the said J. Smurthwaite, and the price for such ship was the transfer, by the plaintiff, to the said J. Smurthwaite of a ship of the plaintiff's called the Lord Dalhousie, and the payment to the said J. Smurthwaite of a sum of money; and that by the said agreement the plaintiff agreed, upon the delivery to him of the said ship Devonport, to lend to the said J. Smurthwaite 6,000l. on mortgage of the said ship Lord Dalhousie, and the said J. Smurthwaite agreed that he would at his own expense repair and restore the said ship Lord Dalhousie so as to class her eight years A 1 at Lloyd's; and the said J. Smurthwaite also agreed, as an additional security that he would forthwith so repair and restore the said ship, to give a satisfactory security to the plaintiff by the defendant; and that it was thereby further agreed that the plaintiff should have the option of settling for the said ship Devonport, whether complete or not, at any time after a week from the date of the said agreement, and that anything then remaining to be done and supplied to the said ship according to the said contract and the specification thereafter mentioned should be done and supplied in London by and at the expense of the said J. Smurthwaite within two weeks after the ship's arrival in London; and that the said J. Smurthwaite thereby agreed to give the plaintiff a satisfactory guarantie by the defendant to that effect. And after further reciting that the defendant had agreed to enter into the said bond with such defeasance as thereafter contained, it was conditioned and provided, that if the said J. Smurthwaite would forthwith, at his own expense, restore and repair the said ship Lord Dalhousie, so that she should be entitled, according to the rules of Lloyd's registry, to be classed eight years A 1, and if the said ship should within three calendar months from the date of the said bond be classed eight years A 1 at Lloyd's, and if the said J. Smurthwaite should at his own expense, within two weeks after the arrival of the said ship Devonport in the port of London, do and supply all such matters and things as, according to the said recited contract and the specification therein mentioned, should remain to be done and supplied upon the settlement for the said ship Devonport as above mentioned, then the said bond should be void, but should otherwise be and remain in full force and virtue.

And the plaintiff, for assigning a breach of the condition of the said bond, says that the said J. Smurthwaite did not forthwith at his own expense restore and repair the said ship Lord Dalhousie, so that she should be or was entitled, according to the rules of Lloyd's registry, to be classed eight years A 1; but therein made default, contrary to the terms of the said condition.

And for assigning a further breach of the said condition, the plaintiff says that the said ship Lord Dalhousie was not within three calendar months from the date of the said bond, which period had elapsed before action brought, classed A 1 at Lloyd's.

And for assigning a further breach of the said condition, the plaintiff says that although the said ship Devonport arrived in the port of London, and although upon the settlement for the said ship as aforesaid there remained, according to the said contract and the specification therein mentioned, divers matters and articles to be done and supplied by the said J. Smurthwaite, yet the said J. Smurthwaite did not at his own expense, within two weeks after the arrival of the said ship Devonport in the port of London, which period had elapsed before action brought, do and supply all such matters and things as aforesaid, or any of them, but therein failed and made default, contrary to the terms of the said condition.

The defendant traversed the breaches; and also pleaded (fourthly) for defence on equitable grounds, that he entered into the said bond and condition in the declaration mentioned as surety only for the said J. Smurthwaite, and that afterwards and before the arrival of the ship Devonport in the port of London, and before the expiration of the said three calendar months in the said condition mentioned, the plaintiff and the said J. Smurthwaite, together with one William Joseph Young, entered into a certain other agreement, dated the 20th of April, 1865, without the knowledge, privity or consent of the defendant, which last-mentioned agreement the plaintiff then, without the knowledge, privity or consent of the defendant, accepted and received from the said J. Smurthwaite, in lieu of and substitution for, and in accord and satisfaction of so much of the agreement dated the 22nd of March, 1865, in the said condition mentioned as relates to the said ship Devonport.

The plaintiff took issue on such plea, and also demurred thereto.

The cause was heard, before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1865, when the bond was proved to have been given in the terms set out in the declaration. After making the agreement between the plaintiff and J. Smurthwaite, referred to in the said bond, and which was made on the 22nd of March, 1865, and after giving the bond, some negotiation took place between the plaintiff and Smurthwaite with reference to a settlement, although the ship Devonport was not finished; and on the 10th of April, 1865, the defendant, who traded under the firm of "Seymour, Peacock & Co.," signed the following letter, addressed to the plaintiff:—

"Dear Sir,—With reference to the contract for the purchase by you of the ship Devonport, we understand it is proposed to make a settlement with you in the mean time by leaving a small sum in your hands until the ship is finally finished; and in the event of your so making a settlement in account we hereby undertake that our guarantie shall remain in force, notwithstanding such a mode of settlement.

(Signed)

“Seymour, Peacock & Co.”

On the 20th of April, 1865, an agreement was made between Smurthwaite of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, and one William Joseph Young of the third part; which,—after reciting the agreement of the 22nd of March, 1865, and that Smurthwaite had not completed the ship Devonport, and that he had requested the plaintiff to pay him 19,500*l.* on account of the amount agreed to be paid under the said agreement, and that the plaintiff had agreed to do so on certain terms; and after reciting also that 180*l.* was to be deducted for short tonnage, and 129*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for discount; and reciting that after payment of the 19,500*l.* and the deduction of 180*l.* and 129*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, there still remained in the hands of the plaintiff the sum of 940*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, and that it had been agreed that that sum should be paid over on completion to the said W. J. Young,—stated that Smurthwaite agreed to complete the said vessel and her outfit, according to contract, on or before the 27th of April then next, and that it was agreed that the plaintiff should retain the said sum of 940*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* and pay it on such completion of the said ship. The agreement also stated that the plaintiff was to be paid by Smurthwaite interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum on the said 19,500*l.*, until the said ship should be fully completed; and it contained a power to the plaintiff to do what was necessary to complete the vessel, and to apply any part of the said 940*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* for that purpose, and also a stipulation that the articles specified in a list annexed, several of which were not in the agreement of the 22nd of March, 1865, should be deemed to be necessary to the due completion of the ship.

With the exception of the letter of the 10th of April, 1865, the defendant had not sanctioned this second agreement.

In the May following Smurthwaite became bankrupt.

At the trial, the defendant relied on the agreement of the 20th of April as discharging him from liability as surety altogether, on the ground that his liability qua the Lord Dalhousie could not be severed from his liability qua the Devonport.

The plaintiff, however, obtained a verdict for 1,800*l.* damages on the first and second breaches, and for 1*s.* damages on the third breach. Afterwards, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial,

J. Brown obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict, and to enter it for the defendant, on the fourth plea, on the ground that that plea was sustained by the evidence, and that the defendant was discharged from his liability on the bond by the agreement of the 20th of April, 1865, and that, at least, the defendant was so discharged so far as related to the ship Devonport.

Sir G. Honyman (E. James with him) now shewed cause against the rule, and also appeared in support of the demurrer.—As only nominal damages have been found in respect of the Devonport, the substantial question between the parties is confined to the Lord Dalhousie. The fourth plea is bad. It, moreover, was not proved. The plea, though pleaded to the whole declaration, shews no answer to the breaches assigned as to the Lord Dalhousie. There were two separate transactions, one relating to the vessel the Lord Dalhousie, and the other relating to the vessel the Devonport, and although both were included in the same bond, the condition was clearly divisible, and, therefore, any answer as to the breach relating to one vessel is no answer as to the breach relating to the other vessel. The recent case of Skillett v. Fletcher (35 L. J. Ch. 154; s. c. 1 Law Rep. C.P. 217) is directly in point.

J. Brown (Hannen with him), contra.—The case of Skillett v. Fletcher (35 L. J. C.P. 154; s. c. 1 Law Rep. C.P. 217) is distinguishable from the present case. There the alteration which affected the liability of the surety was by statute, and not, as here, by an agreement and act done by the creditor.

[BYLES, J.—That is not the ground on which the Court gave their decision in that case. MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The Court there considered it the same as if there had been two bonds.]

In the present case there is one entire transaction in which the rights as to the two ships are so completely mixed together (the taking of one ship being part of the consideration for the other) that it is impossible to separate them. Perhaps the fourth plea is not strictly right in form, and it would have been better had it referred to the original agreement of the 22nd of March, 1865, and shewn the alterations in it so far as they relate to the Devonport. However, the plea, if necessary, might be amended in conformity with the facts. Perhaps the reference in the declaration to the original agreement and the recitals in the declaration sufficiently shew, without amending the plea, that the transaction is an entire one, and so raise the same questions as are raised by the facts.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Clearly the original agreement was not put an end to, or satisfied by the second agreement, so that the plea as pleaded could not be proved.]

The second agreement required things to be done for completing the Devonport which were not required by the first agreement, and it also altered the time within which that vessel was to be completed, and instead of its being within two weeks after the ship's arrival in London, it fixed the 27th of April, 1865, as the date for completion, which was necessarily a shortening of the time, and so in both respects the liability of the surety was increased. This affects the contract as to the Dalhousie, for only on the completion of the Devonport was the plaintiff to lend Smurthwaite 6,000*l.* on mortgage of the Dalhousie, so that what alters the circumstances under which the Devonport was to be completed affects this loan, which formed part of the consideration for repairing and restoring the Dalhousie so as to class her A 1.

[ERLE, C.J.—Does not the 19,500*l.* include the 600*l.*, with the exception of the sum retained?]

It is impossible to separate and distinguish the monies; both parties have so treated it as one transaction as to mix up all the monies; and then there is an agreement to pay interest on the whole 19,500*l.* The terms of the original agreement are altered by the second agreement, and, according to Whitcher v. Hall (5 B. & C. 269), the surety is therefore discharged.

Sir G. Honyman, in reply, was stopped by the Court.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. The action is against the defendant as surety for John Smurthwaite, and no doubt if the liability of the principal has been afterwards altered without the consent of the surety, the surety is discharged. The bond which is the subject of this action is the contract of the surety, and by that bond the defendant, as surety, bound himself for the performance by Smurthwaite of two distinct matters, just as much as if he had done so as such surety by one bond for the performance of one of those matters, and had done so as such surety by another bond for the performance of the other of those matters, in which case any alteration as to the subject-matter of one bond would not affect his liability under the other bond. The transactions which have given rise to the present question are complicated. Smurthwaite was forthwith to repair the ship Lord Dalhousie, and was also within three calendar months to class her eight years A 1 at Lloyd's; those form together one separate matter. Then, as to the ship Devonport, Smurthwaite was to complete all required to be done for that ship within two weeks after her arrival in the port of London. Such being the contract, for the performance of which the defendant was surety, the plaintiff and Smurthwaite afterwards altered it so far as relates to the ship Devonport, and by that alteration the time for the completion of that ship was shortened, and the vessel was also to be finished in a more expensive manner than contracted for by the original contract. It is clear therefore, that the defendant is released from his liability as to the stipulation in the bond relating to the completion of the Devonport. That, however, I think, leaves him liable as to the stipulation relating to the Lord Dalhousie, and in respect of which the jury have given 1,800*l.* damages. The sum of 19,500*l.*, which was paid under the agreement of the 20th of April, 1865, and the 6,000*l.* which was to be lent on mortgage are so mixed up together as to be almost past unravelling; but as the whole was then paid except 940*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, there was no alteration made then as to the money which would prejudice the surety or increase his risk; for I think the 940*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* was kept back with the licence of the defendant.

BYLES, J.—After some doubt, which I at one time entertained, I now agree with the rest of the Court, that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. I think the retainer of the 940*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* was fully justified by the defendant's letter of the 10th of April, and I also think that the postponement of such money until the Devonport was fully completed was also justified by the same letter. With regard to the interest, that is a mere compensation for the prepayment made by the plaintiff. The contracts as to the two ships are so far distinct that the damages which the jury have found with respect to the Lord Dalhousie must, I think, stand.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I also think that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. Smurthwaite is by the condition to the bond forthwith to repair the Lord Dalhousie; and, secondly, he is in three months to get the ship classed A 1 at Lloyd's. Those two matters are, I think, separate in their nature from the contract relating to the Devonport, and the alteration which was made does not affect the surety's liability on the bond in respect to the Lord Dalhousie. It is admitted that the fourth plea as framed is scarcely a good answer to the breaches founded on those two specific matters relating to the Lord Dalhousie; but the case is decided on the facts and not on the pleadings, and I only make this observation to shew that the demurrer must be determined in favour of the plaintiff.

Rule discharged, and judgment for the plaintiff on demurrer.

HENRY JORDAN AND GEORGE JORDAN v. MOORE.*

Patent—Infringement—Novelty—Subject-Matter of Patent.

PATENT.—Letters patent were granted for an alleged invention of "certain improvements in the construction of ships and other vessels navigating on water." The first claim in the specification was "for the combination of an iron frame, with an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms," and this was so described that, according to the construction put on it by the Court, it comprehended whatever might, according to the ordinary use of language, be called "an iron frame" for a ship, and was in fact a claim for planking with timber any iron frame of a ship:—Held, that inasmuch as before the date of these letters patent composite ships, partly of wood and partly of iron, had been constructed, and iron frames of more or less strength had been coated with iron, and wooden frames with wooden planking,

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Byles, J., Keating, J. and Montague Smith, J.

the application of wooden planking to the iron frame of a vessel could not, without any peculiarity in the nature of that planking, be the subject of a patent, on the principles laid down in Harwood v. the Great Northern Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 27).

Action for infringement of a patent.

The declaration alleged that John Jordan was the true and first inventor of a certain new manufacture, viz., "certain improvements in the construction of ships and other vessels navigating on water," for which letters patent were granted to him for fourteen years, from the 2nd of November, 1849, subject to a condition that he should within six months enrol in the Court of Chancery an instrument in writing, "particularly describing and ascertaining the nature of the said invention, and in what manner the same was to be and might be performed"; that J. Jordan did within the time prescribed fulfil the said condition, and that the letters patent were afterwards assigned to the plaintiffs, and that an extension of them for seven years more, with further letters patent, from the 3rd of November, 1863, was granted to the plaintiffs, and that the defendant, after the said last date, infringed the same.

The declaration claimed a writ of injunction to restrain the defendant from all infringement, and an account of the profits, &c.

Pleas—First, not guilty; secondly, that J. Jordan was not the true and first inventor; thirdly, that the invention was not an invention of any manner of new manufacture as alleged; fourthly, that the manufacture was not any manner of manufacture for which letters patent could by law be granted; fifthly, that Her Majesty did not by letters patent grant to J. Jordan such privilege as alleged; sixthly, that J. Jordan did not within the time prescribed fulfil the said condition as alleged. The seventh and eighth pleas denied, respectively, the assignment to the plaintiffs, and the grant of the further patent to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs joined issue on all the pleas.

In his specification, J. Jordan declared "that the nature of his said invention, and the manner in which the same is to be performed, are fully described and ascertained in and by the following description thereof, reference being had to the drawings hereunto annexed, and to the figures and letters marked thereon (that is to say),

"My invention consists of improvements in the construction of ships and other vessels navigating on water.

"First, for the combination of an iron frame, with an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms.

"Secondly, for the peculiar manner of making the butt joints of the external covering of timber planking. Thirdly, for the construction of an iron frame with a timber keel. Fourthly, for the combination of an iron frame with a timber stern. Fifthly, for the combination of an iron frame with a timber stern-post.

"Sixthly, for the peculiar manner of constructing an iron frame, adapted to a covering of wood for the sides, bilges, and bottoms, and combining, with the frame, a timber stern, a timber keel, and a timber stern-post.

"Seventhly, for the peculiar manner of constructing the keel-plate, the stem-plate and the stern-plate. Eighthly, for the peculiar manner of constructing the keelson or keelsons. Ninthly, for the peculiar manner of constructing the vertical and horizontal stringers. Tenthly, for the application of rolled iron, of a bridge form, similar to a 'bridge rail,' as ribs, in the construction of the iron frame of vessels navigating on water, built of iron, or iron and timber combined. Eleventhly, for coating the bottoms of vessels navigating on water with a mixture of gutta-percha and black-lead, and also such parts as are made of iron.

"In order that my invention may be fully understood and readily carried into effect, I will proceed to describe the means to be pursued in carrying out any of my improvements, reference being made, when required, to the accompanying drawings.

"For carrying out my first improvement a suitable iron frame is to be constructed, to which an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottom, will be fastened, by means of rivets, bolts, or any known or suitable fastening. I make no claim to the shape of the iron used in the frame, as it may be constructed of angle iron, T iron, flat or bar iron, or iron of any suitable shape. The vessel may have one or more thicknesses of timber planking, and may be sheathed with copper and felt, or zinc and felt, or galvanized metal and felt, for the purpose of keeping the bottom of the vessel from fouling; for which sheathing I make no claim.

"For carrying out my second improvement, I make the butt ends of the timber planking with an iron plate placed inside to cover the vertical joints, the iron plate being of sufficient length and thickness to be fastened to the ends of the abutting planks; and between the timber planking and the iron plate I place a thickness or layer of felt, gutta-percha or india-rubber. In this manner I add strength to the planking, and at the same time make a watertight joint. (The horizontal joints or seams between the planks will be caulked in the usual manner in which the planks of timber-built vessels are usually caulked, viz., with oakum, for which I make no claim.)

"For the carrying out my third improvement, I make an iron plate, of any suitable form, run the whole length of the bottom of the vessel, to which I fasten a keel made of timber, with bolts or rivets, or any other suitable fastening.

"And for carrying out my fourth and fifth improvements, I cause the iron plate forming the keel-plate to be continued up the bow of the vessel, and also up the stern of the vessel, to which I fasten a stem made of timber at the bow, and at the stern I fasten a stern-post made of timber, by means of bolts, rivets, or any suitable fastening.

"For the carrying out of my sixth improvement, to construct an iron frame, adapted to an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms, for a timber keel, timber stem and timber stern-post, I make an iron plate form the keel-plate, laid the whole length of the bottom of the vessel, and continued up the stem and stern. To this plate I fasten the keel, stem and stern-post, made of timber, as just described. The plate is to be bent, so as to form an apron or holding for the ends of the external planking of the sides, bilges, and bottom. Across the keel-plate iron ribs are to be fastened, and floorings of iron are to be fastened to the iron ribs. On the top of the floorings I place the keelson, made with plate and angle iron or rolled iron, and fastened to each floor at each extremity of the vessel. The keelson is made to assume a curvilinear form, or portion of an inverted arch, to keep the ends of the vessel from drooping. The deck beams, both upper and lower, will be placed and fastened in the manner usually adopted in iron-built vessels, that is to say, fastened to the sides, and, if necessary, where convenient, to the ribs. In the wake of the upper and lower deck beams I place on the outside of the ribs stringers of plate iron, or plate iron binding-strakes, all round the vessel, and fasten the same to each rib, and also to the stem-plate or apron forward, and to the stern-plate aft the vessel: the ends of the deck beams are fastened to these stringers. There will also be stringers on the top of the ends of the beams, lying horizontally, fastened to each rib, to each beam, and, if necessary, to the stringers outside the ribs. For the horizontal stringers on the top of the ends of the deck beams, I make no claim. There may be also other stringers introduced inside the ribs, if necessary, for which I make no claim.

"The keelson or keelsons may also be constructed in the following manner, in carrying out my seventh and eighth improvements: On the top of the keel-plate before described the keelson will be placed, and the ribs will abut and be fastened to the keelson and also to the keel-plate; the floorings will abut and be fastened to the keelson, and, in the usual manner, to the ribs. Drawings on sheet No. 2. will shew this method of construction—see figures 5. and 6. The other method of constructing the keelson on the top of the floorings has been described before.

"For carrying out my ninth improvement, I place vertical stringers outside the ribs, fastened to each rib and to the ends of the beams, and also, if necessary, to the horizontal stringers, as before described in the description of the frame.

"My tenth improvement is for the application of rolled iron of the bridge form, similar to a bridge rail in the construction of the iron frame of vessels navigating on water, built of iron, or iron and timber combined. The iron plates or timber planking may be fastened by any known means to the flanges of the bridge rib, or the bridge rib may be reversed, and the iron plates or timber planking fastened by any known means to the top of the bridge rib, and the ceiling or linings fastened to the two flanges of the bridge rib. By this mode of construction the whole of the iron-work will form a complete frame, to which the wood-work will be attached.

"My eleventh improvement is for the application of a mixture of gutta-percha and black lead for coating the bottoms of vessels either of wood or iron, to prevent fouling, and also for coating such other parts as are made of iron, to prevent corrosion. The gutta-percha is to be dissolved in spirits of turpentine, naphtha, or any other solvent, for which I make no claim, and the black lead is to be mixed with the solution to any consistency required, and applied hot.

"Having now described the nature of my invention, and the manner in which the same may be performed and carried into effect, I would have it understood that I make no claim for any of the parts separately, but only when in combination to carry out my said invention; but what I do claim as of my invention are: firstly, for the construction of ships and other vessels that navigate on water with an iron frame, combined with an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms.

"Secondly, for the making of the butt joints of the external covering of wood as described. Thirdly, for the combination of an iron frame with a timber keel. Fourthly, for the combination of an iron frame with a timber stem. Fifthly, for the combination of an iron frame with a timber stern-post.

"Sixthly, for the construction of iron frames for ships or other vessels navigating on water, adapted to an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms as described.

"Seventhly, for an iron keel-plate continued up at each end of the vessel to form the stem and stern plates, to which the timber keel, the timber stem and the timber stern-post are fastened. Eighthly, for two methods of constructing the keelson. The first as described on the top of the floorings, with the extremities of a curvilinear form, and fastened to the stem and stern plate to keep the ends of the vessel from drooping; for the second method of putting the keelson down upon the keel-plate abutting the ribs, so as to fasten the keelson to the keel-plate, also abutting the floorings so as to fasten the keelson to the ribs, as shewn in Figures 5 and 6, sheet No. 2. Ninthly, for the external vertical stringers or binding strakes fastened to the ribs, beams, stem and stern plates, and also to the horizontal stringers on the top of the ends of the beams, as described and shewn. Tenthly, for the application of rolled iron of a bridge form in the construction of the iron frame of ships or other vessels navigating on water. Eleventhly, for the application of a mixture of gutta-percha and black lead to the coating of the bottoms of vessels navigating on water, and such other parts as are made of iron."—[Here followed the reference to the drawing and figures, of which we do not give plans, because from the view taken by the Court they are immaterial to this report.¹]

(1) The particulars of objections delivered by the defendant were (inter alia) that the alleged inventor was not the true and first inventor; that the alleged invention was not an invention of any manner of new manufacture; that the specification did not particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the invention, and in what manner the same was to be and might be performed; that the alleged inventor did not sufficiently distinguish and point out in his specification which things he claims to have invented, and which he does not claim to have invented, or admits to be old; that the alleged invention was not the proper subject of letters

At the trial, at Westminster, before Byles, J. and a special jury, on the 2nd, 4th, and 5th of December, the plaintiffs' counsel proved the formal parts of their case; and, producing a model of a ship built upon J. Jordan's specification called several scientific witnesses and practical ship-builders to explain the parts, and to prove that his complete, rigid, independent iron frame, as shewn by the model, combined as it was with external wooden planking, was a new invention. This was disputed by the other side. The undisputed evidence was, that, before the date of J. Jordan's patent, ships were constructed with wooden frames, covered by external wooden planking; that ships were also constructed with iron frames, of various constructions, covered by external iron plating.

In answer to a question put by the learned Judge to one of the plaintiffs' witnesses (Mr. Scott Russell)—“How is the absence of the iron plating, which you say is a material part of the strength of an iron ship, compensated for in J. Jordan's ship?” the witness answered, that in Jordan's invention so much of the iron plating as is most useful in an iron ship to give it strength was retained, in order to give that strength to this combination; and that, on the contrary, the parts of the iron that were left out were those that kept out the water, but did not strengthen the ship.

The infringement of the patent by the defendant was proved.

At the close of the plaintiffs' case, the defendant's counsel submitted that the plaintiffs ought to be nonsuited, upon the ground (inter alia) that the first claim in the specification was too wide in its terms, being a claim for a combination of any iron frame of a ship with any external wooden planking; and that upon the plaintiffs' own evidence, and particularly from the above answer of Mr. Scott Russell, it appeared that the only novelty in their claim was the substitution of external wooden planking for external iron plating as applied to a wooden frame; that since external wooden planking, as applied to a wooden frame, was an old contrivance, this claim was bad, within the principle of Harwood v. the Great Northern Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 27); that each of the claims must be taken separately, and must stand or fall by itself; and that the objection to the first claim applied to all the other claims, except the sixth, to which, for the purposes of that trial, the defendant's counsel offered no objection.

The learned Judge directed that the case should go on, reserving leave to the defendant's counsel to raise his objections.

The defendant's counsel then called several scientific witnesses and practical ship-builders to contradict the plaintiffs' case as to the novelty of J. Jordan's invention, and drew attention to several previous patents of Dickinson, Ditchburn and others, which, it was alleged, had anticipated J. Jordan's invention. The defendant did not dispute that he had infringed the first claim, if that were construed to mean the combination of any iron frame with any wooden planking; but did not admit that he had infringed the sixth claim.

The learned Judge directed the jury that there was no question for them as to the infringement of the patent by the defendant, which was admitted. In answer to questions put by the learned Judge the jury found that at the time of the plaintiffs' patent a complete, rigid, independent frame of iron covered with wood planking was new. That an iron frame with timber keel, or timber stem, or timber stern-post, was also new. That iron plates for butt-patent; that the alleged patent was a patent for a principle only, and not for any manner of new manufacture; that the alleged inventor by his specification claimed a principle of applying old contrivances to new objects; that the specification is unintelligible; that the alleged invention was of no use or advantage to the public; that the principle claimed by the specification was generally known to shipbuilders before the date of the letters patent; that the alleged invention was published before that date, and in proof thereof the defendant would rely on certain enrolled specifications for which letters patent had been granted to other inventors between 1814 and 1845 (the names and particulars of which were stated), and that J. Jordan's patent claimed some of the matters thereby patented.

joints when applied to the planking of ships, and applied for the purpose of adding strength to the plank and making it a water-tight joint, were also new. The learned Judge thereupon directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, giving leave to the defendant to move on the grounds hereafter set out in the rule, the Court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact consistent with the findings of the jury.

Bovill accordingly obtained, on the 15th of January, 1866, a rule nisi calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant, pursuant to leave reserved, on the grounds, first, that the alleged inventions in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth and ninth claims of the specification respectively, or some of them, are not subject-matters for a patent; secondly, that they were not new; thirdly, that the specification was insufficient; that it claimed more than it ought to have done; was too wide in its terms; did not sufficiently describe the invention, and did not distinguish what was new from what was old: or why a new trial should not be had, on the grounds, first, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence; secondly, that the Judge misdirected the jury in a certain particular, which (from the view taken by the Court) it is immaterial to state here; or why this Court should not dispose of the questions on the evidence.

Grove, Aston and Ledgard, for the plaintiffs, shewed cause.—There is no question about infringement, and the main questions arise upon the objection to the first claim in the specification, and they are whether the invention claimed is a new one, and next whether it is properly described. The invention substantially consists of an iron skeleton of a ship coated with a wooden skin, by means of which the ship can afterwards be sheathed with copper, which in the case of an iron ship cannot be done except there be wood between the copper and the iron. Iron ships, combined with wood, had been previously made, but before the plaintiffs' patent there had not been an iron skeleton of a vessel complete in itself before the wood was used like those made under the plaintiffs' patent, where the whole wood-work might be burnt without affecting the framework. It is objected that the claim is too large, so that it would comprehend any iron frame for a ship. It is submitted that the whole specification must be read together, and that it manifestly appears from it when so read that the patentee claims only a complete iron frame of a definite plan of construction to which a wooden covering may be attached; and this is explained by the sixth claim, which is for the construction of such an iron frame as mentioned in the first claim. The patentee distinctly says, I make no claim for any of the parts separately, but only when in combination to carry out my said invention. Thomas v. Foxwell (6 Jurist, N.S. 271) is not in point. The whole, no doubt, depends on the meaning of the term "iron frame"; if that means "any iron ship," of course the claim would be bad; but it is submitted that that is not the fair construction to be put on the term in this specification. The case of Harwood v. the Great Northern Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 27) does not apply, as the gist of the judgment of the House of Lords in that case was, that the invention had been used before, and was, therefore, not new; but the finding of the jury in the present case is an answer as to there being here any want of novelty. It is said that the application of iron and wood as claimed in this invention, being the application of well-known materials in a manner also known before, cannot be the subject of a patent, but the combination and result produced by the plaintiffs' patent are both new, and sufficient therefore to be the subject of a patent—Crane v. Price (4 Man. & G. 580; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 81). Until used it could not have been known whether by reason of the expansion and contraction of iron by heat and cold the wooden planking to a complete iron framework of a vessel would not have burst.

Bovill (with him Webster and Macnamara), for the defendant, in support of the rule.—Our objections to the patent are that some of the claims in the specification are not new, are not the subject-matter of a patent, claim more than they ought to have done, are too wide in their terms, do not sufficiently describe the invention, and do not distinguish what is new from what is old. Our objections for the purpose of this argument are only to the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and ninth claims. We do not dispute that if the patent is good in every respect, the first claim is so wide that what the defendant did was an infringement of it. But the first claim, we say, is clearly bad, as being too wide, and not new. We do not admit that the defendant had infringed anything except the first claim. Each claim in the specification must be taken separately; and, adopting this construction, the first claim is so wide as to include every iron frame (of any construction) which is covered with external timber planking (of any construction). The undisputed evidence shewed that, long before the date of this patent, wooden frames were covered with wooden planking, and iron frames with iron plating. Our evidence at the trial shewed that the covering of an iron frame with external timber planking was published in the year 1841, in Ditchburn's patent, and on this point the verdict should be set aside as being against evidence. But apart from that, and assuming, for the sake of argument, that Jordan was the first to cover an iron frame with external timber planking, still this is not the subject-matter of a patent, because it is only the application of old contrivances to an analogous object. It appeared from the plaintiffs' own evidence that Jordan's alleged invention consisted in nothing more than in taking the ordinary iron frame of a ship covered with external iron plating, and taking away of that external plating so much as served only to keep out the water and not to strengthen the frame, and substituting for it wooden planking. This case therefore falls precisely within the rule laid down by the House of Lords in Harwood v. the Great Northern Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 27). It was there held, that a certain contrivance of fish-joints having been used for bridges and other purposes, a patent for applying the same contrivance to a new purpose, the ends of rails used on railways, could not be upheld. So here, external wooden planking was long before this patent applied to wooden frames, and the only novelty (if any) was in applying it to iron frames.

[BYLES, J.—Is there not this distinction between this case and Harwood v. the Great Northern Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 27), that here the patent is for the application of an analogous contrivance to the same purpose, while in Harwood's the patent was for the application of the same contrivance to an analogous purpose?]

The two cases are identical in principle. The present case also falls within the rule of Horton v. Mabon (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 437; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 255), Ormson v. Clark (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 435; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 291) and The Patent Bottle Envelope Company v. Seymer (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 164; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 22).

Bovill was then stopped by ERLE, C.J., who said that if the Court required to hear any further argument, they would inform him.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 27th of April the judgment of the Court was read by BYLES, J.—This was a patent for “certain improvements in the construction of ships and other vessels navigating on water.” The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs on several questions left to them; but it was objected by the defendant that the alleged invention could not be the subject of a patent, and that point was reserved for the decision of the Court.

The first and principal claim in the specification is for the construction of ships with an iron frame, combined with an external covering of timber planking for the sides, bilges, and bottoms.

The only other claim necessary to be mentioned is the sixth, which is for the construction of iron frames adapted to an external covering of timber for the sides, bilges, and bottoms, as described.

The validity of the sixth claim, which is for a complete and strong iron frame of a definite construction, was not disputed at the bar, so far as the present action is concerned.

It was contended by the counsel for the defendant that the expression "iron frame" in the first claim, was not confined to an iron frame such as that specified in the sixth claim, but comprehended whatever might, according to the ordinary use of language, be called "an iron frame" for a ship. And, on a careful consideration of the specification, we are of that opinion. The counsel for the plaintiffs laid much stress on the rigidity and strength of the model produced at the trial, and made in conformity with the sixth claim. Those qualities would be very material if we were considering the merits of the sixth claim itself; but we find nothing in the specification requiring any definite degree of rigidity or strength or any peculiarity of construction in the frame mentioned in the first claim.

The first claim therefore is, according to our construction, a claim for planking with timber any iron frame of a ship.

Questions of this nature must, of course, depend very much on the extent to which scientific and practical knowledge of the subject had been carried at the date of the patent.

The evidence (from which, by the arrangement made at the trial, we are at liberty to draw inferences consistent with the findings of the jury) shewed (what indeed is common knowledge) the extensive use of iron as a material in shipbuilding, and, amongst other things, that composite ships, partly of iron and partly of wood, had frequently been constructed; that frames partly of iron and partly of wood had been coated with iron, and that the iron coating of iron vessels had been placed upon iron frames of more or less strength and completeness.

Then arises the main question in the cause. Iron and wood being both of them materials long used for the construction of the frame and coating of vessels, can the application of wooden planking to the iron frame of a vessel (without any peculiarity in the nature of that planking) be the subject of a patent? We think it cannot. It is not only the substitution of one well-known and analogous material for another, that is, wood for iron, to effect the same purpose of an iron vessel, but it is the application of the same old invention, namely, planking with timber which was formerly done on a wooden frame to an analogous purpose, or rather the same purpose, on an iron frame. In this view of the case the recent decision of the Exchequer Chamber and of the House of Lords, in Harwood v. the Great Northern Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 27), appears to us to be in point, and decisive for the defendant. There grooved iron fish-plates having been before used for fastening the scarf-joints of timbers, a patent was taken out for their application to fastening the butt-joints of iron rails, and it was held that the patent was bad, because it claimed the application of an old contrivance to an analogous purpose.

The result is, that the verdict must be entered for the defendant on all the issues involving this question.

Rule absolute accordingly.

Action—Lateral Support—Adjoining Landowners—Damage.

EASEMENTS.—In order to entitle the owner of land to succeed in an action against a neighbour for excavating near his boundary, it is necessary that appreciable damage should have been caused thereby.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of certain land, which received lateral support from certain adjoining land; that the defendants dug in the said adjoining land a certain well near the said land of the plaintiff, and thereby and for want of keeping the sides of the said well shored up, or otherwise preventing the consequences thereafter mentioned, wrongfully deprived the said land of the plaintiff of its said support, whereby it sunk, and certain walls, &c. thereon sunk, and the plaintiff received certain specified damage.

The defendants pleaded not guilty, and not possessed.

At the trial, it appeared that the defendants had dug the well as in the declaration alleged, and afterwards filled it up; that the soil was friable and sunk in the centre of the filled-up well about nine inches, and that a wall of the plaintiff fell, whereby he received damage to the amount of about 15*l.* For the plaintiff, it was contended that the plaintiff's lands would have sunk even if the wall had not been there, and so he was entitled to 15*l.*, and that at all events he was entitled to nominal damages, as some portion of his land under any circumstances must have subsided.

The learned Judge directed the jury that, unless they thought (excluding the wall from their attention) appreciable damage had been caused by the well, their verdict should be for the defendants; but that if they thought there was appreciable damage, then for the plaintiff. The jury found that there had been no appreciable damage to the land, and the learned Judge directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiff to move to set it aside and enter a verdict for himself for such sum below 15*l.* as the Court should direct, on the ground that the facts proved at the trial entitled the plaintiff to a verdict without proof of pecuniary damage.

A rule nisi having been obtained pursuant to such leave,

Joyce shewed cause.—This was an action for injury to lateral support, and it was conceded that the wall was new and there was no right to lateral support for it. With respect to the land, there was not any appreciable damage, and that is necessary in such a case as this to entitle the plaintiff to succeed. This follows from the principle laid down in Bonomi v. Backhouse (El. B. & El. 622; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 378; 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 181), that the damage, and not the act, is the cause of action.

[ERLE, C.J.—I directed the jury in the following way: “ Unless you think there was appreciable damage from the well (excluding the wall from your attention) your verdict should be for the defendant, but if appreciable for the plaintiff.”]

Yes, and it is submitted that the direction was correct, for the present case was not like the case of Browne v. Robins (4 Hurl. & N. 186; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 250), where the land would have subsided even if the building had not existed.

Serj. Robinson and Sharpe, in support of the rule.—Where there is an injury to a right appreciable damage is unnecessary. Now here there not only was, but there must have been a subsidence of the soil even if the wall had not been there. This being so, the notes to Ashby v. White (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 105) and Broom's Commentaries, p. 82, shew that the plaintiff is entitled to at least nominal damages. But he is entitled to more; because as the land would have subsided he is entitled also to recover for the damage to the wall, which sank down with the land, as is shewn by the case of Browne v. Robins (4 Hurl. & N. 186; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 250).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. Where there is an actionable wrong, such, for instance, as a person stepping on another man's land, or a returning officer refusing a vote tendered to him, or an interference with the flow of water to which a man is entitled, it is not necessary to prove pecuniary damage. But where an adjoining owner of land does a lawful act of ownership on his land, which is no wrong of itself, it may become actionable if appreciable damage be caused to his neighbour. Thus, for instance, if a man has a drawing-room window, and his neighbour builds a chimney which pours its smoke into it, the question of damage arises, and the maintainability of the action depends on the annoyance caused and the circumstances under which it occurs; again, if dancing causes a vibration in a neighbour's house, there is not necessarily a cause of action; but if it would probably bring down the house, he has no right to have a ball, and would be liable after notice for the falling of the house because damage occurred. So the noises of trades, as of a coffee-mill or plate-rolling mill, these only became actionable grievances because of the damage. Now, in the present case, a well was properly sunk and no damage accrued from this act, which was done by the right of ownership in the soil; it was then filled up,—this also was lawful; but being filled with soft materials it subsided about nine inches in the centre. I think, on the evidence, that between the well and the plaintiff's land there was some subsidence of the sandy particles of the plaintiff's land, so that some of the plaintiff's land was moved. But still the acts of the defendant were lawful acts of ownership, and it was left to the jury to say whether there was any appreciable damage, and they find there was none that was appreciable. It is said that the action lay if any particle of the plaintiff's soil fell. I am of opinion that this is not so, for I think that this is a case where there was a lawful act, which could only become actionable if appreciable damage accrued from an unreasonable use of the soil as between neighbours. Where certain chemical works were erected and caused destruction of the herbage of a neighbour, it was held that there was a cause of action, but the learned law Lords said that if there was no sensible material damage no action lay. I am therefore of opinion that there is no cause of action, because the jury have found that there was no appreciable damage.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Where there is a trespass, the act itself without any damage is a cause of action. But, as was said in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Bonomi v. Backhouse (El. B. & El. 622; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 378; 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 181), "no cause of action accrued for the mere excavation by the defendant in his own land, so long as it caused no damage to the plaintiff." Damage here would alone give a cause of action, as has been pointed out by my Lord. There appears to have been none that was appreciable, and therefore the case of Bonomi v. Backhouse (El. B. & El. 622; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 378; 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 181) is in point.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of opinion that the finding of the jury concludes this case. The direction of the learned Judge is not here complained of, nor is there an application for a new trial. The jury finds there was no appreciable damage, i. e., not any damage in the legal sense. It has been argued that if there be any subsidence there is necessarily damage; but it is a question of degree, and there might be damage only to an inappreciable extent, and if there is no damnum there is no injuria, the act here being per se lawful, and only constituting an injuria by reason of sensible damage ensuing.

Rule discharged.

TODDERDELL v. THE FAREHAM BLUE BRICK AND TILE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Joint-Stock Company—Power of Directors to bind Company.

COMPANY.—Seven persons signed a memorandum of association of a company for making bricks; the memorandum was duly registered. There never were any articles of association. Two of such persons (one professing to act as managing director, the other as chairman of the company) engaged the plaintiff as foreman of the company at certain brick-works. In an action by the plaintiff for his wages,—Held, that, in the absence of proof to the contrary the company must be taken to have given authority to such two persons to engage the plaintiff.

This action was brought to recover a sum alleged to be due for six weeks' wages from the defendants to the plaintiff as foreman to the said company.

At the trial, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any liability of the defendants to the plaintiff.

Pope now moved pursuant to such leave, and on the following statement of facts:—The question is, whether the company are liable, or the two persons who, in fact, engaged the services of the plaintiff. On the 27th of November, 1865, a memorandum of association of the company was registered. This memorandum was signed by seven persons, and described the objects of the company as follows: "Thirdly, the objects for which the company is established are, the manufacture of blue and other bricks, tiles and goods to be used for building, paving, stabling, drainage, or any other useful purpose, and the sale and export thereof respectively at home and abroad. Also, the manufacture and sale of all such other goods and articles, useful or ornamental, of whatever nature or kind, as can or may be made or manufactured, wholly, or in part, out of earth, clay, gravel, sand, loam, or any other sort of earth and soil. Also, for the making, vending or exporting, as the company may think proper, all or any of the said bricks, tiles, goods and articles. To purchase, take on lease, or otherwise hire land, buildings and other premises for the purposes of the said company. Also, to sell, let or dispose of any land, buildings or other premises and property so purchased, taken or hired, or belonging to the said company, if deemed expedient. Also, to employ all necessary workmen and servants, and to make or purchase all such materials, machinery, plant, fixtures, fittings and things as shall be necessary for the due carrying out the objects of the company, and to enter into any contracts, and generally to do all such acts and things for effectually carrying out all or any of the above objects as may be deemed necessary, or incidental, or conducive to the attainment thereof." There never were any articles of association, nor were any shares allotted. On the 29th of November, 1865, two of the persons who had signed the memorandum of association entered into the following agreement with the plaintiff: "Agreement made this 29th of November, 1865, between the undersigned, Joseph Brace and Thomas Thompson Ponsonby, and the undersigned, Charles Totterdell, whereby, for the consideration hereinafter named, it is agreed that the said Charles Totterdell shall be employed as foreman to the Fareham Blue Brick and Tile Company (Limited), at a salary of 3*l.* per week, a house on the works rent free, or an allowance in lieu thereof of 10*l.* per annum, and coal not exceeding six tons per annum. Salary to commence December 16, 1865. This agreement is entered into provided the said Charles Totterdell manufactures blue bricks from the company's clay at Fareham, equal in quality to those made by him at Bishops Waltham, samples of which are now at the stations on the London and South-Western Railway. Provided Charles Totterdell carries out the manufacture as above described, six months' notice is to be given and accepted on either side as cancelling this agreement; but in the event of Charles Totterdell failing to carry out the manufacture as described above, then and in such case one month's notice from the company shall be held to cancel and void this agreement. This agreement the one professed to sign as managing director, the other as chairman of the company. The plaintiff thereupon entered on certain land indicated to him by Brace and Ponsonby, carried on the business of brick-making there, under this agreement, and was paid from time to time by Brace and Ponsonby. But being unable to get six weeks' wages he brought this action against the company.—[He also went into a history of the company, whereby it appeared that Brace and Ponsonby, having a lease of the land, had agreed with one Thompson (one of the seven) to get an underlease for him on behalf of the company which they were about to form, and to assign their brick business also in the same way, but that the deeds of underlease and assignment in fact had not been executed by or to the company as contemplated; and he made various statements as to the company as a body not having acted; but these facts clearly could not have been before the jury at the trial.]—At the trial, the defendants called no evidence, but contended that the plaintiff should be nonsuited, and it is submitted that they were right in that contention. By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 15. it is enacted, that "in the case of a company limited by shares, if the memorandum of association is not accompanied by articles of association, or in so far as the articles do not include or modify the regulations contained in the Table marked A. in the first schedule hereto, the last-mentioned regulations shall, so far as the same are applicable, be deemed to be the regulations of the company, in the same manner and to the same extent as if they had been inserted in articles of association and the articles had been duly registered." And as, by clause 53, until directors are appointed, the subscribers of the memorandum of association shall be deemed to be directors, Brace and Thompson were directors. The proceedings of directors are governed by clauses 66. to 71, which amongst other things empower them to determine the quorum necessary to transact business, and also to delegate their powers to a committee; but nothing of the kind was done in the present case; there really was no power in Brace and Ponsonby to bind the company, and the plaintiff cannot, by simply shewing that they, being and professing to act as directors, signed this agreement, make the company responsible.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. This is an action for work done against a company constituted under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. ss. 6. and 15, without any articles of association: the work was within the scope of the objects of the company, and done on land which the company either had taken, or afterwards made up their mind to take. Brace and Ponsonby engaged the plaintiff as foreman, and signed the agreement, one describing himself as director, the other as chairman, of the company. The agreement, on its face, was made on behalf of the company; the work was done under the agreement; the plaintiff had also done work previously, been paid by Brace and Ponsonby, and given them a receipt; and the form of the transaction was that the plaintiff was dealing with these two persons as acting for the company. The question is, whether the plaintiff has made out a case against the company, whereby the company is bound; and inasmuch as the defendants called no evidence, if there be any evidence for the plaintiff it will be enough. The question of whether the company is bound depends on the power of the directors. Now, by the 1st Schedule, Table A, clause 53, "Until directors are appointed, the subscribers of the memorandum of association shall be deemed to be directors," therefore the seven persons who signed the memorandum in the present case were directors. Then, by clause 66, "The directors may . . . determine the quorum necessary for the transaction of business . . ."; and, by clause 68, "the directors may delegate any of their powers to committees consisting of such member or members of their body as they think fit. . . ." It therefore appears that the agreement made by Brace and Ponsonby was a document which they might have had authority to make, and which might have been properly made by them for the company. The result of the authorities is, that persons (in the situation of these directors) who might have had authority, and who do an act purporting that they have it, must be taken to have had authority, especially in the presence of the fact of the action of the parties on the assumption that this was so. And here Brace and Ponsonby had ostensible authority to bind the company. The point was much considered in the case of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand (5 El. & B. 248; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 327), in which case the Queen's Bench gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Exchequer Chamber (6 Ibid. 327; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 317) affirmed such judgment on the ground that where parties dealing with the directors of joint-stock companies would, on reading the deed or statute limiting their authority, find a permission to do an act on certain things being done, such person have a right to assume that such things have been done. It is true that the agreement in the present case is not under seal, and therefore there is no estoppel; but still the evidence adduced for the plaintiff was not rebutted, and till then it is to be assumed that these directors had power to bind the company.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear the company existed, and the directors existed; and the law provides that a committee of one or more directors might act, so that these two directors might have had power to act. The company consisted of only seven persons, and the question of whether the other five gave authority is immaterial in the present case; because, if a person gave an appearance of authority, he will be bound by an act within such apparent authority. Here ostensible authority was given, and there was, therefore, evidence to go to the jury.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The agreement was within the scope of the business of the company. It was made by two directors professing to act for the company; it was one which these two directors might have had authority to make, either as a quorum or a committee: why, therefore, is the company not to be bound? The company appoint directors, who make a contract, apparently within their powers, and the onus is therefore on the company to shew that there was no authority. In The Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 Ibid. 327; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 317), Chief Justice Jervis says, "Parties dealing with the directors of these joint-stock companies are bound to read the deed or statute limiting the directors' authority, but they are not bound to do more. The plaintiffs, therefore, assuming them to have read this deed, would have found not a prohibition to borrow, but a permission to borrow on certain things being done. They have, in my opinion, a right to infer that the company, which put forward these directors to issue a bond of this sort, have had such a meeting, and passed such a resolution as were requisite to authorize the directors in so doing." Why are we not here to assume that what was apparently well done was really so done? The plaintiff also here did work on land which was substantially the land of the company, which must have had knowledge of his so acting.

Rule refused.

Charter-Party—Deviation—Being Ready—Condition Precedent.

SHIPPING.—The plaintiffs, who were owners of an unfinished steamer at Newcastle, chartered her to the defendants (who knew her state) by a charter-party which provided "that the said ship, being tight, &c., should, with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owners' benefit direct or on the way, proceed to Alexandria," and there take a cargo for England. When the time for a trial trip came the builders objected to her returning to Newcastle, on account of the dangerous bar; the plaintiffs therefore put on board ballast and cargo for London, where she was to be completed and all defects were to be put right, instead of in Newcastle. The ship arrived in London, was put right, and no delay occurred by these proceedings; she then, on her voyage out, took a cargo to Constantinople, which caused her to arrive at Alexandria a few days later than she otherwise would have done. The defendants refused to furnish a cargo, whereupon the plaintiffs brought their action:—Held, that there had been no breach of any condition precedent by the plaintiffs; that they were entitled to succeed in their action; and that the defendants had their remedy by cross-action for any damage that had accrued to them.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, for the recovery of damages for the loss sustained by the plaintiffs, by reason of the defendants having made default in shipping a cargo on board the plaintiffs' vessel, Ephesus, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned; and by consent of the parties, and by order of Martin, B. there was stated without any pleadings the following

CASE.

The plaintiffs are shipowners, carrying on business at Liverpool and London, under the style and firm of Robert M'Andrew & Co., and were before and at the time of the transactions hereinafter mentioned, and have ever since continued to be, the owners of the steamer Ephesus. The defendants are merchants and shipowners, carrying on business at Liverpool under the style and firm of Chapple, Dutton & Co. On the 15th of October, 1864, the said steamer Ephesus was launched at Newcastle, a great portion of her engines and machinery having already been put in her, and was immediately afterwards placed in the hands of Messrs. Randolph, Elder & Co., engineers, for completion ready for sea. About the 1st of December, 1864, negotiations were opened between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the purpose of the chartering of the Ephesus by the defendants; these negotiations were conducted by Mr. Nance, a ship-broker, on behalf of the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Pothonier, a ship-broker, on behalf of the defendants. On the 7th of December, 1864, the aforesaid negotiations were concluded by a charter-party being made by and between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and signed by or on behalf of the said parties respectively, which said charter-party provided "that the said ship, being tight, staunch and strong and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owners' benefit direct or on the way, proceed to Alexandria, Egypt, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the factor of the said freighters, in the customary manner, a full and complete cargo of cotton, . . . the captain being at liberty to take other usual cargo (on freight) for ballast only, and to render customary assistance with boats and crew in loading, which the said merchants bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, &c., and being so loaded shall there-with proceed to London or Liverpool direct as ordered, on signing B Lading"; and contained stipulations as to payments of freight, &c., and the usual exception as to the act of God, &c. In the course of the negotiations Mr. Pothonier was informed by Mr. Nance that the plaintiffs would not guarantee the time within which the vessel would be finished, and that he should therefore insert in the charter-party the words "on being ready," and these words were inserted accordingly. After the making of the said charter-party, the plaintiffs urged Messrs. Randolph, Elder & Co., from time to time, to complete the fitting up of the Ephesus, with as much despatch as possible, and did all that was in their power to expedite the completion of the vessel fit for sea. Between the time of the launch and the sailing of the ship from Newcastle, as hereinafter mentioned, several casualties occurred in the finishing of the engines and machinery; but Messrs. Randolph, Elder & Co. were not guilty of any unreasonable delay in proceeding with the completion of the work. It is usual for steamers to make a trial trip before starting on their first voyage; and in order to have a satisfactory trial trip at Newcastle it is necessary for steamers to put out to sea, having to cross and re-cross the bar at the mouth of the Tyne, an operation accompanied by some risk in the case of a steamer of the size of the Ephesus at that period of the year. About the middle of the month of December, 1864, the plaintiffs proposed to the builders, at the request of Randolph, Elder & Co., that the vessel should make a trial trip to sea and back over the bar, but this was objected to by the builders, and thereupon it was arranged that the vessel should make her trial trip from Newcastle to London instead of returning to the Tyne, and that the deficiencies of her machinery, if any, should be made good in London. Accordingly, on the 12th of January, 1865, the ship left Newcastle for London, with 1,400 tons of coals, shipped under charter-party. Before leaving Newcastle, the ship, in order to avoid delay at Alexandria, loaded sufficient ballast to enable her to bring back a cargo of cotton from Alexandria, but no delay at Newcastle was occasioned by her so doing, or by the shipment of the coals. The ship met with accidents to her machinery between Newcastle and London, where she arrived on the 15th of January, 1865, and was detained in London repairing the same for about six weeks, but such repairs were executed there as speedily as they could have been done at Newcastle. While in London, the ship took on board goods for Malta, Syra, Constantinople, Smyrna and Alexandria, but no delay was thereby occasioned, the goods being shipped before the repairs to the machinery were complete. The ship sailed from London on the 1st of March, 1865, and again met with accidents to her machinery, and put into Plymouth, and was kept there a few days repairing the damage done, after which she sailed, on the 9th of March, 1865, from Plymouth for Malta, and after touching and unloading cargo there, and at Syra, Constantinople, and Smyrna, arrived at Alexandria on the 29th of April, 1865. The ship, when she sailed from Newcastle, was not complete and ready for the chartered voyage. There was no usage of trade by which vessels bound from Newcastle or London to Alexandria are justified in taking goods to Syra, Constantinople or Smyrna if the geographical position of the various ports does not warrant such a course. After the making of the charter-party, many letters passed between the plaintiffs and the defendants or their London house, and their respective attornies. [These letters, which were set out at length in the case, were relied on by the plaintiffs as a waiver of any breach of a condition precedent which had occurred; but, in consequence of the view the Court took on the previous question, it is unnecessary to insert them.] The Ephesus arrived at Alexandria on the 29th of April, 1865, and was ready to load a cargo on the 1st of May, 1865. Had the Ephesus sailed direct from London to Alexandria and discharged her outward cargo there, instead of taking cargo to the various ports at which she touched on her way out, she would have been ready to load her homeward cargo at Alexandria a few days before the said 1st of April, 1865. Upon the 29th of April, 1865, the master of the Ephesus addressed a letter to Mr. Grace, the person mentioned by the defendants as their agent, informing him of the arrival of the vessel, and that laying days would commence on the 1st of May. To this letter the said master received a reply, stating that a cargo could not be provided, and advising him to get other employment. To this reply the said master returned an answer reiterating his first letter. Freight for cotton at Alexandria fell gradually and continuously from the month of January, 1865, to the month of May, 1865. On the 5th of May, 1865, the master, not having received any cargo from the said Charles Grace, went to his office at Alexandria. The said Charles Grace was at the time absent in Europe, but the master of the Ephesus saw Mr. Glover who was clerk of the said Charles Grace, and who had authority to act for the latter. He stated to Mr. Glover that the steamer was ready to receive cargo, and formally demanded a cargo from him, whereupon the latter informed him that he had no cargo for him, and that the master must therefore seek a cargo elsewhere for his vessel. The master accordingly did the best he could, but was unable to obtain more than a small freight.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether under the aforesaid circumstances the plaintiffs have a right of action against the defendants for refusing to load the Ephesus at Alexandria as aforesaid. The Court, or Court of Appeal, is to be at liberty to draw all such inferences of fact as a jury would be entitled to do. If the Court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs for 4,133*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* and costs of suit. If the Court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nol. pros., with costs of defence, shall be entered up for the defendants.

Mellish (Cohen with him), for the plaintiffs.—There was no warranty as to the condition of the ship at the time of the charter, nor as to the time necessary to get her ready. In the proviso "on being ready," the word "ready" means "finished." The ship was unfinished to the knowledge of both parties, and this clause was therefore inserted. This being so, two breaches of the charter-party might be alleged: first, that the ship was not in every way fitted for the voyage to Alexandria; secondly, that she went to ports to which she was not entitled to go. Now these were not breaches of conditions precedent according to the authorities; if they were, the consequence would be that if the ship were not ready at the moment of starting, or there was an hour's delay on the voyage, the contract would be void. The first objection here is, that the ship was not ready at Newcastle, but she was ready at Alexandria, which was sufficient. Again, the going to London was "on the way." It is clear a trial trip was necessary, and it was better to go on to London than back over the bar to Newcastle. The builders objected to the going over the bar again, and the repairs were as speedily done in London. So that, although there may have been a nominal breach, no delay resulted; and this being so, the going to London could not be such a breach as allowed the throwing up of the charter-party. The going to London was not a different voyage.

[WILLES, J.—Suppose she had gone to Edinburgh; to what extent does going on a different voyage affect you, if the object of the voyage is not frustrated?]

Clipsham v. Vertue (5 Q.B. Rep. 265; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 2) shews it does not affect us; so do Tarrabochia v. Hickie (1 Hurl. & N. 183; s. c.

26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 26) and Freeman v. Taylor (8 Bing. 124; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 26), which latter seems to be the original case. With respect to the first of the two alleged deviations, the one to London, it was bona fide, and there was no delay and no throwing up of the voyage. And as to the second, to Constantinople, though it is not contended that it was "on the way," yet there was only a delay of a few days, and it was the subject of a cross-action.

[BYLES, J.—In Seeger v. Duthie (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 45; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 253; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 65) we have all the cases before us.]

In Behn v. Burness (3 Best & S. 751; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 204) the Court, in discussing Dimech v. Corlett (12 Moo. P.C.C. 199), says in its judgment, "But the Court did not, we apprehend, mean to intimate that the frustration of the voyage would convert a stipulation into a condition, if it were not originally intended to be one." The only complaints are, first, that the ship ought to have been ready at Newcastle; secondly, that she ought not to have gone to London or Constantinople. As to the first, there was no breach, and certainly no delay was caused; as to the second, there was only a delay of a few days caused, for which a cross-action will lie; the not proceeding with reasonable speed is not a condition precedent; and even if the frustration of the voyage would be a defence, that did not occur in the present case; and it is submitted that the case of Dimech v. Corlett (12 Moo. P.C.C. 199) is in point. (He also argued the question of waiver.)

Edward James (Watkin Williams with him), for the defendants.—Whether a stipulation be a condition precedent depends on the intention to be gathered from the document itself, and does not depend on subsequent matters. If there be a condition precedent, it must be fulfilled, and it is immaterial whether delay was caused or not. Here there is a condition precedent, which has been violated. The stipulation is, that the ship is to make a voyage from Newcastle to Alexandria, and also may take an outward cargo "direct or on the way." She was therefore to start direct from Newcastle, or at least from some place on the way. Suppose she had gone to Hamburgh, and then on, it could hardly have been contended that this place was on the way. If she had gone to Edinburgh and back to Newcastle, and thence started, it perhaps might have been different. It is submitted that London was not on the way to Alexandria; the other side admit that Constantinople was not. Was there, then, a condition precedent? It is submitted there was. In Clipsham v. Vertue (5 Q.B. Rep. 265; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 2) there was no stipulation like the one in the present case; and the parties may make it as much a condition precedent that the ship shall start and go direct, as that she shall start on a particular day; and the meaning of the present contract is, that the charterer says to the shipowner, "You may take a cargo, but you must not interfere with my right to have the vessel at Alexandria, and must go direct." The expressions made use of in Behn v. Burness (3 Best & S. 751; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 204) favour this view. (He also argued the question of waiver.)

ERLE, C.J.—In this case the charterer says that he has a defence to the action, because there is a condition precedent which has been broken, and which entitles him to throw up the charter. Now, it is clear that a charter may contain a stipulation or a condition which, if broken, then exonerates the charterer. And the question is, whether here there is a stipulation for breach of which an action would be the remedy, or a condition the breach of which exonerated the defendant. This is a matter of construction of the instrument and intention of the parties. The charter here says, "Shall with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owner's benefit direct or on the way, proceed to Alexandria;" and this is relied on as containing a condition for the breach of which the defendant may throw up the charter. But, in my opinion, there is nothing to shew that this was intended to be a condition precedent. The defendants complain of two deviations, the first deviation being to London, the second to Constantinople. If there were a condition that the vessel should go direct from Newcastle to Alexandria there would have been a breach of it. But I think it clear that there was only a stipulation, and that it was not the intention of the parties that the defendant should be exonerated if there was a slight deviation. In Behn v. Burness (3 Best & S. 751; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 204) the charter contained the words "now in the port of Amsterdam," and the Court there held that this was a condition which was the base of the contract, and which, being broken, was an answer to an action for not loading; but here I think this was not the case. The question here is one of construction; and I am of opinion that here there is merely a stipulation for the breach of which an action will lie, and not a condition precedent the breach of which exonerates the charterer. This being the construction of the charter, it is unnecessary to go into the other questions.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant seeks here to answer the action by setting up a deviation and delay. It is settled (in this Court, at least), that if the deviation and delay have the effect of depriving the charterer of the entire benefit of the contract, or, as it has been expressed, goes to the whole root of the matter, or entirely frustrates the object in view, there is an answer to the action; but a bare deviation short of this only gives an action for damages, and does not defeat the charter. From the time of Boone v. Eyre (1 H. Black. 273), Ritchie v. Atkinson (10 East, 295), and Davidson v. Gwynne (12 Ibid. 381), this has been the rule; and the expressions used in the more recent cases are not new phrases. In the present case I think there was a delay which is to be compensated in damages, and does not go to the root of the matter or frustrate the object in view. And it may be observed that this vessel was not engaged for a particular cargo, and the matter may have been merely a speculation on the fall or rise of freight. It appears the ship was a few days late at Alexandria, and, as the rates were falling, it follows there was a few pounds difference in the freight, the consideration; this being so, apply the above principle, and it follows that the delay is matter for a cross-action and not for resistance to the present action.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The true principle is laid down by my Lord in Seeger v. Duthie (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 45; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 253; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 65)—"The construction to be put on these contracts depends on the terms of the individual contract, and what we have to look to is to ascertain the intention of the parties, and whether a particular stipulation is a condition precedent or an independent stipulation is to be ascertained by what we consider to have been the intention of the parties expressed in the instrument." This is the true principle, and correctly puts the result of the cases. Now here the words are, that the ship shall proceed "with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owner's benefit, direct or on the way." The condition, if it be one, is not express, but implied, and therefore, in order to see if it be a condition, one must look to the question of inconvenience, and if this were to be construed as a condition, most charter-parties would be defeated. It is clear law, no doubt, that in such a case as this there is an implied undertaking not to deviate; but in Freeman v. Taylor (8 Bing. 124; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 26), where the vessel deviated to the Mauritius, and there was a delay of many weeks, it was held that, in order to excuse the freighter from loading, the deviation must be such as to deprive him of the benefit of the contract. Here the deviation to London was probably nothing but a trial trip, and did not add a day to the length of the voyage; and that to Constantinople, though it was an actual breach, still it was not a breach of a condition, which is an answer to the action.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is but one question which is one of construction, viz., whether the stipulation, "shall with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo, for owners' benefit, direct or on the way, proceed to Alexandria," is a condition or not. I think it clear that it is not a condition precedent. If damage has ensued, there must be compensation, but it does not go to the whole consideration, and is recoverable by cross-action. The question of the object in view being wholly frustrated does not arise here, as no other consequence has ensued than a deprivation of freight.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Bankrupt—Arrest after Protection—Penalty—Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 113.

BANKRUPTCY.—An adjudicated bankrupt, who had obtained protection, was arrested by a sheriff's officer by virtue of a warrant issued under an attachment out of Chancery for non-payment of money; he shewed his protection and claimed his discharge, but the officer detained him longer than would have been necessary to obtain a copy of the protection, and on the same day lodged him in gaol; the bankrupt brought an action against the officer for penalties under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 113:—Held, that the officer was liable for one penalty.

This was an action, brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, to recover penalties under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 113, at the rate of 5*l.* per diem, under the following circumstances, which were stated in the form of a special case.

In the year 1857 one H. Lees filed a bill in Chancery, against the plaintiff and others, praying, among other things, that the plaintiff should pay over to him certain sums of money received as an executor and trustee. On the 16th of February, 1865, an order was made by the Master of the Rolls that on or before the 26th of April, 1865, the plaintiff should pay certain sums of money, which, however, he was unable to do. On the 27th of April, 1865, the plaintiff was duly adjudicated bankrupt, and obtained an order of protection. On the 1st of May, 1865, an attachment was issued out of Chancery against the plaintiff, for disobedience to the before-mentioned order. On the 2nd of May, 1865, the sheriff of Lancashire thereunder issued his warrant to the defendant to attach the plaintiff. On the 3rd of May, 1865, the defendant arrested the plaintiff by virtue of this warrant, whereupon the plaintiff produced his protection to the defendant, and demanded to be discharged, but the defendant would not discharge him, but kept him in custody longer than was necessary for obtaining a copy of such protection, and until the defendant on the same day delivered him to the gaoler of Lancaster Castle, the same being the prison of the sheriff of Lancashire, and the plaintiff thenceforth remained in custody of the said gaoler till discharged as hereafter mentioned. On the 4th of May, 1865, the defendant was served with a copy of the plaintiff's protection order and an attorney's letter, demanding his discharge, under pain of the penalties for which the action was brought; and on the same day the plaintiff shewed his order of protection to the gaoler, who refused to discharge him. On the 13th of May, 1865, the plaintiff applied to the Court of Bankruptcy at Manchester for his discharge, but the Court refused, thinking that as the plaintiff was in custody under an attachment out of Chancery, the gaoler would not be justified in releasing him. On the 2nd of June, 1865, the plaintiff passed his last examination, obtained his order of discharge in bankruptcy, and again applied to the Court to be discharged from custody, but the Court again refused to do so. On the 6th of June, 1865, the matter was brought before the Master of the Rolls, who ordered him to be discharged, and on the 8th of June, 1865, he was so discharged.

The question now submitted to the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover any, and if so, how many, of the penalties sought to be recovered.

Field (Holker with him), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was arrested for debt within the 113th section of the statute; this is decided by The King v. Edwards (9 B. & C. 652), Ex parte Parker (3 Ves. 554) and Ex parte Bury (7 Jur. O.S. 406). Again, even if it may be said that the defendant could not make the gaoler discharge the plaintiff, and that the gaoler had no power to do so, still a person who puts a man into the custody of one who has no authority to discharge him must pay the penalty of his act, and the plaintiff is entitled to 5*l.* per day till the 8th of June.

Crompton Hutton, for the defendant.—The sum for which the plaintiff was attached was, no doubt, in the nature of a debt; but the question is, whether it was a debt within section 113. The 5 Geo. 2. c. 30. s. 5. is the first enactment on this matter, and the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. repeats the words therein contained. It is submitted that these statutes meant arrest on mesne process, a process then in force, and usually referred to when such words were used, as distinguished from final process. And the present statute has the same meaning. Ex parte Russell (1 Rose, 278) favours this view. Again, the policy of the act, like the common law, was to privilege a man from arrest during the conduct of the proceedings in bankruptcy—Ex parte Jackson (15 Ves. 117) and Phillips v. Poland (35 L. J. C.P. 128.)

Field, in reply, cited In re M'Williams (1 Sch. & Lef. 169).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the plaintiff for one penalty. The law has imposed an extreme risk on the officer making an arrest, but we must administer the law as we find it. And as the Courts have held that an attachment like this is an attachment for non-payment of a debt within section 112. of this statute, and we cannot say that the word "debt" has different meanings in section 112. and section 113, we must hold that the plaintiff is entitled to recover a penalty for the day during which the defendant kept him in custody.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It does seem hard upon the officer when, as we see, the Court of Bankruptcy held the same opinion as he did on this question, and held that this case was not within section 113. Still, however, this decision was erroneous, and after the case of In re M'Williams (1 Sch. & Lef. 169), before Lord Redesdale, it would be impossible to hold otherwise. Ex parte Parker (3 Ves. 554) is also the same way. Is then the officer to decide at his peril? This throws a great burthen on him, but I am obliged to say that he must, for section 113. takes away all discretion. According to the words of the section, he cannot detain the bankrupt longer than is necessary for getting a copy of the order of protection. Here the officer detained the bankrupt longer than was necessary, and as 5*l.* is to be paid for every day and part of a day the bankrupt is detained after such time has elapsed, the officer is liable to one day's penalty; but he is only liable for one day, because when the defendant was put in gaol he was then entirely out of the control of the plaintiff.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this matter we are entirely precluded from an original opinion by the cases which have been decided. They decide that an attachment for non-payment of money is an execution for a debt, and that an arrest thereunder is an arrest for a debt within the old statutes, the words of which are the same as those in the act now in force. These cases are not merely decisions in equity, for these decisions were acted on by the Queen's Bench in the case of The King v. Edwards (9 B. & C. 652), and as the defendant detained the plaintiff longer than was necessary to obtain a copy of the protection, he is liable; but he is only liable to one penalty, because after the plaintiff was lodged in gaol the detention was not by the defendant.

Bankruptcy—Creditors' Assignee, Appointment of—Certificate under the Seal of the Court.

BANKRUPTCY.—In order to prove his title as creditors' assignee, the plaintiff put in evidence a certificate, dated before action, certifying his proper appointment before action, signed by the Registrar for the Commissioner, and sealed with the seal of the Bankruptcy Court:—Held, that the certificate so sealed was conclusive, and that the defendant could not go into evidence to shew that there was no signature by the Commissioner or his deputy till after action brought.

The plaintiff, as creditors' assignee of one Thomason, a bankrupt, sued the defendant for certain goods which he had seized under a bill of sale executed by the bankrupt. The defendant, among other things, denied the plaintiff's title as assignee.

At the trial, a certificate was put in by the plaintiff, which bore date the 9th of January, 1866, and certified that on the 6th of January, 1866, the plaintiff was duly chosen assignee, and, on his consent, his appointment was ratified by the Commissioner. This certificate was sealed with the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy, and signed by the Registrar as acting for the Commissioner.

The action was commenced on the 13th of February, 1866, and the defendant called evidence to shew that, although the choice by the creditors and oral ratification by the Commissioner were before action, the signature was not till long after action brought; and he contended that the plaintiff could not, therefore, maintain his action.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff's title as assignee had not accrued when the action was brought.

A rule nisi having been granted pursuant to such leave,

Giffard and Horatio Lloyd shewed cause.—The question turns on the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 123, which enacts, that "Where the election of an assignee shall have been accepted by the person elected and confirmed by the Court, the Court shall, by certificate under the hand of the Commissioner and the seal of the Court (to be called the certificate of appointment), declare such creditors' assignee to have been duly elected, and appoint him to the said office accordingly. Such appointment shall be final, and shall not be subject to review or appeal, except as hereinafter provided." It is submitted that the choice by the creditors and ratification by the Commissioner constitutes the appointment, and that the certificate is merely the evidence, just as the date of an order in bankruptcy is the day of its making, not its drawing up—Ex parte The Dudley and West Bromwich Banking Company (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 68). In moving the rule, the other side cited Ex parte Nash (1 Dea. & Ch. 445) in support of the proposition that the appointment is not complete till the declaration of appointment is signed by the Commissioner; but, on examination, it will be found that it was there merely decided that the duration of the meeting was in the discretion of the Commissioner.

[WILLES, J.—By section 203. the document is to be deemed a record, and a record may be drawn up at any time. BYLES, J.—And by section 206. a copy of any proceeding, sealed with the seal of the Court, is to be conclusive evidence that such proceedings have taken place.]

That is so; and, further, the act is only directory, and the appointment valid without a signature, just as a list of voters unsigned by the overseers is not invalid, though the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 13. directs that they “shall” sign—Morgan v. Parry (17 Com. B. Rep. 334; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 141).

M’Intyre, in support of the rule.—By section 116. the creditors may choose an assignee, who may be rejected by the Court, and by section 123, if he accepts, the Court “shall, by certificate under the hand of the Commissioner, and the seal of the Court, declare him duly elected, and appoint him accordingly.” Consequently, it is clear that the appointment is the appointment of the Commissioner in the manner specified. And Ex parte Nash (1 Dea. & Ch. 445), decided under 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 56, shews that this is so. And as by section 117. it is only on his appointment that the property vests in him, the plaintiff here brought his action too soon.

[WILLES, J.—Does not section 203. shew that section 123. is directory?]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The choice and appointment were made before action, but the objection is taken that the signature of the Commissioner or person acting for him was not affixed till after action brought. I think, however, that the seal of the Court made this document valid and a record. By section 203. any proceeding or writing purporting to be a copy of it, so sealed, is to be evidence that such proceedings have taken place, and be deemed a record; and it is therefore incompetent for us to inquire into the matter.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appointment was made and the seal affixed before action brought, but the signature was appended after. Section 123. draws a distinction between the act of the Court and the Commissioner; and it also appears to me that the object of the section was to enable the production of evidence of the appointment, and that this certificate is in much the same position as a certificate of conformity. But, however this may be, by section 1. the Court of Bankruptcy is made a court of record, and by section 203. a document sealed by the seal of the Court is to be deemed a record thereof, and is, therefore, binding on us.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. All we have to see is, if the document on the face of it is right, for it is a record, and any error in it can only be rectified by application to the Court of Bankruptcy. Here there is both the seal of the Court and the signature of the Commissioner, and the document is good on its face.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged.

In the matter of the complaint of DANIEL PALMER v. THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 2.—Undue Preference and Prejudice—Injunction—Authority of previous Decisions under the Act.

CARRIERS.—The decisions on applications for an injunction against undue preference, under the Railway Traffic Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 2, ought not to bind the Court in the manner that a precedent in law binds, and therefore the cases of Garton v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 639; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306) and Baxendale v. the South-Western Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 758) are not always to be followed whenever the vans of a railway company are admitted into their goods station after the hour when it is closed against the public in general.—So held by Erle, C.J. and Montague Smith, J.; but held by Willes, J. and Keating, J. that those cases are binding precedents, and, moreover, that they are right.

Henry James, in Michaelmas Term last, had obtained a rule, on behalf of the complainant, calling on the London and South-Western Railway Company to shew cause why an injunction should not issue enjoining them to desist from giving an undue preference to themselves and to other persons.

The complainant was a carrier, and the complaint was, that the gates of the Nine Elms station of the company were closed at half-past six p.m. against the reception of goods from the complainant for conveyance that evening, although the company's own vans, and also those of Messrs. Baxendale (carriers under the name of Pickford & Co.), were admitted after that hour, and the goods brought by them forwarded that same evening. The consequence of this was, as stated in the affidavits in support of the rule, that both the railway company and Messrs. Pickford, who had receiving-houses for goods in the city of London and borough of Southwark, near to the receiving-houses of the complainant, received goods at their said receiving-houses up to the hour of seven p.m., which they were able to forward on the same night by the company's railway, whilst the complainant could not safely receive and forward the same evening by the railway goods which were brought to any of his receiving-houses after half-past five p.m., as it took about an hour for a cart to drive from such receiving-houses to the said goods station at Nine Elms.

The rule was applied for under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 2.), and it was obtained on the authority of the case of Garton v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 639; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306) and Baxendale v. the South-Western Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 758), from the facts in which cases the present one did not essentially differ.

The nature of the answer of the railway company, as disclosed by the affidavits of their officers, is fully stated in the following judgment of Erle, C.J.

On the 11th and 12th of January—

Giffard shewed cause against the rule, and

Henry James and Eyre Lloyd argued in support of it.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 30th of May, the following judgments were delivered.—

ERLE, C.J.—This was an application for an injunction against undue prejudice, and the affidavits on the part of the applicant shew that he and the railway company and Messrs. Baxendale are collecting carriers collecting goods to be forwarded by the railway; that the gates of the company's station are closed at half-past six against public in general; that the vans of the applicant arriving after that hour have been frequently excluded; and that the vans of the railway company and of Messrs. Baxendale arriving after that hour have been constantly admitted and the goods forwarded the same evening.

The affidavits in answer shew, first, that the company contract to deliver at its destination before morning each and every consignment received into the station before half-past six, and that there is good reason for fixing that hour for the limits of receipt under that contract; and, secondly, that some goods are received into the station after half-past six, and forwarded the same night, and that in so doing the company act rightly both in respect of their own interests and of their duty to their customers.

As to the first point, viz., that there is good reason for fixing the hour of half-past six as the limit of receipt under the contract, the affidavits of the officers of the company state—that traffic is managed in the manner best adapted to secure for all the public in the utmost degree safe and cheap accommodation, without any partiality; that there are daily from Nine Elms 22 goods trains, with 720 railway trucks, carrying 1,000 tons and that 525 road vans arrive daily at that station. That arrangements must be made for delivering this amount of traffic every night among 257 stations. That for the first train at 10.35 there were in April 2,400 consignments each day; that every consignment had to be received, weighed, carried from scales, sorted, loaded on hand trucks, conveyed to railway trucks, entered on truck-lists, loaded into trucks and invoiced. That this process for the first of the goods trains for the more distant stations, in North Devon, has to be repeated in a degree for the goods trains succeeding each other at half-hour intervals till three A.M., for the stations in nearer counties. That the line must be drawn at some point to limit the contract of the company to forward in the course of the night, and that half-past six is the latest practicable time for the receiving of goods with a contract so to forward them. That the outgoing trains are to be arranged, not only with reference to their own safety (but also with reference to the incoming trains, when an analogous process has to be repeated for distributing goods arriving in London. That the hour for contracting to forward the same night must be fixed with reference not only to great differences in the quantity of traffic to which the contract would apply on different nights, but also to great differences in the purposes of the consignors.

These being the facts relevant to the time of closing, I think that the directors had good reason for fixing on half-past six as the latest time for receiving goods under the contract, and that this Court ought not to compel the company to incur the risk of numerous breaches of contract and of numerous collisions by interfering with the complex arrangements in subordination to each other above described.

As to the second point, that some goods are received into the station after half-past six, and forwarded the same night, the affidavits in answer shew that this is done by right, and according to duty, the company having a right to forward goods at any time, and a duty to forward them at all times without delay. When the contract is to attach, there must be a limit of time, and the party claiming to come in under that contract must comply with that limit; and as the applicant claims that his goods should be received and forwarded under the contract, they are properly excluded when not within the time limited for the contract. With respect to the charge that goods are received after half-past six and forwarded the same night, as far as the complaint is general, the answer must be equally general, and it shews classes of cases where the facts complained of are done lawfully and properly, without causing undue prejudice to any one. Thus it appears that the general rule above mentioned for closing the gates at half-past six, and excluding vans after that time, is subject to exception, at the discretion of the superintendent, according to circumstances, such as goods for shipment on a ship about to sail, perishable goods, accidental delays on the road, and the like, and that the complainant has had the benefit of this exception impartially with all other customers. Then, also, with respect to admitting some of the vans of the railway company after half-past six: it appears that there are twenty-seven receiving-houses, and several carmen collecting from several receiving-houses lying in several lines from the circumference of collection towards the centre several times in a day, and that the last collection begins at the circumference at half-past four, and as the quantities vary, each carman is detained more or less as he approaches the station, and so is often admitted after half-past six, and the goods are then forwarded as far as can be conveniently done; and it further appears that in several receiving-houses goods are sorted and weighed, and invoiced and made fit for immediate forwarding, which cannot be done by a stranger to the company, and that there is a reason for admitting vans so loaded from those houses at a later hour, and forwarding those goods for these receiving-houses. The goods for the earliest trains may be sorted from the goods for the later trains, and sent forwards according to the station in time for performing the contract as to those goods; but this species of sorting must be done by agents for the company, as a mistake in sorting would make them liable for a breach of contract.

These being the facts, and half-past six being shewn to be the proper hour for closing, in reference to the contract, if this rule is made absolute, it must be in effect for an injunction against forwarding any goods at all received after half-past six.

The consequence of such an injunction would be that the applicant would have a contingent possibility of being employed to cart some of the goods now carted by the railway company, that is, in case the consignors of such goods were induced by reason of the delay to consign to the railway through him instead of to the railway direct. On the other hand, the consignors of all the goods detained would suffer twenty-four hours' useless delay, the railway company would have to warehouse those goods for twenty-four hours, and the complex arrangements above described would be disturbed.

As to receiving goods after half-past six, all parties are at liberty to receive at the receiving-houses at all hours any goods; the only question is in respect of the obligation to forward. That obligation only attaches where the contract attaches, but where the contract does not attach, still the company has, and ought to have the option of forwarding goods at any time, and violates no right in doing so. The affidavits of the defendants are positive, that the vans admitted after half-past six are so admitted without any partiality or improper motive, and I see no reason for disbelieving them. If we granted an injunction against forwarding in the night any goods unless received at the station before half-past six, we should defeat the purpose of the statute under which we are acting, as that statute, section 2, enacts that every railway shall afford all reasonable facility for receiving, forwarding and delivering traffic on their railway. The proposed injunction would, as it seems to me, cause a violation of the duty thus created, if it caused useless delay.

So the matter would have stood if it had been res integra; but it is said that we are concluded by authority, and that the cases of Bazendale v. the South-Western Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 758) and Garton v. the Great Western Railway Company (6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 639; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306) are in point. In answer to this, I beg to say that the argument from authority seems to me to be without conclusive force in guiding the exercise of this jurisdiction; the question whether undue prejudice has been caused being a question of fact, depending on the facts proved in each case. The legislature intended, by the Traffic Act, to facilitate the transport (that is, the receiving, forwarding and delivering of traffic); and for the purpose of promoting such facility, gave to this Court a discretionary power over all the operations of railway companies, relating to transport of traffic, by issuing an injunction against undue prejudice. And as the terms "undue prejudice" are unlimited, any operation may be within them; so that the power is, in effect, arbitrary, and is not subject to any review, either in respect of the questions of fact or law.

The injunction is a severe infliction as a censure, as a fine in the shape of costs, and as an interruption in the conduct of a very complicated and important business, the directors being subject to imprisonment, and the company being liable to a fine, not exceeding 200*l.* per day, for disobedience to an injunction. Also it is a procedure, in which the railway company can never gain anything, and must always lose something in the shape of costs. The legislature, assuming that some directors would suppose themselves to be above the control of the law, seems to have created the anomalous jurisdiction to bring them down to the level of the law in case of need; and intrusted such a power to this Court of law, in the confidence that the rights of railway companies, under the law, would here be securely protected. In exercising this jurisdiction, and granting an injunction, it seems to me that the Court has to consider the conflict of affidavits, and ascertain therefrom what is the complaint, whether the public have any interest in it, and whether any fair interests of the railway company are involved in it, and whether the directors intentionally violate their duty towards the public, or their company, or the complainant. I recite these considerations for the purpose of supporting my opinion that the grounds for this extraordinary interference must, in each instance, in their nature be almost singular, and can scarcely ever afford any guidance for deciding a subsequent application for an injunction. In confirmation of this opinion, I rely upon the course taken by this Court in granting an injunction against this company at the suit of Mr. Baxendale. I concurred in that decision because I considered myself bound by the precedent in Garton v. the Great Western Railway Company (6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 639; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306). In each case the gates of the goods' station had been closed against the public in general at a fixed hour, and the vans of the company were supposed to be admitted after that hour; and as such admission was decided to be an undue prejudice to Mr. Garton, this Court was induced to decide that an admission of the vans of this company (the South-Western) was also an undue prejudice to Mr. Baxendale; and, on the authority of these two cases, Mr. Palmer now moves for another injunction; and I have been thus obliged either to grant every such application or to reconsider the question of authority, and I have come to the conclusion that it ought not to bind in the manner that a precedent in law binds.

I do not presume to discuss the merits of Mr. Garton's case, as I was not a party to it. I assume it must have been properly decided; but still it is not a precedent that must be always followed wherever the vans of a company are admitted into a station after it is closed against the public. I do not know whether in Garton's case (6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 639; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306) the affidavits of the officers of the company were disbelieved, and the motives of the directors discredited, or whether the interest of the collecting carrier was considered of more importance to the public than the interest of the railway company; such considerations appear to have had weight with this Court in some of the cases against the Great Western Railway Company. None of these considerations appear to me to be relevant against the directors of this company. In my opinion they have done their duty in the conduct of their business, and ought not to be interfered with on the complaint now before us. I am further confirmed in this view by the consequence of the injunction granted at the suit of Mr. Baxendale. I thought at the time it was granted that the defendants had been doing their duty in a proper manner; nevertheless, the injunction went on authority; the consequence has been that the company, in supposed obedience thereto, have submitted to the will of Mr. Baxendale, and appear to have admitted his vans at all hours. The admission of Mr. Baxendale's vans appears to have induced Mr. Palmer to claim a similar admission, and would be a ground for the admission of everybody, if precedent was to be followed. But it is certain that we ought not to follow any precedent if in doing so we should defeat the intention of the legislature as above described; that intention was declared to be to facilitate transport of traffic; it seems to me that the injunction now applied for, that is, an injunction against closing at half-past six, or against forwarding after half-past six, would, in its practical operation, prevent the railway company from forwarding on the same night any goods which arrived at the station after half-past six, and would, therefore, be a hindrance, instead of a facility to transport, and so would be contrary to the interest and convenience of the public. Such an injunction might be the source of private profit to Mr. Palmer, but he has no right to demand that the interests of the public or of the railway should be sacrificed for his private gain. For these reasons I think that the rule should be discharged.

WILLES, J.—Mr. Justice Keating and myself are of opinion that the precedents, which would entitle the applicant to judgment, bind us; and, moreover, that they are right.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred in the judgment of Erle, C.J.

As the Court was thus divided,

The rule dropped.

Scire Facias against a Shareholder on a Judgment against a Railway Company—Tender—Costs.

COMPANY.—The plaintiff, having recovered judgment against the defendants, a railway company, gave a shareholder notice that he was about to apply for a scire facias against him; part of the judgment debt was satisfied by payments from other persons. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to recover from the shareholder a sum which included the residue of the judgment debt, interest thereon, and costs incurred in certain writs of elegit against the company. This sum the shareholder offered to pay under protest; but the plaintiff refused to receive it under protest, and applied for a scire facias:—Held, that the tender under protest was valid; that the costs were not chargeable against the shareholder; and that the rule ought to be discharged, with costs, without prejudice to a future application if the sum claimed, less the costs, were not paid within a reasonable time.

This was a rule calling on B, a shareholder of the Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway Company, to shew cause why a writ or writs of scire facias, on the judgment obtained by the plaintiff in this cause, should not be issued forth against him, as such shareholder, to enable the plaintiff to have execution upon the said judgment, to satisfy him for the residue unpaid on such judgment, amounting to 1,652*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*, to the extent of his shares in the capital of the said company not paid up.

On the 25th of March, 1865, judgment was signed in the action for 1,646*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* debt, and 6*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* costs. Writs of elegit were issued, under one of which 80*l.* were realized, and a shareholder paid 200*l.* on the 2nd of May, 1866. On the 25th of April, 1866, a notice was served on B, which stated that

1,572l. 14s. 8d., parcel of the judgment, remained unsatisfied, and that a scire facias would be applied for. The plaintiff, at the same time, carried on similar proceedings against some other shareholders; and communications took place between the attorney of the plaintiff and the attorney of B. and three other shareholders, with a view to a settlement. The result may be summed up thus: On behalf of the plaintiff a claim was made for 1,596l. 3s. 6d., a sum which was arrived at in the following way: the shareholders were debited with 1,652l. 14s. 8d., the original sum due under the judgment, and 72l. 19s. for interest; they were then credited with 280l., the amount paid, and then debited with 150l. for costs, and 9s. 6d. for additional interest. This sum the shareholders offered to pay under protest, but the plaintiff refused to accept the money, unless such protest was withdrawn. The 150l. for costs were costs incurred in executing the writs of elegit.

Karslake shewed cause, and contended, first, that proper notice ought to have been given of the amount due, and this had not been given, as the demand was of 1,596l., whilst 1,445l. was really due; and, secondly, that the tender under protest was justifiable, and that, under such circumstances, the Court, in its discretion, would not allow the writs to issue.

Wood supported the rule.

ERLE, C.J.—This is a rule obtained by a creditor, who had recovered a judgment against a company, calling upon a shareholder of that company to shew cause why a scire facias should not issue against him, to enable the plaintiff to have execution upon the judgment against the company. Now, these proceedings against the shareholder are proceedings that would entail very considerable cost upon him, and the statute which authorizes us to give the plaintiff the remedy he seeks for, imposes upon us the duty of seeing that the process of the Court is not abused by such creditor. And I think it clear that the party seeking this remedy ought to enable the shareholder to pay everything that is due to the creditor, and ought to enable the shareholder to know what that sum is; because, if the rule is made absolute, and the scire facias issues, and the other proceedings issue, they are all at the cost of the debtor; and if the debtor is willing to pay every farthing that is due, the party that comes to us for leave to issue this process ought to shew him what is due. Now, I observe that this rule is for a scire facias against a party, to shew cause why he should not pay the residue unpaid on a judgment, amounting to 1,652l. 14s. 8d.; and at the time when this rule was moved for, I think that the whole of this sum was not due from the debtor under that judgment, there having been some payments made thereon. But it is the settlement between the attorneys that I go upon; it is that which induces me to discharge this rule. I assume that they are, both of them, gentlemen of the highest respectability, advising their clients according to what they believed to be their rights, standing explicitly on their view of the law. The attorney for the creditor made out his statement of the demand: this amounted not to 1,652l., but to 1,596l. 3s. 6d.; for after giving credit for 280l. paid off, he put into that claim 150l. for costs, and a certain sum for interest, and so made up the balance remaining due to be 1,596l. 3s. 6d. The attorney for the debtor offered to pay this sum under protest, but the attorney for the creditor refused to receive it under protest. And that is the point where these two gentlemen, both of whom I assume to be of high respectability, have stood upon their respective rights. The one says, "You are going on against my clients with proceedings that will run up a considerable amount of costs; I am willing to pay you every farthing of your demand, and so to stop every cost of further proceedings; but as I do not believe it is due, I will pay it under protest." The other says, "I will not take it under protest." And so these expensive proceedings have gone on. I am clearly of opinion that the debtor, being called on in these legal proceedings to pay the debt that is claimed from him, has a right to stop those legal proceedings by payment; and the payment is just as valid where it is made under protest as where it is made without protest. And the debtor has a right to say, "I will stop the proceedings by paying this money, but I protest it is more than I am bound to pay." And in putting in that protest, he reserves to himself any recourse to a just right which the law gives him. And here he might well say, "I propose to give you this 1,596l. 3s. 6d. under protest, because in that demand there was a claim for 150l. costs, which, as at present advised, I think was in excess of the proper demand of the creditor." The parties have stood on their respective rights; they have resorted to this rule, which is a rule which we are bound to make absolute or discharge, according to the real rights or interests of the parties; and in my opinion we are bound to discharge it, because the defendant was willing to have done that which would have stopped the necessity for those proceedings; the creditor has come here without any cause.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that Mr. Wood stated just now with great accuracy the amount which the applicant is really entitled to, and that amount does not include the 150l., or any part of it, under the judgment in the action, and interest. And it would have been well if Mr. Wood's advice had been taken, and acted upon at the time when the correspondence between the attornies took place. The shareholders' attorney does not appear to express any opinion as to whether the 150l. was or might not be due, but was desirous to avoid litigation, and tendered to the attorney of the applicant all that he claimed under protest. Now, if he had tendered all that was claimed, and it had been refused, it must be admitted that this application could not have stood, and the rule must have been discharged, because it would have been an abuse of the process of the Court to apply for or act upon such a rule, or to issue a scire facias under such circumstances. The case, therefore, may be decided on the question of whether there was a valid tender, and whether a debtor, tendering an amount which he is satisfied to pay, rather than be sued for it, may guard himself against an admission that the claim is a just one, so as to enable himself to take further proceedings to test the justice of the claim by adding the words "under protest" to his tender, and tendering under protest. This is a question of general importance. It is quite obvious that he may. I think the protest imposes no condition on the tender. The creditor has only to say, "I take the money—protest as much as you please," and neither party makes any admission. Whereas, if the debtor were not allowed to use some such expression on paying the money, there would be, from his silence, an implied admission that the claim on him was a just one; which, in the case of a disputed claim against a person anxious to avoid litigation, might lead to very unjust consequences. I desire to say I entirely concur in the law and good sense of the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron to that effect in the case of Manning v. Lunn (2 Car. & K. 13). The tender being a good one, these proceedings were unnecessary; and therefore I think the rule ought to be discharged.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only say that the protest cannot affect the validity of the tender. If the claim is rightly made, and can be legally sustained, the words of protest used by the debtor in paying, cannot, in the slightest degree, affect the creditor. Whereas, if the claim is not well founded, or is excessive, the debtor might be compromised in paying it, unless he added those words.

Karslake.—The rule will be discharged, with costs.

ERLE, C.J.—Yes; rule discharged, with costs.¹

(1) It appeared that there was a similar rule against another shareholder, against which also Karslake shewed cause; and one against a third, in which no cause was shewn. The latter was made absolute, Wood undertaking that execution should not issue for more than was really due. With respect to the former, it was also discharged, with costs, the Court giving liberty to Wood to apply again (in that case and the case in the text) if within a reasonable time the creditor was not paid the sum he claimed, less the 150l. for costs, which the Court said they thought he was entitled to demand.

APPLEBY AND ANOTHER v. MEYERS.

Contract—Machinery—Accidental Fire—Right to recover for Portion of Machinery erected.

The plaintiffs contracted with the defendant to erect certain machinery in his buildings; when the machinery was only partly erected, a fire broke out in the buildings and destroyed both the buildings and the machinery then erected thereon:—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendant the price of that portion of the machinery which had been so erected and destroyed.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant, to recover the sum of 419*l.*, for work done and materials provided under the circumstances hereafter stated. By consent of the parties, and by the order of a Judge, there was stated for the opinion of the Court, without pleadings, the following

CASE.

On the 30th of March, 1865, the plaintiffs entered into a certain agreement with the defendant, which was headed—"Specification and estimate of engine, boiler, lifts, &c., for B. Meyers, Esq., Southwark Street,—Messrs. Tillott & Chamberlain, architects,—30th of March, 1865," which contained ten distinct headings, viz., 1, boiler; 2, engine; 3, shafting; 4, lifts; 5, shafting; 6, drying-room; 7, copper pans; 8, tanks; 9, pump; 10, steam boxes: under which headings were particular descriptions of the work to be done respectively, in connexion with them, and the prices to be paid; and which then concluded with these words: "We offer to make and erect the whole of the machinery of the best materials and workmanship of their respective kinds, and to put it to work for the sums above named respectively, and to keep the whole in order, under fair wear and tear, for two years from the date of completion. All brickwork, carpenters' and masons' work and materials are to be provided for us, but the drawings and general instructions required for them to work to, will be provided by us, subject to the architect's approval

(Signed) "Appleby, Brothers."

The total cost of the said works, if they had been completed under the said contract would have amounted to 459*l.*

On the 4th of July, 1864, a fire accidentally broke out on the premises of the defendant in Southwark Street, which entirely destroyed the said premises and the works which then had been erected by the plaintiffs in part performance of the contract above set out. At the time of the fire the works contracted to be erected as aforesaid had not been completed. The premises upon which the several works were to be erected were the property of the defendant, in his occupation, and under his entire control. The plaintiffs had access thereto only for the purpose of performing their contract. At the time of the fire, portions of the items Nos. 1 to 8, were erected and fixed, and some of the materials for others were on the premises. The defendant had not completed the carpenters' and masons' work, to be prepared by him under the said agreement. The tank had been erected by the plaintiffs, and was used by the defendant by taking water therefrom for the purpose of his business, but the other apparatus connected with it, as specified in No. 8, was not completed. The plaintiffs' workmen were still engaged in continuing the erection and completion of the same at the time of the fire.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, under the above circumstances, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the whole or any portion of the contract price.

If the Court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the whole, judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs for 412l. 10s. If the Court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for part only, then judgment shall be entered for such sum as an arbitrator shall direct; he having power to certify for costs, if necessary; in either case, with costs of suit. If the Court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of non pros., with costs of defence, shall be entered up for the defendant.

Holl, for the plaintiffs (May 1).—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover for what they have done on the defendant's premises. Portions of many of the items were erected and fixed to the premises, and the tank was in actual use; portions of others were on the premises; and the defendant had no more than a right to enter to work. The property therefore passed, and the plaintiffs the entitled to recover. Thus, in Menetone v. Athawes (3 Burr. 1592), it was held that a shipwright might recover for work done to a ship which was burnt during the progress of the work in a dock belonging to himself, but for the use of which the shipowner would have to pay; and Lord Mansfield called it a desperate case for the defendant, the shipowner. In the present case salvage would have belonged to the defendant. In Story on Bailments, s. 426, the author says, "If, while the work is going on a thing belonging to the employer, or after it is finished, but before it is delivered, the thing perishes by internal defect, by unavoidable accident, or by irresistible fire, without any default of the workman, Pothier holds that the latter is entitled to compensation to the extent of the value of the labour actually performed, unless his contract import a different obligation, for the maxim is res perit domino." He then says that the same rule holds in the Roman law, and that Mr. Bell has deduced certain rules, the second of which is that if a man be "employed in working up the materials of, or in adding his labour to, the property of his employer, the risk is with the owner of the thing with which the labour is incorporated." And he concludes, in section 426 a, that "these principles seem also well founded in the common law." Here the plaintiffs were adding to land which belonged to the defendant.

Hannen, for the defendant.—This is not a question of whether property passed, but whether a condition precedent has been fulfilled. In Menetone v. Athawes (3 Burr. 1592) there was no stipulation as to the time of payment; and in Chitty on Contracts (7th edit.), p. 514, the author, after citing that case as an authority for the position that "the destruction of the work by an accidental fire or other misfortune, before it is finished or delivered, does not deprive the workman of his right to remuneration to the extent of the work done," goes on to say, "unless by the uniform custom of the particular trade, payment is not to be made until the work is completed and delivered." For which proposition he cites Adlard v. Booth (7 Car. & P. 108), where it was held that a printer who had delivered a portion of the copies of a work, but was prevented from supplying the whole number by a fire on his premises, was not entitled to be paid even for the copies delivered. The dividing line is the time for payment, and in the present case it had not arrived. In Taylor v. Caldwell (5 Best & S. 826; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 164), the defendant had agreed to let the plaintiff a music-hall to carry out certain entertainments; it was burnt down, and it was held that the defendant was excused from performing his contract; and in delivering the judgment of the Court, Mr. Justice Blackburn says, "There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although, in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome or even impossible; . . . but this rule is only applicable where the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition express or implied; and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle that where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must, from the beginning, have known that it could not be fulfilled, unless, when the time for fulfilment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, . . . the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused, in case, before breach performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing, without default of the contractor." Both parties are excused; it is just as if the contract had never been; on the one hand, the workman cannot be sued for non-completion, on the other he cannot sue for what he has done.

Holl, in reply.—Taylor v. Caldwell (5 Best & S. 826; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 164) is in favour of the plaintiffs, for it shews they are excused from completing. In Adlard v. Booth (7 Car. & P. 108) the fire was on the plaintiff's premises. And the before-cited passage in Story on Bailments contains the true rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court¹ was now (June 12) delivered by—

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are engineers, had contracted, by an agreement in writing, with the defendant to do certain works upon buildings on his premises, viz., to provide and erect upon them a steam-engine, and machinery connected with it. The works were divided into different parts, and separate prices were fixed upon each of those parts. The plaintiffs agreed to provide and erect the machinery for those prices. The case finds that the premises were in the occupation, and under the entire control of the defendant; that all parts of the work were far advanced towards completion; that some parts were so nearly finished that the defendant had used them for the purposes of his business; but that none of the parts into which the work had been divided were absolutely complete. The works were in this state when an accidental fire broke out on the defendant's premises and destroyed the defendant's buildings and the works done upon them by the plaintiffs.

The question submitted to us is, whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the whole or any portion of the contract price. It is clear that the plaintiffs cannot recover the whole contract price, as a specific sum, for that was only to be paid on the completion of the works, an event which has not happened. But we think that, under the circumstances, they are entitled, upon an implied contract, to be paid the value of the work done, which value we assume, from the form of the question, the parties are content to estimate upon a due proportion of the contract price.

It was contended, for the defendant, that the fire was a common misfortune, excusing both parties from the performance of the contract; and we were pressed to adopt the principle laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Taylor v. Caldwell (5 Best & S. 826; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 164). In one part of that judgment it is said, no doubt in general terms, "The principle seems to us to be that in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing a condition is implied, that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing, shall excuse the performance." The Court of Queen's Bench may have properly adopted and applied this principle in the case of the contract before them; but we think it cannot be correctly applied to the present case, where the contract is of a different kind, and appears to us to fall within the qualification of the principle found in the early part of the same judgment, where the Court says that, "in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist," the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, or subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused by the perishing of the thing before breach. By the agreement between these parties, the machinery was to be fixed to the buildings of the defendant, so that the parts of it when and as fixed would become his property and subject to his dominion. And we think we fulfil the intention of those who entered into this contract by holding that it is an implied term of it that the defendant should provide the buildings, the subject on which the work was to be done, and keep them in a fit state to enable the plaintiffs to perform their part of the contract. If the defendant had refused to allow the plaintiffs to have the use of the buildings, or by his own act or default had rendered them unfit to receive the work, there can, we apprehend, be no doubt that the plaintiffs might either have sued for a breach of the contract, or have treated the contract as rescinded, and recovered the value of the work done on a quantum valebat count. These rights of action would accrue to the plaintiffs, not by reason of any express words of agreement, but in virtue of the implied term of the contract to which we have referred.

Then is the non-performance of this implied term, on the part of the defendant, excused by the happening of an accidental fire? We think it is not excused by that event. The general rule of law is clear, that when a man contracts to do a thing, he is bound to do it or make compensation, notwithstanding he is prevented by inevitable accident. We hold that an implied promise is present in this contract on the part of the defendant to provide and keep up the buildings, and as a consequence he must be liable in this case, unless we ought to annex a condition or exception to his promise exonerating him from the performance of it in the case of fire or other accident. When the plaintiffs agreed to expend their materials and labour on buildings of the defendant, of which he was to retain the possession and control, it is reasonable to infer that it was contemplated that the subject on which the work was to be done, should be provided and kept at his risk and peril; and it is unreasonable to suppose that the parties intended that if a fire happened, in no way attributable to the plaintiffs, the defendant should be set free from all obligation under the contract. We think that if we were to imply an exception or condition having this effect, we should not fulfil, but frustrate the real intention of the parties. It appears to us that such a fire no more excuses the defendant than an eviction of both plaintiffs and defendant from the buildings by title paramount would have done.

No decision directly in point was cited to us. But the learned counsel on both sides referred to Story on Bailments (section 426. and following sections), and each relied on certain passages, as being in his favour. The application of the maxim res perit domino to cases of a kind in some respects like the present, is discussed by the learned author; but the authorities he has collected appear to leave open the precise question we have to decide in this case. The judgment of the Court is for the plaintiffs to the extent before indicated.

HOOPER v. THE BRISTOL PORT RAILWAY AND PIER COMPANY.

35 L. J. C.P. 299.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, s. 68.—Pleading.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—In an action against a railway company under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, for the full compensation claimed because of a default by the company to summon a jury within twenty- one days, a plea "that the claim was not a bona fide claim within the statute, but in fraud of the defendants and without any reasonable cause," will not be allowed.

Coleridge applied for a rule calling on the defendants to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be allowed to plead the plea hereinafter mentioned. —The action is under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, section 68, for the full amount of the compensation which the plaintiff has claimed under that act, and which he says he is entitled to because the defendants failed to summon a jury within twenty-one days. The matter has been before Mr. Justice Keating, at chambers, who has referred it to the Court. The plea the defendants ask to be allowed to plead is, that the "claim was not a bona fide claim within the statute, but in fraud of the defendants, and without any reasonable cause." In Hayward v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (4 Best & S. 787; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 73) Mr. Justice Mellor says, "The 68th section is intended to meet a different state of circumstances. If the company have taken or injuriously affected land, the claimant may have the compensation assessed under that section, and he may make his claim, which ought to be a bona fide one, because it puts the company under the liability to pay the amount with costs if they do not comply with it and issue their warrant to the sheriff within twenty-one days after the receipt of the notice of claim."

[WILLES, J. referred to Wade v. Simeon (2 Com. B. Rep. 548; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 114).]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the plea cannot be allowed. It must be understood, however, that we do not intend to prejudice any application to plead a plea framed on Wade v. Simeon (2 Com. B. Rep. 548; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 114), or as counsel may advise, setting out how the claim was a fraudulent one.

ANIMALS. FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION.—The defendant sold to the plaintiff a cow which he knew to be infected with a contagious disease, falsely representing to the plaintiff that she was free from disease, and the plaintiff, believing the representation to be true, put the cow in a shed with other cows of his own, which became thereby infected with the disease and died:—Held, that in an action against the defendant for fraudulently representing the cow to be free from disease, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, in addition to the purchase-money he had paid for the cow, the value of the other cows he had lost by reason of their so becoming infected, such damage being the natural consequence of the plaintiff acting on the defendant's representation as if it had been true.

(2) On a subsequent day the Court allowed the defendants to plead a plea, setting out certain facts on which the defendants relied, without discussing its validity, and gave the plaintiff, who was willing that the plea should be pleaded, leave to reply and demur.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant by warranting a cow to be then free from disease, sold the said cow to the plaintiff; yet the said cow was not then free from disease. The second count alleged that the defendant was possessed of a cow which, as the defendant then well knew, was diseased; and the defendant, by then fraudulently concealing from the plaintiff that the said cow was diseased, and representing to him that it was free from disease, induced the plaintiff to buy the said cow for 10*l.* 15*s.*, and which the plaintiff paid to the defendant. Third count—that the defendant was possessed of a cow which, as the defendant then well knew, was a foreign cow, imported into England from parts beyond the seas, and that it had not come from the farm of the father of the defendant, and that it was then suffering from a disease which would infect other cows with which it might be placed or come into contact, and the defendant, by then fraudulently concealing from the plaintiff that the said cow was diseased, and representing to him that it was free from disease, and that it was not a foreign cow, and that it had come from the farm of his the defendant's father, induced the plaintiff, who was then a farmer possessed of other cows, as the defendant well knew, to buy the said cow for 10*l.* 15*s.*, which the plaintiff paid to the defendant, by means of which said several premises the plaintiff lost the said sum of money, and the said cow became of no use to the plaintiff, and infected other cows of the plaintiff with the said disease, and the plaintiff was compelled to sell them at a much lower price than he otherwise would have obtained for them, and the plaintiff otherwise incurred great trouble and expense.

Pleas—First, to the first count, a denial of the warranty; secondly, to the first count, that the said cow was at the time of the said alleged warranty free from disease; thirdly, to the second and third counts, not guilty; fourthly, to the second count, that the said cow in that count mentioned was not diseased as alleged; fifthly, to the third count, that the said cow in that count mentioned was not suffering from the disease therein mentioned as alleged. Issue joined on these pleas.

At the trial, before Pigott, B., at the last Staffordshire Spring Assizes, the following facts were in evidence: The defendant, a cattle-dealer and butcher at Handsworth, in Staffordshire, who had bought the cow, the subject of the action, on the 13th of July, 1865, at the Metropolitan Cattle Market, sold her five days afterwards to the plaintiff, at West Bromwich, in the same county, for 11*l.*, with a warranty of being free from disease. The cow, which was a foreign animal, though represented by the defendant to have come from his father's farm, soon shewed symptoms of illness, and within a week of the sale to the plaintiff died of the cattle plague. That disease was not then known in England, and the jury found that the defendant was not aware when he sold the cow that she was suffering from the rinderpest, but that he knew she was infected with a contagious disease. It appeared that the plaintiff had placed the cow in a building with other cows of his own, and that five of those cows (one of them having been tied up alongside the cow bought of the defendant) became infected with the disease of the cattle plague, and either all died or were obliged to be slaughtered. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for 11*l.* in respect of the money paid for the cow bought of the defendant, and 98*l.* in respect of the other five cows the plaintiff had lost.

Matthews, for the defendant, afterwards obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the Judge misdirected the jury in leaving to them the question of special or consequential damages, or for reducing the damages to 11*l.*, the price paid for the cow sold by the defendant.

Huddleston now shewed cause.—The plaintiff is entitled to keep the special damage on the third count. The defendant warranted the cow, and fraudulently concealed from the plaintiff the fact that she had a contagious disease. The special damage is the natural consequence of the plaintiff acting on the faith of the warranty which the defendant had given.

[WILLES, J.—It is like the case of Langridge v. Levy (2 Mee. & W. 519; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 237).]

Quite so; the damage is the result of the defendant's false representation.

H. Matthews, in support of the rule.—There cannot be any difference between the measure of damages for the breach of warranty and for a false representation; and this special damage which is now sought to be recovered was not the natural result either of the breach of contract, of the warranty, or of the act itself of which the defendant has been found guilty. It does not appear that the defendant knew the plaintiff had other cows, or that the plaintiff was likely to take the course he did of putting the cow in a shed with other cows. In Borradaile v. Brunton (8 Taunt. 533) it was ruled that, in an action for breach of warranty of a chain cable the plaintiffs might, in addition to the value of the cable, recover the value of a lost anchor to which the insufficient cable was attached; but on this case being cited in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 179) Mr. Baron Alderson remarked, "On the same principle, why should not the jury give the value of the vessel if lost?" and Mr. Baron Parke said, "This case is commented on in Sedgwick. The 8th volume of Taunton's Reports is an apocryphal authority." In Hill v. Balls (27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 45) no action was held to lie against a person for selling a horse, which he knew to be afflicted with the glanders, at the suit of the purchaser who bought the same, believing it to be healthy, and placed it in his stable with another horse of his, which in consequence, became infected and died. There Mr. Baron Bramwell says, "But assuming that the declaration shews an unlawful act, I am also of opinion that no damage is stated flowing from it"—"in truth, it all flows from the plaintiff's buying the horse, and dealing with it as he did. Had he not bought it, he would have sustained none of the losses he complains of. Having bought it, had he thought fit at once to kill it, he would have sustained no loss but his first loss. But his buying it and dealing with it as he did are entirely his own acts, and not the result in any sense, certainly not the natural or necessary result of any act of the defendant." The case of Langridge v. Levy (2 Mee. & W. 519; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 237) is distinguishable, for there the gun was sold for the purpose of its being used by the plaintiff.

[ERLE, C.J.—A farmer buying a cow has a right to do with it what is usual in the case of cows, namely, to put it in a cow-house. WILLES, J.—My Brother Bramwell never meant it to be understood in Hill v. Balls (27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 45) that putting a glandered horse with another horse would not produce damage recoverable in an action, but merely that a mere sale of a glandered horse, without warranty or fraud, would not entitle the purchaser to recover the loss he had sustained.]

[ERLE, C.J. referred to Randall v. Raper (El. B. & El. 84; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 266) and Dingle v. Hare (29 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 143).]

In those cases the measure of damages was, in effect, the value of a good article, such as the article had been warranted to be when it was sold.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The plaintiff bought a cow of the defendant, which the defendant warranted to be sound, and it turned out that the cow was not sound and that she died of the cattle plague. The plaintiff further complained that the defendant fraudulently represented that the cow had no infectious disease and that the plaintiff was thereby induced to buy the cow, whereas the defendant knew that she had an infectious disease. Now, I do not stop to inquire into what should be the damages for the breach of the contract of warranty, because it is clear that if a seller makes a false representation, and so induces a person to buy, the buyer has a right to act on that as if it were true; and if it turns out to be false, and the buyer suffers damage, the seller must pay for all the direct consequences that would ensue from the buyer so acting on the representation as if it were true. Here the defendant sold the cow on the representation that she was free from any infectious disease, and he must be liable for the consequences which followed from the plaintiff acting as if the cow were free from any such disease. The plaintiff accordingly put the cow in a shed with other cows, and the defendant must pay for the other cows which died in consequence of this.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment of my Brother Bramwell in Hill v. Balls (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 45) is altogether inapplicable to the present case, because it is founded on a very different state of facts. There the declaration was, that the defendant sold a glandered horse which he knew to be possessed with that disease, and that the plaintiff, believing the horse to be healthy, was induced to buy it; but there was there no warranty nor any misrepresentation or fraud which induced the plaintiff to do what he did there, that is to say, to put the horse with other horses, and on that ground the declaration was held to be bad. That is inapplicable to a case like the present, where there has been a false representation made to the buyer, on which he has acted. The plaintiff, by acting on the defendant's false representation as if it were true, is entitled to recover damages for the injury he has sustained by putting the unsound animal amongst sound ones.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary to decide what would have been the damages if the plaintiff had rested his case on the breach of warranty alone. Here the defendant induced the plaintiff to buy the cow by representing it to be sound when he knew at the time that it had an infectious disease. It was an ordinary thing, and one which the defendant must have contemplated, that the cow would be placed among other cows, and that it would or might communicate the disease it had to other cows; and so the jury would have found, had the question been put to them. The plaintiff was induced, by the false representation of the defendant, to treat the cow in the ordinary way cows are treated; and the defendant must be held liable for the damage which consequently resulted from his wrongful act.

Rule discharged.

See now County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 57.

Costs—County Court—Claim for more than 50l.—Less than 20l. recovered—Admitted Set-off.

COUNTY COURT.—By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 24. it is enacted, that

"where in any action the debt or demand claimed consists of a balance not exceeding 50*l.* after an admitted set-off of any debt or demand claimed or recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiff, the" (county) "Court shall have jurisdiction to try such action."

If a plaintiff suing in the superior Court claims more than 50*l.* without admitting any set-off to reduce it to that amount, and the defendant by proof of a set-off reduces the amount recovered below 20*l.*, the plaintiff is entitled to costs, as there is no "admitted set-off" reducing the claim to 50*l.*, so as to give the county court jurisdiction.

Quære—if there can be an "admitted set-off" without the consent of both parties?

This was a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause "why the Master should not be at liberty to tax and allow the plaintiff his costs of suit in this cause, on the ground that no plaint could have been entered in a county court for the plaintiff's demand in this action."

The declaration was on the common money count for work and labour done, materials provided and on accounts stated, and the particulars of demand claimed 51*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*

The defendant, amongst other pleas, pleaded a set-off for goods sold and delivered, and by his particulars of set-off claimed 32*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*

The cause was referred to the Master. When before him, the plaintiff admitted this set-off to be correct, and obtained an award for 19*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* No credit for the set-off was given in the plaintiff's particulars of demand, and the plaintiff swore that he never admitted it before action, whilst the defendant's attorney swore the plaintiff had before action told him he claimed only 19*l.* odd, and would not settle it for 5*l.*, and did not care as to costs, as a certain trade association would have to bear them.

Beresford shewed cause.—The application is made under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4, only on the ground that the action could not have been brought in the county court, and it is said that it could not have been brought, because the claim is for more than 50*l.* Now, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 24, "where in any action the debt or demand claimed consists of a balance not exceeding 50*l.* after an admitted set-off of any debt or demand claimed or recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiff, the Court shall have jurisdiction to try such action." And inasmuch, therefore, as the plaintiff here could have admitted this set-off, which in truth he never disputed, he could have brought his action in the county court. Under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129. it has been held, that if the demand is reduced below 20*l.* by proof of part payment, the plaintiff is not entitled to costs—Turner v. Berry (19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 321; s. c. 5 Exch. Rep. 858); and under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11. that he is not entitled, if a set-off be proved which so reduces his demand—Beard v. Perry (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 180; s. c. 2 Best & S. 493). In Avards v. Rhodes (22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 106; s. c. 8 Exch. Rep. 312) it was held, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 1, which extends the jurisdiction to 50*l.* under the old limitations, that a man could not give jurisdictions by putting a set-off in his claim; that decision went on the ground that the "set-off had never been allowed before action by the defendant so as to constitute a part payment"; it therefore shews that where the set-off is admitted by the plaintiff and the defendant, it is equivalent to payment, and consequently the words "admitted set-off" in the recent act cannot mean that, but must mean admitted by the plaintiff.

[WILLES, J.—By the 35th County Court Rule, provision is made for entry in the particulars where the plaintiff desires to admit a set-off.]

Yes; and there is no injustice, because, if there be a bona fide dispute as to the set-off, an application for costs can be made on the ground that the case was fit to be tried in the superior Court.

[WILLES, J. referred to the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 26, and the 13th pleading rule of the superior Courts.]

Prentice, in support of the rule.—In Awards v. Rhodes (22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 106; s. c. 8 Exch. Rep. 312), in delivering judgment, Lord Chief Baron Pollock says, that “balance of account” means “over and above payments,” and that a “demand originally exceeding 50*l.* being only reduced below it by offering to allow a set-off, never agreed to as part payment, was one over which the Court had no jurisdiction.” So, also, in Beswick v. Capper (7 Com. B. Rep. 669; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 216, n.), it was decided that a demand exceeding 20*l.* and reduced by a set off (admitted by the plaintiff) below that amount, was not within the jurisdiction of the county courts, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95; and Mr. Justice Cresswell said, “No doubt the plaintiff was at liberty to abandon all above 20*l.* That, however, he does not do;” and, again, “You cannot compel a defendant to avail himself of his right to set off a counter claim;” and Chief Justice Wilde said, “To establish his right to recover . . . he would be bound to prove a demand exceeding the amount of the defendant’s set-off. The matter, therefore, was very much beyond what the legislature contemplated should be submitted to the inferior jurisdiction. The case of an adjusted account is altogether different. The only assent to the set-off here was by the plaintiff’s thinking fit to give credit for it in his particulars.” The statute was passed with reference to the existing law, and unless there is no dispute about the set-off, and it is admitted by both parties, it does not apply. The question is, whether when the action was brought there was an admitted set-off, and there was not, either by the plaintiff alone, or the plaintiff and the defendant. All that can be said is, the plaintiff might have admitted the set-off, but he is not bound to do so, and did not. It is submitted, first, that he is not bound to admit the set-off; and, secondly, that the admission must be inter partes, and not one which might be, but one that is actually admitted by them. The county court rule was made to meet this difficulty;—there was a doubt as to when the plaintiff was to abandon the excess, and the rule was to settle this.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The plaintiff claimed a sum exceeding 50*l.* When the action was brought there was no formal admission of the set-off before the Court. The final result of the action was that a set-off of 32*l.* odd was proved, and the sum recovered was 19*l.* odd only. The plaintiff might have brought his action in the county court if there had been an “admitted set-off.” The set-off was proved, but the plaintiff had not admitted it. The question is, what is the meaning of the words “admitted set-off”? I think the words mean a set-off which the plaintiff chooses to admit at the time of action brought. He had an option to do so or not. It is considered by many a great privilege to be able to sue in the superior Courts, and we ought not to take it away without clear words. In the present case the plaintiff has not chosen to admit this set-off, and had a right to sue in the superior Courts. It seems to me that it is difficult to say that there can be an admission without the two consent, but, at least, the plaintiff must admit.

BYLES, J. and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

WILLES, J.—Henceforth I shall conform with the opinion of the rest of the Court.

Sale—Terms of Contract—Goods to be taken from Quay—Condition Precedent.

SALE OF GOODS.—In a contract to sell 500 bales of cotton, to arrive in Liverpool, per ship or ships, from Calcutta, there was the following stipulation: "The cotton to be taken from the quay:"—Held, that this stipulation was an independent stipulation for the seller's benefit, and not a condition precedent which the purchaser had a right to insist on being performed.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiffs, against a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, making absolute a rule calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why a verdict found for them should not be set aside and entered for the defendants, or the damages reduced, pursuant to leave reserved.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the report of the case in the Court below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 155); and the following statement will be sufficient for the purposes of the present report.

The action was for non-delivery of 500 bales of cotton, bought by the plaintiffs from the defendants. The contract provided that the cotton was "to be taken from the quay." The cotton arrived, and was landed on the quay. By the dock regulations it was necessarily removed within twenty-four hours into certain warehouses. While on the quay, the plaintiffs applied for delivery orders, and could not get them. Afterwards, the defendants offered to deliver the cotton just as if from the quay, or to take it back to the quay, and there deliver. The plaintiffs refused this offer, contended that the contract was broken, and brought their action. The Court of Common Pleas held, that the stipulation, "the cotton to be taken from the quay," was an independent stipulation for the vendor's benefit, and not a condition precedent, which entitled the purchaser to insist on delivery on the quay, and made the rule absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants.

Mellish (E. James and Baylis with him), for the appellants.—It is submitted that the words "to be taken from the quay" were inserted in order to appoint a time and place of delivery. Goods were only allowed to remain on the quay a certain time, and it was intended that delivery should be made within that time. If the vendor is ready to take at the proper time and place, and the vendee is not ready to deliver, there is a breach. When there is a stipulation which requires both parties to act, in order that it may be performed, then prima facie, it is binding on both parties, and is not merely for the easement of one of them, as the Court below decided. Cotton is the subject-matter of much speculation; prices fluctuate, and it is important that a vendor should be bound to deliver at a particular time. If the words had been "to deliver," the other side would have "to take," without its being expressly said; so here, to take implies to deliver. It is said that there is an option given to the vendor to make the cotton merchantable, which could not be done on the quay; and therefore that he need not be ready to deliver there. But it is submitted that the vendor is still to tender there.

Holkar (Brett with him), for the respondents, was not called on.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that judgment should be affirmed (Pollock, C.B., Channell, B., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Pigott, B., Shee, J.).

Judgment affirmed.

ARBUTHNOT AND OTHERS v. STRECKEISEN AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. C.P. 305.

Contract of Sale, Construction of.

SALE OF GOODS.—The plaintiffs, who expected to receive 576 bales of cotton from Madras, contracted to sell 202 bales thereof to C, then 123 to the defendants, then, again, 154 to the defendants, and then 97 to G. By these contracts the buyers were to take what arrived deliverable. Only 275 bales arrived deliverable. The plaintiffs delivered 60 to C, 30 to G, and 33 to the defendants under their first contract; they then tendered the remaining 152 to the defendants, in fulfilment of their second contract, which the defendants refused to accept. In an action on the second contract with the defendants,—Held, that such contract meant that the plaintiffs were to deliver and the defendants to accept the residue (up to 154) beyond 123; and that though the plaintiffs had broken their first contract with the defendants, they had fulfilled the second, and were entitled to succeed.

This was an action against the defendants for refusing to accept 152 bales of cotton, sold to them by the plaintiffs on the 27th of October, 1863. At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, subject to a case which, in all material particulars, was as follows:

The plaintiffs received, on the 15th of October, 1863, a bill of lading, dated the 15th of September, 1863, for 202 bales of cotton, marked A. & Co. R.C., shipped on their behalf at Madras, and deliverable to them or their assigns. On the 21st of October, 1863, they received a similar bill of lading, dated the 22nd of September, 1863, for 277 bales similarly marked; and on the 5th of November, 1863, a similar bill of lading, dated the 26th of September, 1863, for 96 bales similarly marked, and also a similar bill of lading, dated the 1st of October, 1863, for one bale similarly marked.

On the 19th of October, 1863, the plaintiffs sold to Messrs. Casella & Co. 202 bales marked A. & Co. R.C., expected to arrive in London per the ship Golden Age, on the terms (amongst others) that if the quality should prove inferior to the guarantee, a fair allowance was to be made, to be settled by arbitration in the usual manner; that first and second class sea-damaged bales (if any) should be made merchantable and taken at one-eighth per pound less than the sound; that the third and fourth class sea-damaged bales (if any) should be taken at a fair allowance; that, should the cotton, or any portion thereof, not arrive, from loss of vessel or unavoidable causes, the contract for the whole or such portion was to be void; and that, should the cotton be transhipped and arrive in other vessels at London, the contract still should hold good. On the 24th of October, 1863, the plaintiffs sold to the defendants 123 bales A. & Co. R.C. under a similar contract, and on the 27th of October, 1863, they sold them, under a similar contract, 154 bales A. & Co. R.C., this being the contract declared on, and only differing from the others by the figures $\frac{1}{2}\frac{7}{8}$ being put against the cotton mark. And on the 4th of December, 1863, they sold under a similar contract 97 bales A. & Co. R.C. to one Von Glehn.

The Golden Age sailed from Madras in November, 1863, having on board (amongst others) the said 576 bales of cotton bearing the said mark, but unnumbered. The figures $\frac{1}{2}\frac{7}{8}$ were inserted by the sellers to indicate that they had already sold 123 bales, but nothing passed between them and the defendants as to the meaning of these marks.

The Golden Age was wrecked at Dungeness, but the whole of the cotton, except two bales, was saved, and transhipped and arrived in specie in London, some more or less damaged. Out of the whole only 275 bales were in a state to be delivered to the purchasers; of these 123 bales were delivered as follows: 60 to Casella & Co., 30 to Von Glehn, and 33 to the defendants under the contract of the 24th of October, 1863. The plaintiffs then tendered the remaining 152 to the defendants in performance of the contract of the 27th of October, 1863; the defendants refused to receive them. The question was whether they were justified in so doing.

Hannen, for the plaintiffs.—There is nothing to exonerate the defendants from accepting the cotton sold to them on the 27th of October, and inasmuch as 123 bales had been already sold to them and two were lost, they were bound to accept according to their contract, 152 instead of 154.

Sir G. Honyman, for the defendants.—The other side are in this dilemma: either the defendants may look to all the contracts, or they may not; if they may, then the cotton should either be delivered rateably to all purchasers, or in priority; if they may not, then, though the plaintiffs had 275 bales, they only tendered the defendants 152.

Hannen, in reply.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The case might present a difficulty if the contracts with the other buyers were to be taken into account; but it is not necessary to decide whether they should be taken into account or not. If it were, we should have to consider if these contracts would be any defence, and it seems difficult to say there is a defence, because of other bargains to sell to strangers. However, this case is disembarrassed of this point, for taking the defendants' contracts alone, the plaintiffs have done all they were bound to do under their second contract. That was a contract of sale for 154 bales, and it followed another for 123. It has been insisted that we are to read the second contract without reference to the first, and if so, as 275 bales arrived the plaintiffs would be bound to deliver 154, and 152 would not do. But it would be an exceedingly narrow decision if we were to say that we could look at the second only, and that the defendants were entitled to 154 bales under it, though 123 had been already sold by the first contract. Suppose 154 had arrived, and 123 were delivered under the first contract, and the rest tendered under the second, would both be performed? We must construe the second with reference to the first, to shew the terms of the second, and when we find that the defendants had previously agreed for 123 bales, it necessarily follows that the 154 were bargained for over and above the 123, otherwise the provision as to non-arrival would be removed. There is less difficulty here because of the figures $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{4}$; these mean that 123 being already sold, the plaintiffs would deliver 154 more if 277 arrived. Now then, has the second contract been fulfilled? 275 bales arrived deliverable; the plaintiffs should have delivered 123 under the first contract, and the rest under the second; and as 33 only were delivered under the first, that contract was broken by the plaintiffs, though in consequence of the change in price, the defendants have profited by the 90 not being delivered. But still the plaintiffs have fulfilled the second contract, because they thereby only contracted to deliver what they had beyond 123 bales, and this they tendered.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The second contract may well be read as one for the residue over 123 bales.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Shipping—Bill of Lading—Incorporating in Bill of Lading Terms of Charter-Party—Lien for Freight.

SHIPPING.—By a charter-party the cargo was made deliverable “on being paid freight as follows: The ship to have a lien on cargo for freight; 3l. 10s. per ton of 50 cubic feet to be paid to captain or his agents on right and true delivery at port of discharge.” The charterer shipped a portion of the cargo under a bill of lading which stated freight to be payable as per charter-party:—Held, that the rate of freight only, and not the terms as to the lien mentioned in the charter-party, was incorporated in the bill of lading, and that, therefore, the shipowner had no lien as against a bona fide indorsee for value of such bill of lading for the whole chartered freight, but only for the freight due on the goods mentioned in the bill of lading.

The following special case was stated for the opinion of the Court without pleadings.

CASE.

Messrs. Sanderson, Frys, Rigge & Co., the plaintiffs in this action, carry on business as shipowners and merchants in St. Helen's Place, in the city of London, and are the owners of the ship Her Majesty.

The defendants are a chartered banking company, carrying on business in London, and also at Shanghai, in China, where they have a branch bank.

In the autumn of 1864 the said ship Her Majesty was at Shanghai, and was, by a charter-party dated the 14th of September, 1864, chartered by Messrs. Dadabhoy & Co., of that place, to take a full and complete cargo of cotton and [or] other merchandise, which they bound themselves to ship, in the usual way, for London or Liverpool as ordered.

Amongst other clauses the charter-party contained the following one, which is chiefly material in the present case:

“And, being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London or Liverpool, as ordered at Shanghai, and deliver the said cargo on being paid freight as follows—The ship to have a lien on cargo for freight: Three pounds ten shillings (3l. 10s.) sterling per ton of fifty (50) cubic feet, measured in Shanghai, to be paid to captain or his agents on right and true delivery at port of discharge (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, &c., always excepted). The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo.”

A fac-simile of the charter-party, which is partly in print and partly in writing, was annexed to and formed part of this special case.¹

(1) The following is a copy of the charter-party:

“14th Sept. 1864.

“It is this day mutually agreed between George F. Seymour, master of the good ship Her Majesty (for and on behalf of himself and owners of the said vessel), burthen per register 1112 tons, now lying in the port of Shanghai, and Messrs. Dadabhoy & Co.—

“That the said ship, being tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage,

After some difficulty and delay, the charterers, Dadabhoy & Co., succeeded in procuring for the said ship a full and complete cargo, which, for the purposes of this case, is treated as divisible into three portions.

The first portion, consisting of 185 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton, was shipped by the charterers themselves, and on their own account, under the bill of lading hereinafter set forth, the freight for the same being payable at the same rate as that agreed upon in the charter-party, and amounting, at 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton, to the sum of 101*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*

The second portion (with respect to which similar questions arose between the plaintiffs and other parties, viz., the Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East) was also shipped by the charterers under a similar bill of lading, and at the charter rate of freight.

The third portion, being by far the largest portion of the cargo, was shipped by other merchants at various rates of freight, all below the charter rate.

The difference between the total amount of the bill of lading freight payable upon the cargo as above mentioned, and the freight payable under the charter-party, was very considerable, and amounted to the sum of 1,710*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* The portion of the cargo which had been shipped by merchants other than the charterers as above mentioned was duly delivered as hereinafter mentioned upon payment of the freight due upon the bills of lading of the same, and no question arises with respect to this portion of the cargo.

The large deficiency above mentioned between the amount of the bill of lading freight and that payable under the charter-party, gave rise to a question between the plaintiffs and the holders of the bills of lading of the first and second portions of the cargo above referred to respecting the right of the plaintiffs, upon the true construction of the bills of lading and charter-party, to a lien upon those portions of the cargo, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, for the whole balance of freight payable under the charter-party.

The following is a copy of the bill of lading under which the first portion of goods was shipped :

" [B.B.] 185. Shipped in good order and well conditioned by Dadabhoy & Co., in and upon the good ship or vessel called Her Majesty, whereof is master for this present voyage, Seymour, and now lying at anchor in the port of Shanghai, and bound for Liverpool, one hundred and eighty-five packages of tea, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered shall with all convenient speed take on board in Shanghai a full and complete cargo of cotton and [or] other merchandise, cotton to be taken by measurement in Shanghai, the same to be placed alongside the ship within reach of her tackles, and not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, water and furniture, and exclusive of the poop and cabins, which shall remain for the use and benefit of the captain and owners; the said George F. Seymour to provide all necessary dunnage and ballast, and, being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London or Liverpool, as ordered by charterers before final sailing of the vessel from Shanghai, or as near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the said cargo, on being paid freight, as follows: the ship to have a lien on cargo for freight three pounds ten shillings (3*l.* 10*s.*) sterling per ton of fifty (50) cubic feet, measured in Shanghai, to be paid to captain or his agents on right and true delivery at port of discharge.

" The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted.

" The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. The ship at port of discharge to be consigned to the owners or their agents; lay days to commence twenty-four hours after written notice being given the charterers that the vessel is ready to receive cargo; seventy working days to be allowed the charterers for loading the ship. All cargo is to be loaded and discharged by people employed and paid by the ship. All port-charges and pilotage at Shanghai, as also at London or Liverpool, are to be borne by the ship; demurrage beyond that time to be paid by the charterers at the rate of eighty (80) Mex. dollars per day, paid in advance. Commission as customary, to be paid to the brokers by ship on gross amount earned under this charter. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement the estimated amount of freight.

in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Liverpool, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted, unto or order, or to their assigns. Freight for the said goods payable in Liverpool as per charter-party, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof, the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void.

“ George F. Seymour.

“ Dated in Shanghai, Feb. 21, 1865.”

The said Dadabhoy & Co., after the shipment of the above goods by them, applied to the defendants' branch bank at Shanghai to make them an advance upon the security of the same, and it was thereupon agreed that, on receiving the bill of lading for the same, and also the letter of hypothecation hereinafter set out, the defendants should negotiate the draft of the said Dadabhoy & Co. for 1,250*l.* on Mr. R. E. Gibson, of Liverpool, payable to the drawers' order, and by them indorsed to the bank.

The above arrangement was carried out, and in pursuance of it the defendant negotiated the said Dadabhoy & Co.'s draft upon the said R. E. Gibson for 1,250*l.*, receiving from them, at the same time, the above-mentioned bill of lading, which was duly indorsed by them, and also the following letter of hypothecation :

“ The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India,
London and China.

“ Shanghai, March 7, 1865.

“ We having this day negotiated with you our bills of exchange drawn on R. E. Gibson, Esq., of Liverpool, the particulars of which are noted at foot, and having at the same time handed to you as collateral security for due payment of the said bills, the bills of lading and shipping documents belonging to us of the several goods also stated at foot, our agreement is understood to be as follows :

“ We hereby authorize the said Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China, and the holders of the above bills for the time being to take conditional acceptances to all or any of such bills, to the effect that on payment thereof at maturity the above-mentioned bills of lading and shipping documents shall be delivered to the drawee or acceptors thereof, and such authorization on our parts shall be taken to extend to cases of acceptance for honour.

“ We further authorize the said bank, or any manager or agent thereof, on default being made in acceptance on presentment, or in payment at maturity of any of the above bills, or on the drawees' suspension of payment during the currency of the bills, to sell the said goods, and to apply the net proceeds (after deducting usual commission and charges) in payment of such bills with re-exchange and charges, the balance, if any, to be applied in liquidation of any other debt or liability of ours to the said bank; any ultimate balance to be at our disposal. And in case the net proceeds of such goods shall be insufficient to pay the amount of any such dishonoured bills, with re-exchange and charges, we authorize the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China, or the holders thereof for the time being, to draw on us for the deficiency, and we engage to honour such drafts on presentment, or to pay the said bank in London.

“ We further authorize the said bank, or the holders of the said bills for the time being, in case the aforesaid power of sale shall not have arisen at any time before their maturity, to accept payment from the drawees or acceptors thereof, and on payment to deliver the said bills of lading and shipping documents to such drawees or acceptors, and in that event the said bank, or the holders of said bills, are to allow a discount thereon for the time they may have to run, at the Bank of England minimum rate of the day, if taken up in London, or if in India, Ceylon, or China, at the current rate of discount of the day on Government acceptances in India, Ceylon, or China, as the case may be.

" We also authorize the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China, or any manager or agent thereof (but not so as to make it imperative), to insure the above goods from sea risk, including loss by capture, and also from loss by fire on shore, and to add the premiums and expenses of such insurances to the amounts chargeable to us in respect of the said bills, and to take their recourse against the said goods or against us for their reimbursement, and also to sell any portion of the said goods which may be necessary for payment of freight, and the said bank are to take such measures generally, to make such charges for commission, and to be accountable in such manner, but not further or otherwise, as in ordinary cases between a merchant and his correspondent, it being hereby declared that the bank is not to be liable for the default of any broker or auctioneer employed in the sale of the goods.

" Lastly, it is mutually agreed that the delivery of the said collateral securities to your bank shall not prejudice your rights on the said bills in case of dishonour; nor shall any recourse taken thereon affect the title of the bank to the said securities to the extent of our liability to your bank as above. We are your obedient servants,

" Dadabhoy & Co."

BILLS AND DOCUMENTS REFERRED TO.

Particulars of Bills.			Particulars of Goods.
Date.	Amount.	Drawee.	Bills of Lading.	Name of Ship.
March 7.	1,250 l .	R. E. Gibson, Esq.	[BB] 185 P Tea. [D] 42 B Cotton.	Her Majesty.

No copy of the charter-party was handed to the bank at Shanghai, and the officials of the bank there were not acquainted with its contents. They were, however, given to understand that the freight was 70*s*. per ton.

The said ship having received orders to that effect at Shanghai, proceeded on her voyage to Liverpool; and shortly after she set sail the said Dadabhoy & Co. stopped payment, and their estate is now being wound up in China by trustees, under a deed of assignment.

The news of the failure of Dadabhoy & Co. reached England before the arrival of the ship, as hereinafter mentioned. The draft above mentioned was accepted by the said R. E. Gibson, who failed before its maturity, and is still unpaid.

The said ship afterwards arrived in due course at Liverpool, and all the goods shipped by merchants, other than the charterers, were delivered to the consignees thereof upon payment of the freight according to the bills of lading for the same, and this (calculating the freight for the residue of the cargo, consisting of the first and second portions above mentioned at the charter rate) left a deficiency below the total amount of freight payable upon the cargo, according to the charter-party, of 1,710*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*., as before mentioned.

Under these circumstances, the defendants, as holders of the bill of lading and other documents above mentioned, relating to the 185 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton, shipped by Dadabhoy & Co., claimed to be entitled to delivery thereof upon payment of the freight for the same, at the charter rate, viz., 3*l*. 10*s*. per ton, amounting to 101*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*. The plaintiffs, however, claimed to be entitled to a lien thereon for the whole balance of the freight due and unpaid under the charter-party, as above mentioned.

The plaintiffs and the defendants entered into the following memorandum of agreement:

"Memorandum. Whereas the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China claim to be bona fide holders for value of a bill of lading dated at Shanghai, February 21, 1865, for 185 packages of tea, and a bill of lading, dated February 8, 1865, for 42 bales of cotton, which said tea and cotton are now in the custody of the agents of the shipowners at Liverpool. And whereas Messrs. Sanderson, Frys, Rigge & Co., the owners of the said ship, claim payment of a balance of 1,930*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* as due to them for freight as per charter-party entered into by Messrs. Dadabhoy & Co. at Shanghai, and they have accordingly asserted a lien on the before-mentioned tea and cotton for the full amount so due to them. And whereas the said bank, as holders of the said bills of lading, deny the right of the shipowners, as against them, for their alleged lien for charter freight, and claim delivery of the said 185 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton on payment of freight at the rate of 70*s.* per ton, and which freight amounts to 101*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* And whereas Messrs. Sanderson, Frys, Rigge & Co. have, for the purpose of enabling the holders of the said bills of lading to deal with the said goods as they may deem advisable, agreed to deliver up to the said bank the said 185 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton, without prejudice, and on the understanding hereinafter mentioned, on receiving payment of the last-mentioned sum of 101*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* It is, therefore, mutually agreed by and between the said parties, that on payment of the said sum of 101*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* as and for freight on the said tea and cotton at the rate of 70*s.* per ton, the said Messrs. Sanderson, Frys, Rigge & Co. will deliver to the said bank an order on their agents at Liverpool for delivery thereof, it being nevertheless understood and agreed that, for the purposes of any future proceedings, it shall be considered that Messrs. Sanderson, Frys, Rigge & Co. have asserted a lien on the said tea and cotton for the whole of their said claim for 1,930*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*, and that the said tea and cotton are to be delivered without prejudice to their right to recover against any party any sum beyond the said sum of 101*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, the same to be determined as if the said tea and cotton still remained in the docks subject to their lien (if any). Dated the 25th of September, 1865."

The above goods were thereupon delivered to the defendants and sold; and the net proceeds thereof, amounting to 1,514*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*, having been received by the bank, they have in hand (after retaining their claim on the goods) a balance of 224*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* (subject to the deduction thereof of some law charges in reference to the matter), payment of which has been required of them by the trustees of Messrs. Dadabhoy & Co.'s deed of assignment.

For the purposes of the present case it is to be taken that this claim is good and valid in law or in equity as against Messrs. Dadabhoy & Co.

The questions for the opinion of the Court are, first, whether the plaintiffs had a lien as against the present defendants upon the said tea and cotton for the unpaid balance of freight due under the charter-party, or any part thereof; secondly, whether the plaintiffs have a lien or claim to the said surplus of 224*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, less law charges, over and above the defendants' claim, and whether the defendants ought to hand the same over to the plaintiffs.²

If the Court should answer the first question in the affirmative, the judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 1,514*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*, being the net proceeds of the shipments, or such part as the Court may determine, and costs of suit.

If in the negative, then if the Court should answer the second question in the affirmative, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 224*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, less the before-mentioned legal charges, but without costs of suit.

If the Court should answer both questions in the negative, then judgment is to be entered for the defendants, with costs of suit.

(2) As regards this second question, the defendants had no interest in disputing it, and therefore, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, judgment by consent was taken for the plaintiffs on the second question.

W. Williams, for the plaintiffs.—The question is, whether a shipowner is not entitled to a lien on the portion of the cargo represented by the bill of lading for the whole chartered freight, or whether the holder of the bill of lading has a right to have the goods mentioned in the bill of lading on payment of the freight only due in respect of such goods. The bill of lading in this case contains a reference to the charter-party, stating the freight to be payable "as per charter-party," and it is submitted that that makes it a reference to all the terms of the charter-party, and inter alia to the condition "the ship to have a lien on cargo for freight," and, consequently, that the bill of lading was indorsed to the defendants, with notice of the lien for freight, which was reserved to the shipowners by the charter-party. Faith v. the East India Company (4 B. & Ald. 630) shews that it is sufficient if the owner of the goods has notice of the terms of the charter-party. The cases of Chappel v. Comfort (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 802; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 58) and Wegener v. Smith (15 Com. B. Rep. 285; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 25) shew the effect of incorporating the terms of the charter-party into the bill of lading. In Kern v. Deslandes (10 Com. B. Rep. 205; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 297) the goods were shipped under a bill of lading, by which they were deliverable to B. or his assigns, he or they paying freight as usual. B. was the charterer's agent, to whom the charterer was indebted at the time of the shipment, and the bill of lading was handed to him in order that he might apply the proceeds of those goods in reduction of that debt, but he took the bill of lading with notice of the charter-party, and it was held that he was therefore not entitled to the goods without paying the chartered freight, which exceeded the amount of the bill of lading freight. The shipowners, by this charter-party, are not limited to a lien on any parcel of the cargo, but they have a lien on the whole cargo. In Sanders v. Vanzeller (4 Q.B. Rep. 260; s. c. (in error) 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 497) the bill of lading stipulated for payment of freight as per charter-party, and in the course of the argument in the Exchequer Chamber, Mr. Baron Parke observed, "If the shipper had received one half of the goods and become insolvent, and the defendant had taken the other half under the bill of lading, could he have been liable to pay for all? The captain might say, 'I never proposed to divide the contract.' Does the bill of lading stipulate for payment for all, according to the contract in the charter-party, or only for the part comprised in the bill at the rate contracted for in the charter-party? It rather strikes me that the reference to the charter-party is made for the purpose of preserving an entire lien on the whole. If a part be delivered without payment, the rest may, perhaps, be detained under a lien for the whole freight." Mr. Baron Parke, on referring to that case in Smith v. Sievking in error (5 El. & B. 589), states, "There was a difference of opinion amongst the Judges in the Court of Error, as to the effect of such reference to the charter-party;" and he says, "I was one of the Judges who thought that such a reference was not inserted with the view to cast the burthen of payment on an assignee, but to provide against varying the charter-party or waiving the shipowner's lien." In In re the Norway (3 New Rep. 612, Adm.), where by the bill of lading the freight was made payable as per charter-party, and the charter-party stipulated for lump freight, Dr. Lushington was of opinion that the master had a lien on the cargo for his freight.

Quain (Field with him), for the defendants.—The reference to the charter-party in the bill of lading in the present case incorporates with it only so much of the charter-party as relates to the rate of freight. The cases which have been cited go to that extent and no further, and where more is required to be imported into the bill of lading there must be words to that effect, as was the case in Wegener v. Smith (15 Com. B. Rep. 285; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 25), where the bill of lading contained the words, "and other conditions, as per charter-party." The case of Chappel v. Comfort (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 802; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 58) strongly supports what the defendants contend for. The case of Kern v. Deslandes (10 Com. B. Rep.

205; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 297) merely decides that where the holder of the bill of lading can be identified with the charterer the rule now contended for does not apply. In the present case the defendants had no notice of the charter-party, except so far as it is referred to by the bill of lading, and the case is therefore very distinguishable from that of Kern v. Deslandes (10 Com. B. Rep. 205; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 297). Where by a bill of lading goods were made deliverable to order or assigns, "paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions, as per charter-party," it has been held that this did not incorporate an exception in the charter-party as to "acts of enemies," and "restraints of princes"—Russell v. Niemann (17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 163; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 10).

W. Williams replied.

ERLE, C.J.—I think our judgment should be for the defendants. The case turns on the construction of the words in the bill of lading, "freight for the said goods payable in Liverpool, as per charter-party." The bill of lading, which is for the delivery of goods at Liverpool, states the freight to be payable as per charter-party, and that is 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton, to be paid on right and true delivery of the goods at the port of discharge. Now, I think the words in the bill of lading refer to the charter-party for the rate of freight which is payable, and that it is, as there stated, 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton. The charter-party, however, contains a stipulation that the ship is to have a lien on cargo for freight, and it is contended that the shipowners have a right to demand the whole of the freight under the charter-party, for every part of the cargo, that is, that they are entitled to hold the goods mentioned in this bill of lading, until the chartered freight for the rest of the cargo has been paid. I think they have no such right, and that, though the rate of freight mentioned in the charter-party is incorporated in the bill of lading, the other terms and conditions in the charter-party are not incorporated. What my Brother Willes says in his judgment in Chappel v. Comfort (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 802; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 58) is applicable to this present case; "It may be," he says, "that for shortness, instead of stating the sums payable in respect of different kinds of goods, a reference is made to the charter-party, thus: 'paying freight as per charter-party;' but it is equally well established that, even in that case, the assignee of the bill of lading is only bound by the terms of the charter-party quoad the freight. It may be, and it often does happen, that the person who receives the goods intends to pay all the charges mentioned in the charter-party. But when it is intended that such an obligation should be imposed upon him, it should be done in plain words, as was done in Wegener v. Smith (15 Com. B. Rep. 285; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 25), and other cases, where, by the terms of the bill of lading, the goods were made deliverable to order against payment of the agreed freight and other conditions, as per charter-party." I agree with the judgment of my Brother Willes in that case, and if more of the charter-party is meant to be incorporated than what relates to the rate of freight payable, there should be words in the bill of lading to that effect, so as clearly to give notice of it to the assignee of such bill.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants claim to be entitled to have delivered to them certain goods under a bill of lading, and the question is, what is the contract under that bill of lading? The plaintiffs, by it, undertake to deliver the goods unto order or assigns, "freight for said goods payable in Liverpool, as per charter-party." What does that mean? Why, that the rate of the freight for the goods is to be as specified in the charter-party. I think it incorporates no other terms of the charter-party; and I agree with what has been said, that there should be plain words to the purport in an instrument of this kind, when it is intended that there should be a lien on a portion of the cargo for the whole freight. It seems to me that this case differs from those where the freight was a lump sum, and therefore not divisible, and where, therefore, a stipulation in the bill of lading, that the freight should be as per charter-party, might make the assignee liable to a lien for the whole freight. The case which is most favourable for the plaintiffs, and with which we have been strongly pressed, is that of Kern v. Deslandes (10 Com. B. Rep. 205; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 297); but that is distinguishable, as the Court in that case assumed that the holders of the bill of lading were inseparable from the charterers. Whether that was a right assumption or not does not matter now; it is sufficient for the purpose of distinguishing that case from the circumstances of the present one, that the Court there did so assume that fact.

ERLE, C.J.—My Brother Byles, before he left to go to chambers, desired me to say that, so far as he heard the argument, he concurred in the judgment we have given.

Husband and Wife—Judgment in Divorce—Estoppel—Action for Necessaries to Wife.

EVIDENCE. HUSBAND AND WIFE.—In an action for necessaries supplied by the plaintiff to the defendant's wife whilst living apart from him, the defendant, in order to establish his wife's adultery, produced in evidence the record in the Divorce Court, in a suit by him against his wife for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery, in which it was found that his wife had been guilty of adultery, but as the husband was found to have been also guilty of adultery, the Judge Ordinary had dismissed the suit:—Held, that such evidence was admissible under the plea of never indebted; but that, as the judgment in the Divorce Court had not altered the status of his wife; it was not conclusive evidence of the adultery in the action between the plaintiff and defendant.

The plaintiff sued the defendant in the Mayor's Court of London for necessaries supplied by him to the defendant's wife, who was living apart from her husband. The declaration contained the common money counts for board and lodging and attendance, and other necessaries and goods found and provided by the plaintiff for the wife of the defendant, and for money due on accounts stated. The defendant pleaded only never indebted. No question was raised at the trial as to whether the plaintiff's claim, 20l. 7s., was or was not strictly for necessaries supplied to the defendant's wife; but the defendant alleged that his wife had been guilty of adultery, and in support of this he gave in evidence the record and proceedings in the Divorce Court in a suit of Bremner v. Bremner and Brett, which had been instituted by him in that court for the dissolution of his marriage, on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, and from which it appeared that the jury, on the trial of the cause in the Divorce Court, had found that the wife had been guilty of adultery with the co-respondent, but that the petitioner (the defendant in the present action) had also been guilty of adultery, and the result therefore was that the Judge Ordinary dismissed the petition. Notwithstanding this evidence, at the trial in the Mayor's Court, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, subject to the question raised on behalf of the defendant whether the record and finding of the jury in the Divorce Court were conclusive evidence that the wife had been guilty of adultery.

Henry James, for the defendant, subsequently, and pursuant to the leave reserved, obtained a rule nisi in this court to set aside the verdict, and to enter it instead for the defendant, if this Court should decide that such proceedings in the Divorce Court were conclusive as to the adultery. Against this rule Nasmith now shewed cause.—Upon these pleadings the record in the Divorce Court is no estoppel. To be an estoppel it must be pleaded as such—Outram v. Morewood (3 East, 346). In Roscoe on Evidence, p. 157, 10th edit., it is laid down that “if the party forbears to rely upon an estoppel where he may plead it, he is taken to waive the estoppel and to leave the prior judgment as evidence only for the jury.” To the same effect is Hannaford v. Hunn (3 Car. & P. 148) and The General Steam Navigation Company v. Guillon (11 Mee. & W. 877; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 168).

Henry James, in support of the rule.—It is said that there ought to have been a plea of estoppel, but under the general issue the defendant is entitled to shew that his wife was not his agent to create this debt.

[ERLE, C.J.—We have no doubt that the point is raised under the general issue.]

The question then is, whether the finding of the jury in the Divorce Court and the judgment of the Judge Ordinary that the defendant's wife was guilty of adultery, are binding in this action. Such judgment is clearly binding as between the husband and the wife, and it is submitted that it is equally binding on the plaintiff who claims through them. In the learned notes to The Duchess of Kingston's case (2 Smith's Lead Cas. 5th edit. p. 676), after shewing how the grant of probate is conclusive against all the world, it is stated, “on the same principle, a sentence in a matrimonial suit is conclusive, for it is an adjudication upon the status of the parties.”

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The judgment in the Divorce Court did not alter the status of the defendant's wife, but she continued to be his wife notwithstanding the jury thought that she had done wrong. Therefore, although the verdict in such divorce suit might as between the same parties be binding and conclusive, it certainly is not so as between other parties.

WILLES, J., BYLES, J. and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

Rule discharged.

Charter-Party—Substituted Contract—Guaranteed Freight—Loss of Vessel.

SHIPPING.—The defendants, who had chartered the plaintiffs' vessel, which could carry 300 tons, to go to A. and there load a full and complete cargo of oil, and proceed therewith to London, at a freight of 84s. a ton, not being able to load such cargo, made a new contract with the plaintiffs, by which the charter-party was cancelled, and the plaintiffs were to put the vessel on the most profitable charter or trade procurable, and the defendants guaranteed the vessel "900l. gross freight home." The plaintiffs could only procure a cargo the gross freight of which to London was less than 900l., and the vessel accordingly left A. with such cargo:—Held, that the breach under the guarantie accrued when the vessel so left A. with a cargo not sufficient to earn 900l. freight, and the defendants were, therefore, liable for the amount of the deficiency, notwithstanding the ship and cargo were totally lost on the voyage.

First count of declaration—That before the making of the agreement thereafter mentioned, the plaintiffs, being the owners of two vessels, named respectively the Izamados and the Botassis, had chartered them to the defendants, for the conveyance of petroleum oil from Ibraila to London, for freight payable in that behalf by the defendants to the plaintiffs, which charter-parties the defendants, at the time of making the said agreement, were unable to fulfil, and thereupon it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the said charter-parties should be cancelled, and that the defendants should guarantee to the said vessels a sum of 900l. each gross freight home from Ibraila to England, on the understanding that the parties should place the vessels at once on the most profitable charter or trade procurable, and that the vessels would carry 300 tons each, of whatever cargo they might take on board, or should they not take 300 tons each, that a proportionate reduction of the guarantie should be made for any proper quantity of cargo they might take. Averment, that the charter-parties were cancelled, and that the plaintiffs performed all conditions precedent. Breach, that the defendants did not guarantee to the said vessels, or either of them, a gross freight home from Ibraila to England of the stipulated amount; and that, although the said vessels earned by way of gross freight a sum far less than the stipulated freight, the defendants did not make good to the plaintiffs the deficiency, but therein made default, contrary to and in breach of the said agreement, whereby the plaintiffs not only lost the amount of the said deficiency, but also the use and interest thereof.

There were money counts for the hire of ships, for work done, and for money lent and paid, &c.

Pleas, inter alia, as to the first count, a denial of the agreement; and as to the residue of declaration, never indebted.

The cause was tried, before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after last Hilary Term, when it appeared that the defendants, in 1864, by two separate charter-parties, chartered the two vessels of the plaintiffs, called the Izamados and the Botassis, and by each charter-party, the vessel was to go to Ibraila on the Danube, and there load a full and complete cargo of petroleum oil, and proceed therewith to London, at a freight of 84s. per ton of 20 cwt. gross, payable, one-half on the arrival of the steamer, and the remainder by approved bills at two months from arrival.

Shortly after these charter-parties had been entered into, the depot of the defendants at Abraila was burnt down, and all their petroleum destroyed. They thereupon gave notice to the plaintiffs of their inability to load the vessels according to the charter-parties, and this led to a correspondence, which resulted in a Mr. Housden, on the part of the plaintiffs, attending on the 7th of September, 1864, a meeting of the directors of the defendants' company. What occurred at that meeting appears in the following extract from the company's minute-book: "Mr. Housden attended on the part of Messrs. Carr & Co., for the purpose of conferring with the directors on the subject of cancelling the charters of the Botassis and Izamados. It was proposed by the directors that this company will guarantee the above-named vessels a sum of 900l. each gross freight home, on the following understanding—that Messrs. Carr & Co. place the vessels named at once on the most profitable charter or trade procurable; that the vessels will carry 300 tons each of whatsoever cargo they may take on board, or, should they not take 300 tons each, that a proportionate reduction of the guarantie should be made for any lesser quantity of cargo they may take; that the charter-parties dated the 9th and 10th of August last respectively for the vessels named be cancelled."

The plaintiffs assented to these terms, and caused their agents in the Danube to load both vessels with cargoes of barley on the plaintiffs' account, which were the best cargoes then procurable. The Izamados duly came home with her cargo, and the freight so earned was short of 900*l.* by 343*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* The Botassis was also laden with the same quantity of barley at the same freight as the Izamados, and there was the same difference between her cargo, freight and the 900*l.* as in the case of the Izamados, but the Botassis was totally lost with her cargo on her voyage to England; and, therefore, the defendants contended that they were not liable on their guarantie for the deficiency of the freight of that vessel.

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 686*l.* 12*s.*, with leave to the defendants to move to reduce it by the sum of 343*l.* 6*s.*, if the Court should be of opinion that the defendants were not liable to pay that sum, in consequence of the Botassis having been lost. A rule nisi to that effect was accordingly obtained, against which—

Sir George Honyman now shewed cause.—The question is, what is the effect of the loss of the Botassis? The defendants had become unable to perform their engagement with the plaintiffs according to the terms of the charter-parties they had entered into, and the plaintiffs had a right of action against them in respect of this. Under these circumstances, it was agreed to cancel the charter-parties, and a new contract was made, by which, in effect, the plaintiffs gave up their right of demanding damages for the non-performance of the charter-parties on having the defendants' guarantie of a gross freight of 900*l.* for each vessel. Now, the gross freight for each vessel was short of such 900*l.* by 343*l.* 6*s.* Why, then, should not the plaintiffs recover such amount of deficiency? It is said that because in the case of the Botassis (that vessel having been lost), if the charter-party had remained in force, the plaintiffs would not have been entitled to her chartered freight, but must have sought indemnity from the underwriters, therefore the defendants are not liable.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—When do you say there was a breach of the defendants' contract of the 7th of September, 1864?]

The moment the cargo was put on board the vessel. The contract is not a guarantie that the vessel should earn a freight of 900*l.*, but that the goods put on board should be such as would pay a freight of 900*l.*; therefore, when the vessel left, as she did, with a cargo which could only have earned freight to the amount of 556*l.* 14*s.*, the defendants were liable under their guarantie to make up the difference between that amount and 900*l.* Yeames v. Lindsay (3 Law Times, N.S. 855) is directly in point. There the defendants, who had agreed by a charter-party to load a cargo at 60*s.* per ton, got the plaintiffs to re-charter the vessel on the defendants promising to honour the plaintiffs' draft for the difference in the freight, if there should be a loss. The rate of freight fell, and there was a difference of 20*s.* per ton when the cargo was put on board; but the vessel having been afterwards lost, the defendants refused to accept the plaintiffs' draft, on the ground that, as the vessel never arrived at her destination, the plaintiffs were not liable for freight, and had sustained no loss; but this Court held, that the moment the cargo was put on board, there was a difference in the insurable value, and such a loss as was contemplated at the time of the contract.

W. Williams, in support of the rule.—The contract sued on was a new contract, made before there had been any breach of the charter-parties by the defendants, and might have been so pleaded to any action on the charter-parties. The present case is like Stracy v. the Bank of England (6 Bing. 754). Then, what was the contract of the 7th of September, 1864? It is submitted that it was that the plaintiffs should earn a gross freight of 900*l.* in respect of each vessel, so that the plaintiffs really had an insurable interest to the extent of 900*l.* on each vessel; for if the goods were lost during the voyage, the whole freight would be also lost. The words of the engagement are, "This company will guarantee the above-named vessels a sum of 900*l.* each gross freight home." The contract surely, therefore, is a guaranteed freight of 900*l.*, and the plaintiffs had an insurable interest to that amount, and, if so, of course, as no freight was earned by reason of the loss of the Botassis, the plaintiffs' remedy would be against the underwriters, and not against the defendants.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The question turns on the meaning of the defendants' guarantie. The defendants guarantee the vessels a sum of 900*l.* each gross freight home, and I think that that was a substituted contract and ought to be construed with reference to the previous contract contained in the charter-party. By the charter-party, the defendants were to load a complete cargo of petroleum oil at a freight of 4*l.* 4*s.* per ton, and by the substituted contract the plaintiffs were to load the vessels with any other cargo they could get, and the defendants guarantee 900*l.* gross freight; that is to say, that whatever substituted commodity should be put on board, the freight for it should be worth to the plaintiffs 900*l.*, just as the freightage for the petroleum under the original contract would have been worth about 1,200*l.* If so, the contract would have been broken at the port of loading if less than the full cargo of petroleum had been put on board, and under the guarantie it is broken when the freight by the bill of lading for the goods put on board is not worth 900*l.* The word "freight" in the guarantie is what has introduced ambiguity in the matter.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the substituted agreement was a mere settlement of the amount to be paid by the defendants as the result of that breach of contract which must inevitably have taken place as soon as their warehouses at Ibraila had been burnt. The liability for not loading a cargo which should produce freight worth 900*l.* came to a head at the same time as it would have done if the vessel had not been loaded with a full cargo under the original contract; therefore if, when the vessel left the port of loading, she had not then a cargo which could produce freight worth 900*l.*, the defendants would be liable under their guarantie, and they would not be the less so because the vessel was afterwards lost. In my opinion, the liability accrued at the time the vessel left without a cargo sufficient to earn 900*l.* freight.

BYLES, J.—I also am of the same opinion, though I do not deny that I have had considerable difficulty in coming to that conclusion.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I concur in thinking that the defendants' liability must be determined by the amount of the freight at the time when the cargo was put on board.

Rule discharged.

GREENBERG v. WARD AND ANOTHER.

Debtor and Creditor—Deed of Assignment—Reasonable Provisions as to Sale of Property and Payment of Dividends.

BANKRUPTCY.—By a deed of assignment of a debtor's property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, it was provided that the trustees might sell on credit to the debtor, without security, and that if they paid dividends without notice of any particular creditor, the dividends were not to be disturbed:—Held, that such provisions were reasonable, and did not invalidate the deed.

This was a demurrer to a plea.

The declaration contained two counts, the first being the common money count, and the second a count on a bill of exchange, accepted by the defendants. The defendants pleaded, first (except as to a specified sum), never indebted; secondly, as to such sum, that "after the accruing of the parcel of the plaintiff's claim herein pleaded to, and after the 11th of October, 1861, the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons, and thereupon a deed hereinafter particularly set forth, bearing date the 14th of May, 1864, was made and entered into by and between the defendants, the persons in the said indenture named, Samuel Ward the elder and Samuel Ward the younger of the first part, Henry Cross Green, Thomas Robert Russell and John Jackson, as and being trustees for and on behalf of all the creditors of the defendants of the second part, and the several other persons whose names or the names of whose firms were written in the first column of the schedule under the said deed written, being respectively creditors, or claiming to be creditors of the defendants, and all other the creditors of the defendants of the third part, relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendants, and their release therefrom, which said deed was and is in the words and figures following." The plea then set out, verbatim, the deed which conveyed to the trustees all the property, debts, claims and rights of the debtors in the most ample terms; "upon trust nevertheless from time to time to sell and dispose of, and realize or collect and receive the said premises hereby conveyed and assigned, as hereinafter mentioned or expressed, and intended so to be, and every part thereof, by public sale and private contract, and in one or more lot or lots, with liberty to sell the same on credit to the said debtors or either of them, or any other person or persons, with or without security for the purchase-money, or any part thereof, as shall seem expedient; and upon trust, out of the moneys to be received by these presents to pay all costs and expenses of investigating, on the part of the creditors, the affairs of the said debtors, and of proposing, preparing and executing these presents, and of or occasioned by the carrying into effect the trusts hereby created; and in the next place (so far as the same may extend) to pay, retain and satisfy, rateably and without preference, administering the assets, and distributing joint and separate estates in like manner as in bankruptcy, except in any case where the contrary may be hereby provided for, to and amongst the parties hereto of the third part, including themselves, the said trustees and their partners (if any) so far as they may be creditors as aforesaid, and including all the creditors of the said debtors, the several debts and sums due to such creditors respectively, accounting such creditors in respect of such amount only as upon account fairly stated, after allowing, according to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Law, the value (if any) of mortgage securities, and other such available securities or liens, as shall appear to be the balance due to them respectively from the debtors, subject to the covenant herein contained for verifying the amounts thereof, and to pay the ultimate residue (if any) of the said moneys, after satisfying the whole of the said creditors the full amount of their said debts, with interest hereon, unto the said debtors in like manner as in bankruptcy. Provided always, that no former dividend should be disturbed, and no liability in consequence of such dividend shall be incurred by the trustees by reason or on account of any debt or debts due to creditors as aforesaid, and whereof the trustees shall not have had notice before such dividend shall have begun to be paid." The deed then declared, that the trustees might employ the debtors; that the execution of the deed by a creditor should be no admission by the trustees as to the validity or amount of his debt which they might require to be verified by solemn declaration; that the trustees should have all the powers, &c. of a creditors' assignee, or of creditors under the authority of the Court; that the trustees might give an allowance to the debtors; that questions of administration should be decided by the Bankruptcy Law, and that the trustees should be liable only for their wilful default, &c., and should pay moneys into the bank when amounting to 50l.

The deed then contained a release (without prejudice to mortgages, liens, and remedies against third parties) by the creditors of all debts, &c., a covenant not to sue &c., a power to plead the deed in bar, an avoidance of the deed in case of concealment of property, a covenant by the debtors to assist the trustees and execute all necessary deeds &c., a power for one trustee to act on the death or incapacity of the other, and schedules of the creditors. The plea then stated that "a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of creditors of the defendants, whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, did in writing assent to and approve of the said deed, and the said trustees appointed by the said deed executed the same, and the execution of the said deed by the defendants was attested by a solicitor, and within twenty-eight days from the day of the execution of the said deed by the defendants, the same was produced, left, having been first duly stamped, at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of being registered, and together with such deed there was delivered to the said Chief Registrar an affidavit by the defendants that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendants whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, had, in writing, assented to and approved of the said deed, and also stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the defendants comprised in the said deed, and the said deed did, before the registration thereof, bear such ordinary ad valorem stamp duties as were provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf, and immediately on the execution of the said deed by the defendants, possession of all the property comprised therein, of which the defendants could give or order possession, was given to the said trustees, and at the time of the execution of the said deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendants, in respect of the parcel of the claim herein pleaded to, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and all conditions precedent, matters, things, and times by the said deed required to have been performed, and to have happened, existed, and elapsed to render the said deed binding upon the plaintiff and the other creditors, and to render the said deed pleadable as a bar to this action, were performed, and did happen, exist, and elapse before the commencement of this suit, and nothing was done or happened or existed to the contrary thereof in that behalf; and all conditions in the said statute having been performed, and all things in the said statute happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became and was and is bound by the said deed as if he had been a party thereto, and had duly executed the same."

To this second plea there was a demurrer.

Field (Holl with him), in support of the demurrer.—This deed is bad. By one of its clauses the trustees are empowered to sell the property to the debtor himself on credit, and without security. Such a power as this destroys the equitable remedy against the trustees for breach of trust, and is on that account distinguishable from the recent case of Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169; s. c. Law J. Rep. C.P. 373), which will be relied on by the defendants. Such a clause is unreasonable and vitiates the deed. Next, there is inequality in the distribution amongst the creditors. The deed does not provide for distribution amongst all the creditors. The trustee may sell and divide the next day, and there is no liability in consequence of creditors afterwards coming in, of whom the trustee had not had previous notice.

Quain, in support of the plea.—First, it is said that the deed is bad because it gives a power to the trustees to sell to the debtors with or without security. But the argument on the other side assumes recklessness in the trustees; the Court, however, will make no such assumption; the trustees must exercise reasonably the power given to them, but if they do so, the Court will not interfere. As to authority, the case of Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169; s. c. Law Rep. C.P. 373) is decisive. The only difference between that case and the present is, that here we have the words "to the debtor," but this very point was put by counsel in argument, and answered in that case. Secondly, it is said the deed is bad because it provides that the trustees are not to be accountable if they, before notice of any creditor, pay dividends, and that such creditor is to come in without disturbing them. But this is the method of administering in Chancery—Broadbent v. Thornton (4 De Gex & Sm. 65)—and in Bankruptcy.

Field, in reply.—First, it is impossible to see how the first clause is consistent with bona fides. Secondly, the case of Broadbent v. Thornton (4 De Gex & Sm. 65) is not in point; there the creditor knew of the deed and other matters, but lay by.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants on the demurrer. By this deed, no doubt, very ample powers are given to the trustees; and if they combined with a portion of the creditors to defraud the others, perhaps the Court of Bankruptcy or a Court of Equity could interfere. But we must not assume wilful waste; and if there be not, they may sell to the debtors. The power is the same as that in Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169; s. c. Law Rep. C.P. 373), which governs the present case. As to the other clause, as to not disturbing the dividends, the same observations apply; we are not to assume an intention to defraud.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion; and I do not see how we can, consistently with Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169; s. c. Law Rep. C.P. 373), decide otherwise.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the first point, Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169; s. c. Law Rep. C.P. 373) is in point; as to the second point, the stipulation is a reasonable one.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Practice—Pleading after Two o'clock on Saturday—Rule, E. T. 1856—Signing Judgment—Acquiescence in Judge's Order.

PRACTICE.—Notwithstanding the rule of Easter Term, 1856, that if service of pleadings be “made after two o'clock, p.m., on Saturday, the service shall be deemed as made on the following Monday,” when a defendant has all Saturday to plead, the plaintiff cannot regularly sign judgment by default until the opening of the office on the morning of the following Monday.

Where a Judge has made an order at Chambers out of term, to set aside a judgment by default on an affidavit of merits, and on payment of the plaintiff's costs, the defendant, by complying with such order, for the purpose of getting rid of the judgment, does not so acquiesce in the order as to prevent his applying to the Court in the next ensuing term to alter its terms.

The question in this case was, whether a judgment, signed by the plaintiff for want of a plea, was regular or not. The action was to recover the balance of an account for wages alleged to be due to plaintiff, as ship's cook of the Water Witch, and the defendant's attorneys having sent a cheque by post to the plaintiff's attorneys at Liverpool, Willes, J., on the 2nd of May last, made an order extending the defendant's time to plead "until a day after cheque returned or taken in part payment." The cheque was received back by the defendant's attorneys on Friday, the 4th of May last, in a letter from the plaintiff's attorneys, dated the 3rd of May. The pleas were delivered on Saturday, the 5th of May, after two o'clock, p.m. On that day, between two and five, p.m., and before the pleas had been delivered, the plaintiff signed judgment by default, as for want of a plea.

On the 8th of May a summons was taken out to set aside such judgment for irregularity, with costs, on the ground that the same had been signed before the defendant's time for pleading, under the said order of Willes, J., had expired. This summons was heard, before Byles, J., on the 9th of May, when that learned Judge being of opinion that the defendant's time for pleading had expired before the pleas had been delivered, held that the judgment was regular, and, therefore, he only made an order to set aside the judgment upon an affidavit of merits, and on payment of costs. These costs were taxed at 2l. 5s., and were afterwards paid by the defendant.

Early in this term, Sir G. Honyman, on behalf of the defendant, obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the said order of Byles, J. should not be amended or varied, by directing the judgment signed by the plaintiff to be set aside, with costs, to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant or to his attorney, and why the plaintiff should not refund to the defendant or to his said attorney the said sum of 2l. 5s., the taxed costs paid by him in pursuance of the said order. Against this rule, Hume Williams now shewed cause.—The judgment signed by the plaintiff was regular. By the rule of Easter Term, 1856, it is ordered that "service of pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, and other proceedings shall be made before seven o'clock, p.m., except on Saturdays, when it shall be made before two o'clock, p.m. If made after seven o'clock, p.m., on any day except Saturday, the service shall be deemed as made on the following day, and if made after two o'clock, p.m. on Saturday, the service shall be deemed as made on the following Monday." The pleas in this case, having been delivered after two o'clock on Saturday, are not to be considered as delivered on that day at all; and the defendant's extended time to plead, even if it gave him all Saturday to plead, had therefore expired before the plaintiff signed judgment; but it is submitted that the defendant's time expired at nine o'clock a.m. on Saturday morning, which was a day after the defendant's attorneys had received the cheque back from Liverpool. Moreover, the defendant took the benefit of the order of Mr. Justice Byles, having drawn it up and paid the plaintiff's costs under it; he cannot therefore now be heard against it.

Sir G. Honyman appeared in support of the rule, but was not called upon.

ERLE, C.J.—The rule of practice is thus laid down in 1 Chit. Arch., 11th edit. p. 246: "If the defendant do not plead on or before the day on which the time expires, the plaintiff may sign judgment on the opening of the office on the morning of the following day, unless in the mean time, and before the signing of it, the defendant has delivered a plea." If we apply that rule literally, the defendant had all the day of Saturday to plead, and the plaintiff might have signed judgment on the following Monday, unless in the mean time, and before signing, the defendant had delivered a plea; and that is the general rule. I think that the order of my Brother Willes meant that the defendant should have one whole day to plead after the day on which the cheque had been received back; and that, therefore, the defendant had all Saturday to plead in. Then there is the rule of Court, that pleas must be pleaded on Saturday before two o'clock, and that if pleaded after that time they are to be deemed as pleaded on the following Monday. The Judgment Office being, however, open on a Saturday after two o'clock, the plaintiff signed judgment, and the pleas were subsequently delivered on that same day. Now, I am of opinion that the plaintiff had no right to sign judgment on that Saturday; the exemption in favour of the clerks after two o'clock on a Saturday leaves the rule of practice as before; and, consequently, the plaintiff had no right to sign judgment until the opening of the office on the following Monday. Then it is said that the defendant took advantage of the order of my Brother Byles, and got the judgment set aside on payment of costs, and therefore that he cannot now have that order altered. But I think that as that order was made out of term, and as unless the judgment had been set aside with due diligence the plaintiff would evidently have issued execution, the defendant's legal advisers did not acquiesce in that order by paying the costs and taking the benefit of it by getting the judgment set aside, and that by coming to this Court, as they did, early in the next term, they came as soon as they could. I therefore think the defendant should have back the costs he so paid; but that is all we now award.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the rule of Easter Term was not intended to alter the rule of practice, as stated in Chit. Arch. in the passage which has been cited.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion; but at the same time I think we ought not to go further than has been stated by the Chief Justice, namely, that the defendant should get back the costs he paid, but not receive costs. When a party has all Saturday to plead in, the plaintiff cannot sign judgment until the following Monday.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I also concur with the rest of the Court; but if I had been at chambers, I should have had a difficulty in making a different order from what my Brother Byles made.

Rule absolute, but without costs.

Shipping—Bill of Lading—Excepted Perils—Barratry and Perils of the Seas—Loss of Vessel and Goods from Negligence—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 299—Evidence on Commission.

SHIPPING.—The plaintiff shipped goods on board the defendants' vessel, the Black Prince, under a bill of lading, which contained, inter alia, the exceptions of "barratry" and "perils of the sea." The Black Prince, with the plaintiff's goods on board, was lost in a collision with another vessel, the Araxes. In an action on the bill of lading for the loss of the goods, there was evidence at the trial that the collision arose from the Black Prince star-boarding instead of porting her helm, as required by the rules laid down by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854; and a collision occasioned by non-observance of such rules is, by section 299. of that act, to be deemed to have been occasioned "by the wilful default of the person in charge" of the offending ship. The Judge told the jury that if a collision was brought about by the negligence of those on board the Black Prince, the loss would not be a peril of the sea, and that for that purpose he could not distinguish between gross negligence and negligence; and he left it to the jury to say whether there was want of due care on the part of the Araxes, by which care the collision would have been avoided:—Held, that the contravention of the rules of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, by those in charge of the Black Prince, in starboarding instead of porting the helm, did not amount to barratry within the exception in the bill of lading.

Held, also, that the direction of the Judge was right, and that, being bound by the case of Lloyd v. the General Iron Screw Collier Company (3 H. & C. 284; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 269), he did right in not directing the jury that the loss of the Black Prince was caused by perils of the sea, within the exception in the bill of lading.

EVIDENCE.—It is no objection to the admissibility of depositions taken under a commission, that the Commissioner did not put any of the written interrogatories or cross-interrogatories which were sent out with the commission, but took the evidence of the witnesses under a viva voce examination.

And, semble, any irregularity in the mode of taking the depositions cannot be a ground for refusing to admit them at the trial, but can only be taken advantage of by applying to the Court or a Judge at chambers to suppress the depositions.

This action, which was tried, before Erle, C.J., at the London Sittings after last Hilary Term, was brought to recover thirty-seven casks of argols (tartar) shipped, at Messina, in Sicily, by the plaintiff, on his own account, on board the defendants' steamer, the Black Prince, under a bill of lading, signed by the defendants' agent, by which the goods were made deliverable at the port of London, to the order of the plaintiff or his assigns, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, barratry of master or mariners, restraint of princes and rulers, fire, accident or damage from machinery, boilers, steam, or from other goods by contact, sweating, leakage or otherwise, and accidents or damage of the seas, rivers and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted."

The declaration alleged a loss of these goods with the Black Prince, in consequence of a collision between her and a steamer, the Araxes, caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants and mariners in the Black Prince.

The pleas were, first, a denial of the bailment; secondly, not guilty; and, thirdly, that the loss was occasioned by the excepted perils in the bill of lading.

The plaintiff took issue on these pleas; and also replied, to the third plea, that the supposed excepted perils consisted wholly of the collision in the declaration mentioned, and that the collision was caused and the supposed perils incurred solely by the gross negligence and improper conduct of the defendants' servants and mariners.

It was proved that, on the night of the 8th of November, 1860, while the Black Prince was off Cape St. Vincent, in the prosecution of her voyage to England, she met and came in collision with the steamer Arazes, and that in consequence of that collision the Black Prince sank and was lost with all her cargo, including the said goods of the plaintiff. Both vessels were English, and it appeared from the evidence that when the two vessels were about four miles apart, the Black Prince was sighted by those on board the Arazes, half a point on her starboard bow, and that the Arazes thereupon ported her helm. The Black Prince, however, instead of porting her helm as the two vessels approached each other, starboarded, and the port-bow of the Arazes came in contact with the starboard side of the Black Prince, and the latter sunk and was lost. It was contended at the trial, on behalf of the defendants, that the loss was caused by perils of the sea, and therefore was excepted by the bill of lading; and, further, that the conduct of the master and mariners on board the Black Prince amounted to barratry, and so fell within the exceptions in the bill of lading; and in support of the argument that it amounted to such barratry, reliance was placed on the 296th, 298th and 299th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104),¹ by which a collision occasioned by non-observance by any ship of the rules there laid down is to be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of such ship.

The learned Judge reserved this last point, and he left the jury the question whether there was want of due care on the part of the Arazes, by the exercise of which care the collision would have been avoided, telling them that if that question was answered in the negative there would be a verdict for the plaintiff, but that if they were of opinion there was want of due care on the part of the Arazes, by which the accident would have been avoided, the defendants would be entitled to the verdict. The learned Judge also told the jury that if the collision was brought about by negligence on the part of the Black Prince, the loss would not be a peril of the sea, and that, for that purpose, he could not distinguish between gross negligence and negligence,

(1) Sect. 296. "Whenever any ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in one direction, meets another ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in another direction, so that if both ships were to continue their respective courses they would pass so near as to involve any risk of a collision, the helms of both ships shall be put to port so as to pass on the port side of each other; and this rule shall be obeyed by all steam ships and by all sailing ships, whether on the port or starboard tack, and whether close-hauled or not, unless the circumstances of the case are such as to render a departure from the rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger, and subject also to the proviso that due regard shall be had to the dangers of navigation, and, as regards sailing ships on the starboard tack close-hauled, to the keeping such ships under command."

Sect. 298. "If in any case of collision it appears to the Court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any rule for the exhibition of lights or the use of fog-signals issued in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, or of the foregoing rule as to the passing of steam and sailing ships, or of the foregoing rule as to a steam ship keeping to that side of a narrow channel which lies on the starboard side, the owner of the ship by which such rule has been infringed shall not be entitled to recover any recompense whatever for any damage sustained by such ship in such collision, unless it is shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary."

Sect. 299. "In case any damage to person or property arises from the non-observance by any ship of any of the said rules, such damage shall be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the deck of such ship at the time, unless it is shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary."

and that it would be evidence of such gross negligence in this case if a party wilfully starboarded when the law said he ought to port.

The jury stated that there was no want of ordinary care on the part of the Arazes, and that there was negligence on the part of the Black Prince, which caused the collision, and a verdict was thereupon entered for the plaintiff, damages, 1,220*l*.

In the course of the trial an objection was made, on behalf of the defendants, to the reception of depositions tendered in evidence by the plaintiff. These depositions had been taken at Messina, under a commission issued for that purpose, at the instance of the plaintiff. The defendants had not joined in that commission, but they had appointed a Mr. Francis Tagliavia, of Messina (who was the defendants' ship agent at that port, and had signed the bill of lading the subject of the action), to act as their agent upon the execution of such commission for the examination of witnesses at that place. Mr. Tagliavia had had due notice of the commission, and had attended and cross-examined on behalf of the defendants all the witnesses produced and examined under the same; but it was objected that the defendants had not had notice that the plaintiff's attorney would have attended on the execution of the commission, and also that the defendants had been led to believe from the written interrogatories that the plaintiff himself would have given evidence, and that they had prepared and sent out cross-examinations accordingly; whereas the plaintiff never appeared as a witness, and the evidence of the witnesses who were produced and examined was taken viva voce, none of the written interrogatories in chief or cross-interrogatories being put to the witnesses. The learned Judge, however, received the depositions.

In the course of Easter Term last,

E. James, for the defendants, obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict, and to enter it for the defendants, pursuant to the leave so reserved at the trial, on the ground that the conduct of those in charge of the defendants' ship brought the case within the exception of barratry in the bill of lading; or for a new trial, on the ground that the learned Judge ought to have told the jury that the loss was caused by perils of the seas within the bill of lading, and also that he ought to have left to the jury whether the loss was caused by gross negligence; also whether the loss might not have been avoided by care on the part of those on board the Arazes; and on the ground of the misreception of the depositions taken at Messina; or why the entry of final judgment on the verdict should not be stayed, on the ground that the matters set forth in the replication to the third plea did not take the case out of the protection given to the defendants by the bill of lading.

The Solicitor General, Hannen and Cohen shewed cause.—The defendants are liable unless the case falls within the exceptions in the bill of lading. Now, first, as to what is barratry. The other side rely on the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 299, which enacts, that if damage be caused by non-observance of the rules, it shall be deemed to have been caused by the wilful default of the person on deck. No doubt the section has this effect, that if there be a guilty intention to defraud an owner, there is barratry. This case has been in Admiralty (15 Moore, P.C.C. 122), but this point was never suggested. And the only case is The Seine (Swa. Adm. Rep. 411), and there Dr. Lushington said that if the argument were right, both his Court and the Privy Council had been wrong a hundred times. The Druid (1 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 391) also shews that this point is altogether novel and contrary to received opinion. The case of Earle v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126) will be relied on by the other side; but there the master knew his act was wrong and criminal, and all the case says is, that an intention to defraud the owner is not necessary. By the argument on the other side, any infringement of a rule on a mere matter of judgment would constitute a criminal offence. In *Tuff v. Warman*² such a construction was never suggested at the bar or by the Court. It becomes necessary to ascertain what the law was before the statute. In 2 Parsons's Maritime Law, 239, it is laid down—"If an unlawful act be done without intention, or through inadvertance or ignorance, it is not barratry. The act must be wrongful in itself and wrongfully intended." Again, Lord Ellenborough laid down—"To constitute barratry, which is a crime, the captain must be proved to have acted against his better judgment"—Todd v. Ritchie (1 Stark. 240). In Arnould's Law of Marine Insurance, 2nd edit., sect. 310, p. 844, "barratry" is defined as "not only every species of fraud and knavery covinously committed by the master with the intention of benefiting himself at the expense of his owners, but every wilful act on his part of known illegality, gross malversation or criminal negligence, by whatever motive induced, whereby the owners or the charterers of the ship (in cases where the latter are considered owners pro tempore) are in fact damnified"; and the author says, that losses caused by the captain's ignorance or incompetence are not barratrous, unless he "acted against his better judgment," for which he cites Phyn v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (7 Term Rep. 505). There are two incontestable propositions as to barratry: first, it is not necessary to intend to do a wrong to the owner; secondly, the mere intention to do what turns out to be a damage to him is not barratry unless he had wrongful intention; it is not enough that damage accrues. The case of Earle v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126) illustrates that the master need not intend to do a wrong to the owner. Further, counsel in that case put the distinction between the case where the act was absolutely unlawful, and the master must be taken to know he must not break the law, and the case where the act was ambiguous and took its character from the intention, and intention was necessary. And Lord Ellenborough throughout his judgment seems to acknowledge this distinction, and after deciding the case, says, "We do not feel any apprehension that simple deviations will be turned into barratry to the prejudice of underwriters; for unless accompanied by fraud or crime, no case of deviation will fall within the true definition of barratry as above laid down"; which shews that mere intention to do the act is not necessarily enough, because it may be an ambiguous matter (take deviation as an illustration), which may necessarily bring a loss, or may be a question of judgment, and it then becomes necessary to see whether the intention was wrongful. Phyn v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (7 Term Rep. 505) illustrates this; and the case of Sadler v. Dixon (8 Mee. & W. 895; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 435) shews that wilful default is not necessarily barratrous. This being the state of the law before the statute, does the statute make it barratrous to infringe the rules laid down? The language has been copied from act to act, and the more recent ones are to be found in Pritchard's Adm. 28, Dig. 147, new edit. It is not likely that it was the intention of the legislature to alter the law on a different subject when passing these enactments, and it would be curious if the law has been mistaken ever since these statutes both by Bar and Judges, the question having been directly involved in every case of a collision where the statutable rule has been broken. In Morrison v. the General Steam Navigation Company (8 Exch. Rep. 733; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 233), after alluding to the Admiralty Regulations, Pollock, C.B. stated that the Court was clearly of opinion that no change of the law had been effected by them. In Sadler v. Dixon (8 Mee. & W. 895; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 435) it was assumed that a wilful act was not necessarily barratrous. The wilful default must be a criminal default knowing it to be criminal, to be barratrous. Secondly, as to perils of the seas, this point is decided by Lloyd v. the General Iron Screw Collier Company (3 H. & C. 284; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 269).

[WILLES, J.—Yes, notwithstanding that the Court apparently was not aware that seven years before the same point was decided by this Court in Phillips v. Clark (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 156; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 168).]

That case in this Court was not cited, because the Court of Exchequer had already come to the same conclusion before it was cited. Again, in America the same rule holds; this is shewn by Jones v. Pitcher (3 Stewart & Porter, 135); and the author in Parsons's Maritime Law, vol. i. p. 191, sums up thus: "As between an underwriter and the insured owner of a ship, the former will be answerable for a loss by a collision, although caused by the negligence of the master or crew, because it is considered as a peril of the sea; but a collision so occurring will not exempt the owner of the vessel from being liable to the shipper of goods for damage caused to them thereby." Thirdly, as to gross negligence, there is really no distinction between negligence and gross negligence. Thus, in Wilson v. Brett (11 Mee. & W. 113; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 264), Rolfe, B. said, "I said I could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence; that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet."

[WILLES, J.—In Beal v. the South Devon Railway Company (3 H. & C. 337), a definition of "gross negligence" is given by Crompton, J., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. ERLE, C.J.—I advisedly abstained from using a word to which I can attach no definite meaning; and no one, as far as I know, ever was able to do so.]

Moreover, the question of gross negligence cannot arise in such a case as this, for if negligence were proved it was negligence for which a carrier would be liable—Wild v. Pickford (8 Mee. & W. 443; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 382); where Parke, B. says, "The weight of authority seems to be in favour of the doctrine . . . that it is enough to prove an act of ordinary negligence." As to contributory negligence, there was no misdirection in the summing up. Fourthly, as to the depositions being receivable in evidence. It is objected that the interrogatories were not put to the witness, but a viva voce examination. But the other side appointed an agent who cross-examined, and how can they object now? And if it was found more convenient, it was quite competent for this course to be adopted.

[WILLES, J.—And ought not the objection to have been taken before the trial, at chambers?]

Yes; the objection should be taken as suggested. And, further, after assenting and cross-examining, they cannot object.—[They also referred to MacLachlan on Shipping, 458, Worms v. Storey (11 Exch. Rep. 427; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 1), Siordet v. Hall (4 Bing. 607), Dakin v. Oxley (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 646; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 115) and The Ida (1 Lush. 6).]

E. James, Karlake and Sir G. Honynman, in support of the rule.—One of the questions is, whether the loss of the goods was not a loss occasioned by the perils of the sea within the exception mentioned in the bill of lading. The learned Judge rather treated the matter as if it were a case of collision between two ships, and the question was, which ship was in fault; but the real question, it is submitted, was, not whether there was a want of care on the part of the Araxes, by which the collision could have been avoided, but whether the loss of the goods could have been prevented by the exercise of care on the part of either of the vessels. Though the collision was unavoidable, it does not follow that the goods need have been lost. If the Araxes had stopped her engines and not come into so violent a collision, the consequence to the goods might have been different. The loss was a loss by the perils of the sea, and so the learned Judge should have directed the jury. There is nothing unreasonable in a shipowner contracting with the owner of the goods that if the vessel be lost under circumstances which would make the underwriter liable, the shipowner should not be liable for the loss of the goods—Carr v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (7 Exch. Rep. 707; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 261). The Great Northern Railway Company v. Morville (21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 319), and Austin v. the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company (10 Com. B. Rep. 454; s. c. 21

Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 179) shew that carriers may by express contract be exonerated in certain cases from liability. Now, if this had been an action on a policy of insurance, the loss would have been by perils of the sea, according to Sadler v. Dixon (8 Mee. & W. 895; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 435) and Smith v. Scott (4 Taunt. 126), as there is no continuing warranty of competency of crew; then why is it to be different in this action? With respect to the case of Phillips v. Clark (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 156; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 168), which has been referred to, it is submitted that that is distinguishable from this, as what was complained of there was bad stowage, and the exception as to leakage did not extend to what had been brought about by the defendants' own act, namely, bad stowage. In Wilton v. the Atlantic Royal Steam Packet Company (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 458; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C. P. 369), which was an action for the loss of luggage, the Court gave no opinion whether the negligence of the captain deprived the defendants of their protection under the bill of lading. The case of Lloyd v. the General Iron Screw Company (3 H. & C. 284; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 269), which, being an action against the present defendants, and arising out of the same collision between these vessels, has been much relied on by the other side, was, however, decided on demurrer, where it was admitted by the pleadings that the accident had been wholly caused by the gross negligence of the defendants and their servants. Next, assuming the loss not to be within the exception as a loss by the perils of the sea, it is submitted it comes within the exception of barratry. The 296th section of the Merchant Shipping Act states the rule for each vessel meeting, as these were meeting, to port the helm, and section 299. declares the damage arising from the non-observance of such rule to be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the deck of such vessel. The conduct of those on board the Black Prince, in starboarding instead of porting the helm, is made wilful by the statute, and is therefore barratrous. Barratry need not be criminal—Wilson v. Rankin.³ Nor is it necessary that there should be an intent to damage the owner, but a wilful wrongful act deliberately done, and to the damage of the owner, will be sufficient to constitute barratry. If the master deviate from his instructions to the damage of his owner, it is barratry. Then, as it is implied that the master is to act according to law, if he does not do so he violates his instructions. Now, in the present case, the rule as laid down by the Merchant Shipping Act was broken without justification, and the damage done thereby is, by the statute, to be deemed to have been caused by the "wilful default of the person in charge of the deck." The following definition, given in Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit., p. 712, note (2), is in the defendant's favour: "The tersest and (perhaps) best definition of 'barratry' is that given by Lord Hardwicke in Lewen v. Suasso (Postlewaite's Dict. 177, tit. 'Assurance'), viz., that it is an act of wrong done by the master against the ship and goods." In Earle v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126), Lord Ellenborough says, "I conceive the trust reposed in the captain of a vessel obliges him to obey the written instructions of his owners where they give any, and where his instructions are silent he is at all events to do nothing but what is consonant to the laws of the land." Again, in Heyman v. Parish (2 Campb. 149), his Lordship held that it was not necessary to shew fraud. In 3 Kent's Commentaries, 305, it is said that whether the act be induced "by motives of advantage to himself, malice to the owner or a disregard of those laws, which it was the master's duty to obey and which the owners relied on him to observe. It is equally barratry." It does not follow that, because fraud is necessary to make some acts barratrous, that other acts are not so without. As to Phyn v. the Royal Exchange Insurance Company (7 Term Rep. 505), all that case amounts to is, that a deviation which may be innocent, if it be fraudulent, may be barratrous. If it had been found "wilfully done in contravention of a known rule of navigation," it would clearly have been barratrous. Then the statute does away with the necessity of any inquiry as to the wilfulness of the act by declaring that if a collision occurs and there be not obedience to these rules, this is to be considered wilful. If there had been damage by fire, would its having arisen by the negligence of a sailor make any difference?

[WILLES, J.—The 26 Geo. 3. c. 86. s. 32. regulates fire in ships; and as to land, Lord Canterbury v. the Attorney General (1 Ph. 306) and Filliter v. Phippard (11 Q.B. Rep. 347; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep (N.S.) Q.B. 89) are at variance.]

So if damage by machinery, there is an absolute contract. Again, where bad stowage, the same may be said. Next, the learned Judge ought, according to the issue raised by the replication to the third plea, to have left it to the jury whether the loss was not caused by "gross" negligence of those in charge of the Black Prince. There is a difference between negligence and gross negligence—Coggs v. Bernard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. 179), Hinton v. Dibbin (2 Q.B. Rep. 646; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 113) and Beal v. the South Devon Railway Company (3 H. & C. 337). Lastly, the depositions taken under the commission were improperly received in evidence. The Commissioner is directed to put the cross-interrogatories which were sent out with the commission. He did not do so, and the evidence was therefore not properly taken according to the commission. Mr. Tagliavia was only a ship-broker, and not qualified to examine witnesses; and it is submitted that he was not the defendants' agent for that purpose, and had no authority to act for the defendants so as to bind them by any consent to take the evidence viva voce.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. With respect to the admission of the depositions, I should regret if it turned out that any objection, going merely to the irregularity of the proceedings, and not to the merits, could be taken; but in this case I am not satisfied that any irregularity has taken place. The complaint consists in this, that whereas the commission was obtained by the plaintiff for an examination on interrogatories of witnesses on his behalf at Messina, and whereas the defendants, though not joining in that commission, furnished cross-interrogatories to be put to those witnesses, one of those witnesses, whose evidence, it is stated would have been important, was not called, whereby the cross-interrogatories were not put to him; and that in respect of others of the witnesses who were called the written interrogatories, prepared and furnished by the defendants, were not exhibited; and that the cross-examination of some of the witnesses consisted only of a series of questions put by Mr. Tagliavia, who was instructed to attend the examination on the part of the defendants, and who got the answers to the cross-interrogatories. The Court has asked in vain to have pointed out any matters that might have been elicited for the benefit of the defendants that were not put forward by the gentleman who represented them, and the fact that they cannot be pointed out shews that, for all practical purposes, the cross-interrogatories, or the substance of them, were administered, though not in a written form, to the witnesses called, and that the defendants have really suffered no detriment whatever. This objection, therefore, has no solid foundation, and only amounts to this, that the questions were put by word or mouth instead of being read from a written paper; and that being so, I think my Lord was right in allowing the depositions to be received in evidence. If it be any satisfaction to the defendants, I should desire to say that, having read the examination by this gentleman, I cannot agree that he shewed any want of commercial law or legal acuteness.

Now we have to discuss the really important questions in the case. The first of them which was reserved is, whether the loss which took place under the circumstances of this case, though a loss in respect of which the defendants would, but for the exemption in the bill of lading, have been answerable to the plaintiff, was a loss which falls within the exceptions in the bill of lading, either as being a loss caused by a barratry, or by perils of the sea. And first with reference to whether it was a loss by barratry. For the purpose of deciding that question, of course it is necessary for the Court to be satisfied whether the reasonable conclusion from the evidence was that the act by which the loss took place was something barratrous on the part of those on board the Black Prince. The Arazes appears to have been steering on her right course; there is no proof of any negligence whatever on her part. She appears first of all to have seen the Black Prince some five miles off on her starboard bow. Her helm was ported so as to bring the Black Prince on her port bow, and in that position they remain till shortly before the collision; the collision being that the Arazes ran into the Black Prince on her starboard side, about midships, whereupon the Black Prince sank, and the goods on board of her belonging to the plaintiff were entirely lost. It must be admitted that the proper view of the conduct of the parties was, that while the Arazes was right in porting her helm, the Black Prince must at some period have starboarded her helm. There being no circumstances shewn to justify a departure from the rule which requires both vessels to port their helms, necessarily the Black Prince, or those on board of her, were in fault. It did not appear what was the extent of that fault. The evidence seems to have come from the people on board the Arazes, and no evidence was given by people on board the Black Prince. There was no evidence either way of whether what was done was done wilfully or only by default. Under these circumstances, apart from the statute, it would hardly be contended, I suppose, on the part of the defendants, that this was a proof of barratry,—barratry consisting of something done in fraud of the owners. It is not like the cases referred to in the argument, in which it has been held that the master, by using the vessel in smuggling, or for some other unlawful purpose, without leave of the owner, although he intended that the owner should have the benefit of the adventure, was guilty of barratry. Those cases do not at all prove the propriety of the definition contended for, for this simple reason, because nobody has a right to risk the property of another in wilfully doing an unlawful act without his leave, whether his intention be to benefit him or not. It is that sort of intention one sometimes hears of in a case of forgery. A person puts another's name to a bill, and on the part of the prisoner it is urged that he had large expectations of money from some one, and was sure to have the money in his pocket so as to take up the bill, and intended to do so. The answer to which is, that he had no right to incur the risk of his being in funds, and had no right to put his good intentions against the peril to which he exposed the person who took the forged instrument, or the annoyance to which he put the person whose name he thought proper to use. His good intentions are utterly immaterial. That, I take it, is the explanation of why the master, in doing an act which is obviously unlawful, though he chooses to take the risk of being punished, and intends the owner to get the benefit of it, if he has not his leave to incur the risk, does a barratrous act. It must be an unlawful act wilfully done which occasions the injury. Here there is no evidence that the act done was of such a character that it was barratrous.

But it is said that the effect of the statute is to make it by a fiction of law a barratrous act; because the statute says, if damage shall accrue from the non-observance of any of the regulations set down, it is to be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the ship; and it is said that by reason of that provision it must be taken that the helm was wilfully starboarded by the persons on board the Black Prince, and that the collision was therefore caused by an act that was barratrous, because an act contrary to law, and an act which redounded to the interest of the owners. Upon consideration, I am unable to arrive at that conclusion. The statute in question was certainly not passed with a view to determine cases of the description of that now before us,—questions arising upon a contract between the shipper and the shipowner. That statute was passed with a different intention, namely, for the regulation of ships, and for determining the rights of shipowners inter se. It appears from the case of The Seine (Swa. Adm. Rep. 411), that it was thought by Dr. Adams that the expression "wilful default" might be construed to mean malfeasance; but it was held in that case, by the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court, that the statute had no such intention as that, and that the words "wilful default," which I think must be admitted are rather unhappily chosen, were used for the purpose of expressing that the ship, on board of which the blunder has been made of not porting the helm, under the circumstances in which the rule applies, was to be considered the ship which was in fault; and that, unless the person on board could explain why he did not port the helm, he must be answerable for the like consequence as if he had wilfully abstained from doing so. That appears to me to be strongly confirmed by the subsequent act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, the 29th section of which enacts, "If in any case of collision it appears to the Court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by, or in pursuance of, this act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shewn, to the satisfaction of the Court, that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." Therefore, when it was seen what difficulties presented themselves, in the case of The Seine (Swa. Adm. Rep. 411), and the legislature came again to deal with the subject, it excluded any doubt, by shewing that the term "wilful default" was not used in the sense which would exclude a negligent one, for which the owner of the vessel was liable. I consider, therefore, that the statute was passed, not for the purpose of altering the rights of parties who were contracting with one another; and I think that "wilful default" is an expression loosely used simply for the purpose of shewing, first that the vessel is in fault, and, secondly, that the person who is on deck is to be called on in any proceedings against him to explain his conduct in not complying with the act, and that he is to be considered as in "wilful default," and punishable as a person who has wilfully neglected his duty, unless he can explain how it was he did not comply with the statutory regulations. That is the whole scope of the enactment, and it appears to me not to affect the question between the parties under the circumstances now brought before the Court.

Then comes the question, the importance of which one could not exaggerate, if it was not that the shipowners have the remedy in their own hands, to exclude, by more precise language, the consequences which it may be said they have entered into. That is the question whether, upon the true construction of the bill of lading in this case, the loss has happened by perils of the sea within the exception of "perils of the sea" in that document. I do not propose to say much on this point, because I conceive that it has been already decided in the Court of Exchequer in Lloyd v. the General Iron Screw Collier Company (3 H. & C. 284; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 269), a similar action to the present, and brought in respect of the very same collision. But as reference has been made to the case of insurance as if it was one not sufficiently considered in that case, and not well to be distinguished from the case of an action on a bill of lading, I will say a word upon that. With respect to a policy of insurance, it must be remembered that it is a positive contract to insure against the perils described, and not an exception from liability; and therefore it is only necessary to see whether the perils in respect of which the assured seeks to recover come within the description in the insurance, in point of fact, without reference to whether there is any contract in respect of which the terms would be affected or narrowed by it. Moreover, I should observe that the general words at the end of the specified perils in the policy of insurance, "all other perils that may come to the ship during the voyage," clearly shew that, although the perils to which the ship has been exposed may have been brought about by circumstances not strictly coming within the description of "perils," yet, if a loss happened by the perils insured against, the words of the policy are satisfied. The action on a bill of lading stands, as it appears to me, on a very different footing. The contract is a contract to carry with reasonable care and safety, unless prevented by certain excepted perils; and therefore, when you prove that the damage is caused by one of the excepted perils, but also prove that there has not been a carrying with reasonable care, by reason of which the goods were exposed to the peril, you have conflicting portions of the contract, which you must choose between. On the one hand, the owner of the vessel promises reasonable care, skill and diligence from his master and mariners; on the other hand, he says, "I am not to be answerable if the accident happens by perils of the sea." How are you to reconcile these? It has been said they may be reconciled by saying that if the accident happens by perils of the sea, but is brought about by want of due care and skill on the part of the master and mariners, you have a breach of the contract before you come to the exception. Whether that is an answer or not, it is unnecessary to consider now, as it is sufficient to say that there is the case of Lloyd v. the General Iron Screw Collier Company (3 H. & C. 284; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 269), which so far as I have been able to consider, is supported by the case of Phillips v. Clark (3 Stewart & Porter, 135) in this court. It will not require very much diligence to find, on the authorities referred to, and on what has been called the general mercantile law, abundance to shew that this is no new doctrine; and I would make no further remark on this part of the case beyond saying that the same question arose at the trial of the present cause as was raised on the demurrer on which the Court of Exchequer pronounced judgment, with one exception, and that depends on the use of the word "gross" in the replication.

The learned Judge at the trial laid down that with reference to the circumstances of this case gross and ordinary negligence were in effect the same; and although in a portion of the summing up the word "gross" was used, yet it was accompanied by a statement, in which I entirely concur, that there was no distinction at all for the purposes of this case between gross and ordinary negligence; and, indeed, so far as the argument has gone, I have been unable to ascertain what is the injury that is complained of by the defendants in not using the word "gross." I own I entirely agree with the dictum of Lord Cranworth in Wilson v. Brett (11 Mee. & W. 113; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 264) that "gross negligence" is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet. That was the law laid down in Wyld v. Pickford (11 Exch. Rep. 427; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 1), and upheld and recognized in the Exchequer Chamber in the judgment of Mr. Justice Crompton, in Beal v. the South Devon Railway Company (8 Mee. & W. 443; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 382). The confusion seems to have arisen in using the word "negligence" as if it was an affirmative word, whereas, in truth, it is a negative word; it is the absence of such care, skill and diligence as it was the duty of the person to bring to the performance of the work which he is said not to have performed. Then if you begin with that, what is the amount of care, skill and diligence which a man ought to bring? In the case of a gratuitous bailment it is said, if you employ a man of no skill to ride your horse, he is bound to use such skill as he possesses, and that you require no more, and that he is liable for gross negligence in that sense. But, if you employ a man to ride your horse who professes to be a groom, he would be answerable unless he had competent skill in horse-riding. Therefore the word "gross" is a word which, as pointed out by Sir Patrick Colquhoun in his summary of the Roman Civil Law, is used as a description, not as a definition. If we have to separate law from fact, and to leave the question of fact to the jury, we could not get nearer to a practical definition of "gross negligence" than such negligence as is actionable. When you are dealing with a bailee for hire as to any act of omission of his in the course of his employment, the want of due care, skill and diligence, if there be any, is therefore necessarily gross negligence. It is only introducing confusion, and tends to mislead the jury, in my opinion, to use the word "gross," instead of using, as my Lord appears carefully to have done over and over again on this occasion, "want of due care and skill in navigating the vessel." I apprehend that was clearly a correct summing up, and that the introduction of the word "gross" might even have led to complaint on the part of the plaintiff that the jury might have been misled by the use of an epithet to which they might have attributed more weight than it really deserved.

There is only one point remaining, and I think I now clearly understand what is intended to be represented to the Court, which is this, that this not being an action by the Arazes against the Black Prince, but by the owner of goods on board the Black Prince, who undertakes to shew that the damage happened to his goods not by perils of the sea, but by the negligence of the crew, he does not sustain that issue, which rests upon him, by shewing merely that the collision between the two vessels happened by the negligence of the crew on board the Black Prince, but he must go further and shew that the collision and other circumstances up to the point of the sinking, by which the goods were lost, were caused by the negligence of the people on board the Black Prince, and not with any contributory negligence on the part of the Arazes. And the argument went further; it was said that if the Arazes could have stopped so as not to impinge with such violence upon the Black Prince, though she was not bound to do so, yet, if she had done so, peradventure the collision would not have been accompanied by a loss of the goods. I have taken great pains to understand this point, because of one's difficulty in appreciating it, but I think it comes to this: given there was negligence on the part of the people on board the defendants' vessel, and that if there had not been the negligence, the goods of the plaintiff would not have been lost; still the defendants seek to divide the operation of collision, and so qualify their own wrongful act, and to say that though what took place would not have taken place if there had not been negligence, yet there were other circumstances which might have intervened, and did not, and which, if they had, would have prevented the loss accruing. That either means that the Arazes acted wrongly, or it does not. The fact is, there is no evidence of wrong on the part of the Arazes. If it was not wrong for the Arazes not to back, the fact of her not having done something which she was not wrong in not doing, and which it was not part of her duty to do, cannot qualify the damages which the defendants are to pay for their wrongful act. That brings me to the point, which is perfectly clear, and which is scarcely matter of authority, but for which there is an authority in Davis v. Garratt (6 Bing. 716; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. C.P. 253), that if a man does a wrongful act, and a consequence follows as the ordinary consequence of such act, he cannot get rid of that consequence without shewing that it must have happened if he had not done the wrong. I should say, moreover, that the jury must have understood from the summing up of my Lord that the loss arose from the wrongful acts of the defendants' servants. All the points in this case appear to me, as I have already stated, to be points of great importance; the Court is exceedingly thankful to counsel for the assistance which they have rendered it in the course of the argument; and upon the whole it appears to me that on none of the points ought the rule to be made absolute.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I also think that the rule should be discharged. It is contended that starboarding the helm was in contravention of the positive rule of the Merchant Shipping Act, and, being so in contravention of law, that it was barratry on the part of the master. Section 299. of the act and the evidence fails to establish any such case. It was perfectly consistent with the facts proved that those on board the Black Prince were asleep, or that those who ought to have been on deck were asleep below; and it would be strange to say that, though the act of going to sleep may be wilful, yet, if the master or men in charge of the deck are asleep, and an accident is occasioned thereby, that would be barratry within any definition which has hitherto been given. Take the case of the master getting drunk, which is a more wilful act. If an accident was caused by his want of care, it hardly could be contended that that would be barratry so as to bring the case within the exception in the bill of lading. I entirely agree with my Brother Willes that the words in the statute have not that effect. It is clear to my mind that it was not the object of the legislature to alter the effect of contracts made between the shipowner and merchant; and, looking at the whole scope of the act, it certainly does not seem to have been the intention to relieve the owner of the offending ship from liability.

The next part of the rule relates to the motion for a new trial; and the first ground is, that the Judge ought to have told the jury that the loss was caused by a peril of the sea within the exception of the bill of lading. It seems to me that if he had done so, it would have been directly in opposition to the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, which, though on a demurrer, assumed very much the state of facts which was proved at the trial here; and it is sufficient to say that I think my Lord was bound at Nisi Prius by that decision, and that we are bound by it here. It is a decision given upon a case arising out of the very same state of circumstances, and the Court appear to have decided the matter, not upon the pleading, but upon the very point argued here. I wish to give no opinion of my own upon that question, but to confine myself to saying that I think we are bound by the decision of the Court of Exchequer.

The next ground is, that my Lord ought to have left to the jury the question whether there was gross negligence. I conceive my Lord put the case with perfect propriety in the direction that he gave to the jury, and it has not been suggested at the bar in what way he could have put it differently, unless he had used the word "gross," which is found in the replication. I think it is a word which is indefinite in itself, and which, without explaining what it meant, would not have tended to enlighten the minds of the jury as to the question they had to determine. There is no doubt that the expression "gross negligence" is to be found in some of the decisions; but it is only one mode of expressing, perhaps, that in a particular case there is a less degree of care required than there might be in other cases; and when you have to define between "negligence" and "gross negligence," it certainly seems to be more scientific and more intelligible to define what are the degrees of care than to attempt to say what are the degrees of negligence. As I read the replication, it would have stood equally well without the word "gross"; the question is whether there was a want of that due care, skill and diligence which a captain and crew ought to bring to the service of the ship.

The other point of misdirection is, that my Lord ought to have asked the jury whether, although the collision was caused by the negligence of the Black Prince, the foundering of the ship and the loss of the cargo were not caused by the negligence of those in charge of the Araxes. As I understand the argument for the defendants it is, that although the foundering of the Black Prince would not have happened without some negligence of her crew, yet it was not the inevitable consequence of it, and it might have been averted if those on board the Araxes had done something which they ought to have done. It seems to me that such argument on that point might prevail if there were facts to justify it; but I think there is an utter absence of facts which would have justified my Lord in putting such a question to the jury. As far as the evidence goes, there was no want of care on board the Araxes, and it is matter of pure speculation by the counsel for the defendants to suggest that something might have been done on board the Araxes which might have prevented the collision, or might have rendered it less injurious than it was. There was therefore no misdirection.

There is one other question which in this important case one would hardly have expected; that is, whether the depositions were improperly received by my Lord. Now, my Lord could not have refused to have accepted these depositions, unless they had been taken without authority, and the counsel for the defendants have scarcely contended for so wide a proposition as that. It seems to me that they were taken with authority, and that, if there had been any irregularity in the mode of taking them, the proper method of taking advantage of that would have been to apply to the Court to have them suppressed, certainly not to wait until the trial and then take objection to their admissibility. Upon all these grounds, therefore, I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

ERLE, C.J.—I have nothing to add to the observations of my learned Brothers, except that I am authorized by my Brother Keating to say that he concurs in the judgments which my Brothers Willes and Smith have delivered.

*Rule discharged.

Adopted, Edney v. Smallbones, 1869, 21 L. T. 506 (Arches). Referred to, R. v. Green, 1874, 31 L. T. 543 (Ex. Ch.).

Churchwardens, Election of—Custom—Separation of Part of Parish—Declaration—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 62. s. 9.—Judgment for one of several Plaintiffs.

CUSTOM. ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—Down to the year 1848 the parish of P. consisted of six townships, and by custom the churchwardens were chosen as follows: in one township the outgoing churchwarden presented two names to the rector to choose from, in four other townships respectively the parishioners presented two names to the rector to choose from, and in the sixth two names were similarly presented to the rector; and the six persons chosen by the rector became the parish churchwardens. In 1848, by an Order in Council approving of a scheme prepared by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, the last-mentioned township was constituted a separate rectory, and from that time in the old parish the five remaining townships only presented names to the rector, and there were only five churchwardens elected for the parish:—Held, that the separation of the one township did not affect the custom in the remaining five, and that the five persons chosen thereunder were lawfully churchwardens of the parish.

In an action for money had and received, by such five persons against a defendant who, wrongfully claiming to be churchwarden of one township, had therein collected money due under a church-rate, it appeared that one plaintiff had not made any declaration under the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 62. s. 9, but his predecessor, who had made a declaration for the previous year, was willing to be substituted:—Held, that, on such substitution being made, it was no valid objection that such predecessor had made no fresh declaration, inasmuch as he remained in office under his declaration till he had a properly constituted successor.

On the argument of a special case, stated after the trial in such action,

(4) The Court recommended the words "gross negligence" to be struck out of the replication, and the words "want of due and reasonable skill and diligence" inserted in their place; and upon such amendment, leave was granted to appeal on the question of the loss being within the exception in the bill of lading.

the question, for the first time, was raised, whether the action ought to have been brought by all five churchwardens, or only by the churchwarden of the township where the defendant had collected the money:—Held, without deciding that question, that the Court, under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126. s. 19, had power to give judgment in favour of one plaintiff only, if necessary.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs as the churchwardens of the parish of Prestwich, to recover from the defendant all moneys received by him on account of a church-rate for the said parish, under colour and pretence of the defendant being churchwarden of the said parish.

The declaration was for money received by the defendant for the plaintiffs' use and on an account stated, and the defendant pleaded that he never was indebted.

The cause came on to be tried, before Shee, J., at the Spring Assizes, 1864, held at Liverpool, for the southern division of the county of Lancaster, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 6*l.*, with leave to the defendant to move the Court for a rule to set the verdict aside and have it entered for him, or to have a nonsuit entered on all the points open upon the evidence; the Court to be at liberty to draw any inferences of fact from the evidence received as to the custom.

On the 21st of April, 1864, the Court granted a rule calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict entered for them on the trial should not be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict be entered for the defendant, or a nonsuit be entered in this cause pursuant to leave reserved, on the grounds, first, that the plaintiffs were not proved to be duly elected and appointed churchwardens; secondly, that the custom alleged by the plaintiffs was not proved; thirdly, that the plaintiffs had not made the necessary declarations before entering on the office; unless the parties should consent to a special case being stated between them for the opinion of the Court.

On the 13th of June, 1864, the Court further ordered that a special case should be stated between the said parties for the opinion of the Court, to raise all the points and to consist of the evidence given upon the trial of this cause, to be taken from the Judge's notes, supplemented, if necessary, by the shorthand-writer's notes taken at the said trial, and that the parish-books should be produced upon the argument of the said case, and be taken as part of the case; the Court to have all the powers reserved by the Judge before whom the said cause was tried; and that the draft of the said special case should be prepared by the defendant's attorney, and submitted to the attorney for the said plaintiffs; and in the event of any difference between the said last-mentioned parties, then it was ordered that it be referred to Mr. Justice Shee, before whom this cause was tried, to settle the said case.

Pursuant to such order, there was stated the following

CASE.

The plaintiffs in this cause claim to be the churchwardens for the parish of Prestwich, in the county of Lancaster; the plaintiff John Alexander Bremner claiming to be and to act as one of such churchwardens, as representing the township of Prestwich, which forms a part of the said parish; the plaintiff James Royle claiming to be and to act as another of such churchwardens, as representing the hamlet of Unsworth, in the township of Pilkington, which also forms part of the said parish; the plaintiff Richard Denham Walker claiming to be and to act as another of such churchwardens, as representing the townships of Great and Little Heaton, which form other parts of the said parish; the plaintiff Marshall Heaton claiming to be and to act as another of such churchwardens, as representing the townships of Tonge and Alkington, which also form parts of the said parish; and the plaintiff John Lancashire claiming to be and to act as the other of such churchwardens, as representing the hamlet of Outwood, in the township of Pilkington aforesaid.

The defendant also claims to be and to act as churchwarden for the said parish of Prestwich, as representing the said township of Prestwich.

The amount sought to be recovered was received by the defendant, professing to act as such churchwarden, in respect of a certain church-rate of 1d. in the pound laid on the said parish of Prestwich.

It is alleged, on the part of the plaintiffs, that a custom or usage has existed from time immemorial in the said parish of Prestwich for the nomination and appointment of the churchwardens of the said parish, and that such custom is as follows, that is to say, two fit and proper persons are nominated by an annual meeting, held for that and for other purposes, of the ratepayers within the hamlet of Unsworth, in the township of Pilkington, which forms part of the said parish; two by an annual meeting held for that and other purposes of the ratepayers within the townships of Great and Little Heaton, which respectively form part of the said parish; two by an annual meeting held for that and other purposes alternately at Tonge and Alkrington of the ratepayers within the respective townships of Tonge and Alkrington, which respectively form part of the said parish; two by an annual meeting held for that and other purposes by the ratepayers of Outwood, in the said township of Pilkington, which forms part of the said parish; and two by the outgoing churchwardens, in respect of the township of Prestwich in the said parish. And that the rector appoints one of the two nominated by the said meeting of the ratepayers within the said hamlet of Unsworth; one of the two nominated by the said meeting of the ratepayers within the said townships of Great and Little Heaton; one of the two nominated by the said meeting of the ratepayers within the said townships of Tonge and Alkrington; one of the two nominated by the said meeting of the ratepayers within the said hamlet of Outwood; and one of the two nominated by the outgoing churchwardens, in respect of the township of Prestwich. And that each of the persons so appointed is a churchwarden for the whole of the said parish as representing the hamlet or township by or in respect of which he has been nominated.

The defendant, on the other hand, denies such custom as respects the township of Prestwich; and alleges that, even if it has so existed, it is not a good, valid and binding custom, and has been departed from and determined. He further objects that the plaintiffs were not proved to be duly elected and appointed churchwardens, and that they, or some of them, had not made the necessary declaration before entering on office.

The evidence given on the part of the plaintiffs, so far as the same is material for the purposes of the present case, was as follows, that is to say.—The case then set forth at full length the evidence of the witnesses given at the trial, various documents, letters, notices, &c., used thereat, and other the matters which then occurred, and referred to a voluminous appendix of documents, letters, notices, &c. But for the purposes of the decision of the points of law, as distinguished from the point of fact, raised in the case, the following statement is sufficient.]

Previous to the year 1848 the parish of Prestwich, in addition to the townships and hamlets hereinbefore mentioned, had contained the hamlet of Whitefield, in the township of Pilkington, which hamlet also returned a churchwarden for the parish of Prestwich; so that down to that time the number of the parish churchwardens was six instead of five. But by an Order in Council of the 17th of February, 1848, Her Majesty approved of a scheme prepared by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, under the 3 & 4 Viet. c. 113, whereby Whitefield became a rectory, under the name of the rectory of All Saints' Stand, and from that time ceased to return a churchwarden for the parish of Prestwich, and to contribute to its church-rates. It also appeared that the plaintiff Heaton did not make the declaration required under the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 62, s. 9. till after the action commenced, and that for 1863, the year in question, Lancashire had made no declaration; but Heaton's predecessor, one Butterworth, was willing to be substituted for him in the action, and Lancashire, having been in office the preceding year, had in that year made the declaration.

By a meeting of the parishioners residing in the township of Prestwich, the defendant and one Chadwick were elected as proper persons from whom the rector might select one. Chadwick refused to act; the rector refused to select; but the defendant made the declaration, and, professing to act as churchwarden, had collected in the township 6*l.* for a parish church-rate, made on the 8th of April, 1863, at a meeting of the parishioners of the whole parish.

The rest of the voluminous matter laid before the Court was only material as bearing on the question of fact, before the Court as a jury, whether or not the alleged custom was proved.

The points for the plaintiffs on the special case were: First, that there is sufficient proof of the custom under which the plaintiffs were elected churchwardens and of the election of the plaintiffs as churchwardens according to the custom, so as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover. Secondly, that the separation of the township of Whitefield from the parish of Prestwich, and it being made a separate parish of itself under the authority and according to the provisions of the statutes in such case made and provided, did not destroy the ancient custom of electing churchwardens for the parish of Prestwich, and such custom still continued and subsisted as respected the other townships, although, after Whitefield had ceased to be a part of the parish of Prestwich, the custom could no longer apply to it. Thirdly, that whatever was the custom or lawful mode of electing churchwardens for the parish of Prestwich, the defendant cannot and does not pretend that he was elected a churchwarden of the parish of Prestwich according either to the custom or the Canon Law, and it appears that the defendant received the moneys on account of the church-rate without any colour of right whatever. Fourthly, that both when the church-rate was made and when the defendant received the moneys on account of the church-rate, the plaintiffs were the reputed and acting churchwardens of and for the parish of Prestwich, and were churchwardens de facto of the said parish, and that the defendant, who was a wrongdoer in receiving the moneys on account of the church-rate, is not to be permitted to dispute the plaintiffs' right to bring this action.¹

The defendant's points were: First, that the custom set up is bad in law. Secondly, that the custom set up to oust the common right of appointing churchwardens is not made out. Thirdly, that it is not made out to be immemorial or uniform, and that if there ever was a custom it was departed from and lost on the separation of Whitefield in 1847. Fourthly, also that the plaintiffs have no right to sue, for want of their having all made the declaration required by the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 62. s. 9.

Temple (Mellish with him), for the plaintiffs.—There is sufficient evidence of the custom of choosing the churchwarden in the township of Prestwich, viz., that two persons should be nominated by the outgoing churchwarden, of whom the rector should select one. The occasions on which this has not been strictly followed are not inconsistent with the custom; they have been when the rector has been desirous that the outgoing churchwarden should continue for another year, and when of course it was not necessary for such churchwarden to go through the needless form of naming another person with himself. Then the law shews that the appointment of churchwardens is regulated by custom. "They are sometimes appointed by the minister, sometimes by the parish, sometimes by both together, as custom directs"—1 Black. Com. 394; and The King v. the Inhabitants of Hinckley (12 East, 361) shews that by custom there may be only one churchwarden for a parish. The chief objection on the part of the defendant is, that, inasmuch as by the custom set up there were originally six churchwardens for the parish, the custom has been destroyed by the township of Whitefield having been made in 1847 a parish and rectory of itself, by means of which, that township being thus taken out of the parish of Prestwich, there henceforth became only five churchwardens, instead of six, for the latter parish. Whitefield was made a separate rectory by Order in Council, and afterwards it no longer contributed to the rates or had anything to do with the parish of Prestwich. How could its separation from that parish destroy the custom? Another objection was, that one of the plaintiffs, namely, the plaintiff Heaton, had not made the necessary declaration, and therefore was not qualified; but at the trial the plaintiff asked for and obtained leave to amend, if necessary by substituting for such plaintiff the name of the former churchwarden, who consents to his name being so used.

(1) See Turner v. Baynes, 2 H. Bl. 560.

Milward (Sowler with him), for the defendant.—If the custom claimed is properly proved, it is not denied that it is good, so as to regulate the election; but unless it be made out satisfactorily by the evidence, then the common law must prevail, by which the right of choosing churchwardens belongs to the parishioners—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Churchwardens' (A). "To give validity to a custom, it must," says Chief Justice Tindal, in Tyson v. Smith (9 Ad. & E. 406), "be certain, reasonable in itself, commencing from time immemorial, and continued without interruption." It is for the plaintiffs to make out the existence of such a custom as that which they claim in this parish. They have failed to shew the existence of such a custom "from time immemorial, and continued without interruption." The omission to present two churchwardens for the township of Prestwich, in order that the former churchwarden might remain in office, was a violation of the custom—Gibbs v. Flight (3 Com. B. Rep. 581; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 73); and, if the custom was not destroyed, it was not continued to be performed when Whitefield was taken out of the parish. The plaintiffs are setting up here a custom for the election of five churchwardens by shewing a custom for the election of six. By 58 Geo. 3. c. 45, power is given to create a district parish, which would be a separate parish; but there is, in this case, no evidence of a district being attached; the Order in Council merely calls the church a rectory, without professing to give a district. But even if this were not so, still the election of churchwardens of the mother parish would not be affected, for by sections 24. and 73. these new districts churchwardens are churchwardens merely for church purposes. So 59 Geo. 3. c. 134, s. 23. provides that they shall not be deemed overseers of the poor. Therefore a churchwarden should still be elected in Whitefield to make up the customary number of six, and all six must be joined in an action like the present. But, further, assuming that five is now the proper number, still one has not made the declaration required by 5 & 6 Will. 4. 62. s. 9. It is true that the outgoing churchwarden is willing to be substituted; but if he acts, he must declare. Thus, in Stoughton v. Reynolds (2 Str. 1045), Chief Justice Raymond said, "As to the objection that the plaintiff needeth not a re-swearing, it is otherwise; and, in corporations, when mayors are re-chosen they are always sworn again, though there is a power to hold over."

Temple, in reply.—First, no fresh swearing is necessary; secondly, the custom was independent in each township, and even if foregone in one, the others are not affected; thirdly, the Order in Council was made under the powers given by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113. s. 72, and Whitefield thereby became a distinct parish.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment in this case should be for the plaintiffs. It is an action brought by five churchwardens, representing five townships in the parish of Prestwich, and it is brought against the defendant, who claims to be the churchwarden of one township in the parish of Prestwich, viz., the churchwarden for the township of Prestwich. He claims to be a churchwarden for the township of Prestwich, and to be entitled to collect according to the custom that has been prevalent in Prestwich a church-rate which has been made for the parish, it being clear that, with respect to all the townships, if they acted according to ancient custom, each township would have made a separate collection of the rate, and the sum so collected would go into the parish purse. The five churchwardens have claimed the money that has been collected by the defendant, and is held by him, claiming that he is the churchwarden of Prestwich.

In reality, the great question to be tried between these parties is the validity of the custom in Prestwich, under which the churchwardens are appointed. The outgoing churchwarden in the township of Prestwich presents the names of two persons to the rector, and the rector appoints one of them. The custom varies in the different townships, but substantially in the other townships the ratepayers nominate two persons, of whom the rector appoints one, and the real substantial matter to be tried is a matter of fact within the cognizance of a jury, but which has been referred to us, viz., whether in point of fact there has been an immemorial custom in the township of Prestwich for the outgoing churchwarden to name two persons, of whom the rector should choose one to be churchwarden.

Now, in respect of the evidence that is laid before us, I can find nothing to put in the opposite scale. There are a great number of instances wherein the outgoing churchwarden has nominated two persons, of whom the rector has taken one; and the real interests that are opposed to one another in this case are, whether the parishioners should name two persons, of whom the rector shall take one, or whether the outgoing churchwarden should do so, and thus, as is contended on behalf of the defendant, have a power which might be perverted to the use of really nominating the succeeding churchwarden, that is to say, by presenting one eligible name to the rector and another so utterly ineligible that the rector would be guilty of an unpardonable breach of duty if he appointed such a man as churchwarden. That is the real contention between the parties. The outgoing churchwarden has presented two names, the rector has chosen one, and the grievance alleged has never taken place. But it has been suggested that in some instances the custom has not been strictly adhered to in form, and that, instead of the churchwarden presenting two names to the rector, the rector has in some instances requested the outgoing churchwarden to continue in the office, in which instances he said, "I will dispense with your presenting any name; I shall appoint you." But in all those cases the right has been kept up in the outgoing churchwarden and in the rector, and there is no single instance of that custom being departed from in the sense contended for by the defendant, viz., by the ratepayers of the township of Prestwich presenting two names to the rector for him to appoint one. It appears to me the custom is really proved by that which has been mainly relied on on the part of the defendant, viz., that which happened in 1826. The opposing interest is the interest of the ratepayers. It is certain that the parishioners have had their minds open to this as their interest for a considerable time. In the year 1826, with ample deliberation, notice was given that they were going to contest this matter between themselves on the one side and the rector on the other. A vestry was called, and names chosen and presented to the rector. But then it appears to me that that is rather a confirmation of the custom than an invalidation of it, because the names that were presented to the rector contained the name of the outgoing churchwarden, and contained the name of the person whom the rector nominated; and, for aught that appears upon the entry in the parish books, the outgoing churchwarden may have nominated him to the rector. Again, there is the evidence of the former rector, going back as far as living memory, saying that in the township of Prestwich the custom has been invariably observed, that is to say, that the outgoing churchwarden and the rector for the time being had in the manner I have described chosen a new churchwarden; and the person who was curate in the parish in 1826, at the very time when the above transaction occurred, and who knew of it (as far as his evidence is to be taken in the case), says that the custom continued in the year 1826, and the nomination was made according to the custom; at least so I understand his evidence. Therefore it is a case, to my mind, entirely without an answer,—a case where there is a great deal of strong affirmative evidence.

where the supposed departure from the custom was entirely reconcilable with it in substance and in essence, where the custom continued, if I may say so, with notice to the parties who had an interest to dispute it, and where, notwithstanding that, down to the year in which this action was commenced, uniformly the ratepayers have not done in the township of Prestwich that which the ratepayers have done in the other townships.

Then, is this custom a valid custom? I do not think it can be gravely argued that it is not a valid custom, if it has been uniformly prevalent in point of fact; and I see that a custom very analogous to it has been twice in litigation in times that have passed, and been recognized as a custom that could not be disputed in point of law, if in point of fact there was the evidence that the custom prevailed. One of the cases is Catten v. Barwick (1 Strange, 145), which sets out the usual canon by which churchwardens are to be chosen, one by the parson and one by the parishioners; and then states that in the parish of Bridge the custom is for the parson to appoint one and the two old churchwardens the other, and that, the two churchwardens not agreeing, one named Barwick and the other Catten, and there was a dispute whether Catten was appointed. The particular dispute we have nothing to do with; but there is something of an analogy between the customs set up in that case and in the present one. The present case is also somewhat analogous to the case of Asile v. Thomas (2 B. & C. 271). There it appeared that the plaintiffs were the churchwardens of the township of Burton-upon-Trent, in the parish of Burton-upon-Trent, and the defendants were the preceding churchwardens of the same township. It appeared there was another township in that parish which was in the habit of making separate rates, and each township having collected the rates, they all went into a common purse, as Chief Justice Abbot calls it, a parish purse—collected in each separate township, but belonging to the parish purse. Then the churchwardens of the separate township having brought an action against the outgoing churchwardens for that township for collecting the rate and not paying it over, the objection was made, as partly made here, that the churchwardens are a corporation, and the churchwardens of the other townships ought to have joined in the action;—held by the Court, the contrary, because the money which got into the parish purse is the money of the separate township from which it is levied, and the parties who have an interest in that money of the separate township are the parties to bring the action to enable them to get it into their hands, before it takes the ultimate step of going into the parish purse, as Chief Justice Abbot calls it, and therefore the churchwardens of the township interested in the fund had a right to bring that action alone, and the other churchwardens who belonged to the parish were not necessarily joined. I only refer to those cases on this part of the case to shew that custom is very much sanctioned and supported when it is clearly proved, and is not to be set aside as invalid on the ground of any notion of fancied convenience.

Another main question to be tried is, whether the custom is entire for the six townships. In the course of the increase of the population and the application of the Church Commissioners Acts, the township of Whitefield has been either wholly or in part taken out of the six townships and created, in the words of the Order in Council, a rectory by itself. I do not stop to inquire what the effect of those words in the Order in Council might be. Certain I am that the effect must be ascertained by reference to the statutes under which the Queen in Council made the order, and I take it that the Queen in Council could create a parish, and the effect of those statutes, I think, would be to authorize the Queen in Council to do so, and the general presumption, omnia presumuntur rite esse acta, I think, would apply here. I assume there is nothing to shew the contrary, and that that Order in Council was a valid Order in Council, and Whitefield township was in fact for certain purposes separated from the other townships in the parish of Prestwich, but I do not think that that destroys the custom that existed in respect of the other townships. There is no reason that I can see why they should not be permitted to continue to choose their churchwardens. There is nothing in the least degree to affect Prestwich or the other townships that are named because one of the townships has gone from the six. They all would have the same interest. Whatever induced the parties originally to establish this custom, the custom is entirely unaffected, as far as I can see, by the one township being taken out and the other five remaining. Nay, if it is destroyed, it is destroyed absolutely for the whole parish; and if the separation of Whitefield put an end to the custom altogether, it seems to me to follow that the parishes would be remitted to the former right at common law,—a proposition, which has not been contended seriously before us, which would be adverse to the claim of the defendant, and which, in my opinion, could not be sustained if it had been brought forward.

Then, that being so, the substance is in favour of the plaintiffs. The objection that one of the churchwardens has not made his declaration, and so is incompetent to act, is remedied, because, if he was not capable of acting, the result is that the former churchwarden continues in office, as is perfectly well known in the law relating to churchwardens. A churchwarden is appointed for the year and until a successor is appointed, and there is no reason for saying that a churchwarden whose office continues probably against his own will, because a valid successor is not appointed, should make a new declaration. He has declared once for all, and the same declaration continues until he goes out of office. The statute shews no sign of there being a necessity for his making the declaration during every year he may continue in office, and the case cited from Strange is entirely irrelevant, because there the outgoing churchwarden was chosen again. He did not continue because he had been in office and no successor was appointed by the parish exercising the right of appointing a new churchwarden; but in the year in question he was elected a churchwarden anew for the ensuing year, and if he comes in by a fresh election, though the late churchwarden, he must go through the same forms to qualify himself as a stranger who is selected for that office. That declaration which qualified him for the office he took by the former election has nothing to do with his making a declaration upon the new election. That makes the words of the Chief Justice perfectly relevant. The churchwarden cannot rely upon making the declaration under the statute in respect of his former year of office. The mayor who is elected for the second year, according to the rights of the corporation, is just as much called upon to take the oath and to qualify himself for the second year as he was for the first year: that is because he took a new office by a new election, and the churchwarden taking a new office by a new election is within the analogy which the Chief Justice there pointed out. If he does not take a new office by a new election, if his old office continues, the qualification for entering on the beginning of that old office would qualify him to hold it until the law relieved him from it, that is, on a valid successor being appointed. If there be anything in the objection of too many being joined, all may be struck out except the one representing the township; if too many are joined there is power of remedying that, and all those powers which are reserved will be put in force if the case should come before any other tribunal in consequence of any objection being made to there being too many joined on the record or to the right parties not suing. As at present advised, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to the money which the defendant has collected.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the question of misjoinder, I say nothing upon that, because, under the Common Law Procedure Act of 1860, I apprehend we have power to give judgment in favour of such of the plaintiffs as should appear to be entitled to it. But, with regard to the other question, this is an action brought by the churchwardens of Prestwich appointed under the custom, against a person who has professed to act as churchwarden for the Prestwich township, treating the custom as being an invalid custom, either by reason of its not having been established in the action, or by reason of what has taken place under the Order in Council with respect to Whitefield having displaced the custom, if it ever legally existed.

Now, with respect to the first matter, that is one of fact; and having carefully gone through the evidence in the case, I find, for a long number of years, I may say for nearly two centuries, it appears there has been a course pursued in the parish which is other than the course of the canon or common law or common right. The general course of proceeding has been precisely described, and, to a certain extent, and a very large extent, that custom must be treated as a valid custom. With respect to the special custom affecting the township of Prestwich, I find that there has been a substantial conformity or adherence to the custom throughout, and that, in the instance in which a variation took place, there were circumstances which rather make that variation a confirmation of than an objection to the evidence of the existence of the custom. I specially refer to what took place in 1826, which rather seems to shew that the custom was objected to, that the matter was looked into by persons who desired that it should not continue, that they found they were wrong, and that the custom went on; or it may be that for one year the incumbent may have been satisfied to allow the township to have their own way, but that, upon reflection, he thought it his duty to adhere to the ancient custom of the parish, and to return to that which had been the ordinary, usual and continuous course, which we must attribute to legal origin, by which legal origin there has been a custom going back to the time of prescription. That being so, what is the character of the custom in other respects? In the first place, it must be borne in mind that, while the parish is an ecclesiastical division, and whilst the churchwardens, although lay persons, are ecclesiastical officers, the township is a temporal division, and has nothing whatever to do with the ecclesiastical division. Now, if there were no custom, if the custom either did not exist or had been destroyed, the proper course would be that the rector and the parishioners should agree if they could upon appointing two persons, or if they could not agree, then the rector should appoint one and the parishioners appoint another. That being the state of things, we find that in the separate temporal division of the parish there has been unquestionably from time to time an appointment of a separate churchwarden to act with the churchwardens of the other townships in respect of the whole parish. Nothing can be a stronger departure from what is called the common right or common law than that, and it must be admitted that, as respects the election being separate and distinct in a township instead of being entire, at a meeting of the parishioners of all the townships together, there has been in this case a custom. Then you find in the townships other than Prestwich there was a course followed, by which the inhabitants of the townships elected two persons, out of whom the rector was to choose one; and I find that in Prestwich there was an arrangement that the outgoing churchwarden should present two, out of whom the rector should appoint one. The result of that is this: there is unquestionably a custom altering the course of the common law affecting this parish, in very material particulars. With respect to the township of Prestwich, there has been a long series of elections of churchwardens in the way in which it is alleged the custom would operate, that mode of election differing not in kind, but differing in degree from the elections which are customary, and which must be admitted to be established by custom in the other townships. Whether the township appointed two of whom the rector was to choose one, or whether they have allowed themselves from time to time to be represented by the churchwarden, in each case you have the township submitting to the judgment of the minority of the township.

The case referred to of Catten v. Barwick (1 Strange, 145) is a case in which the Court, at a time when questions of this kind were more thoroughly understood, and perhaps more litigated than they are now, treated a custom for the two outgoing churchwardens to present as a valid custom. It therefore appears to me that the custom is well established in point of fact, and that it is a legal custom. And the case referred to of Astle v. Thomas (2 B. & C. 271) shews there is no difficulty as to parties.

I must further add, however (because were I not to do so, it might seem I did not concur in what has fallen from my Lord on the subject), a few observations as to a matter which I cannot help thinking is well worthy of the consideration of the parish and of the townships composing it. Assume, for one moment, it was made out that this particular custom in Prestwich was an invalid custom, was not established: assume that was so, what would be the effect? The effect would be, not that the township of Prestwich would assume the custom of the other townships, because in each of them the custom is as valid, because it is supposed to have existed since the period of living memory,—the effect would be that Prestwich must return to the mode under the Canon, or what is called the common right, that is, that the rector and the people must appoint; that would be impossible, because there is only one, and the consequence is, that the custom would be entirely destroyed, as to all the townships; that is the only alternative, and you must have a meeting for all the townships, at which the parishioners shall agree, or the rector shall appoint one, and the parishioners another, under the Canon, and the whole system which has been going on in these townships may be destroyed, and the parties get into interminable difficulty by litigation, which would not be calmly submitted to by those who do not like it, and who are of a different opinion. But that only arises here as a by-point, and I only mention it because the case would not be complete without it, and that would lead to a state of things hardly desirable. Again, referring to that case of Catten v. Barwick (1 Strange, 145), in that particular case, the churchwardens could not agree what was to be done. The decision of the Court was, the Canon or the common right must prevail.

With respect to the suggestion that the creation of a new ecclesiastical district, consisting of one parish, or part of it, has the effect of destroying the custom, I cannot bring myself to think that that is at all a difficulty, because, as I have already observed, the parish is an ecclesiastical division, and the township is a temporal division, and therefore the custom must consist and stand simply upon the convenience of the inhabitants of the several townships electing churchwardens to represent them in the parish or among the parish officers. If you take away the cure of souls in a portion of a district over which the parish extends, you do not alter the identity of the parish; you leave the cure of souls of the rest, and you leave the rector of the parish just as much parson as he was before; therefore the custom relating to the election of the ecclesiastical officers, to serve under him in respect of the church, must necessarily remain unaffected. To put an illustration: I think the effect of removing a portion of the inhabitants of a parish out of the cure of souls of the parish would no more destroy a custom existing in the remaining parish than driving a canal through the waste of a manor would destroy the custom of the commoners to have common rights over what was left unoccupied. That being so, and we having power under the third Common Law Procedure Act to give judgment to such of the plaintiffs as may appear to be entitled, I have no difficulty in saying that I think the judgment of the Court ought to be for the plaintiffs.

KEATING, J.—I am quite of the same opinion. There are two questions really submitted to us: whether there is a custom clearly proved in fact; and next, whether, if it was proved, it was invalidated by the removal of Whitefield from the rest of the parish of Prestwich. It was proved, and in fact the evidence seems to me all one way, and I entirely agree with my Lord and my Brother Willes, that the alleged exceptions, in truth, prove the rule as to the existence of the custom from time immemorial. Then, is it invalid in point of law? I think the position assumed by the defendant is almost suicidal, because he seeks to, in truth, claim himself under a custom which would have been equally invalid by the removal of Whitefield from the rest of the parish, if the custom he assails was so invalid; but, for the reasons which have been already pointed out by my Lord and my Brother Willes, I am clearly of opinion that the removal of Whitefield does not, in any degree, invalidate, in point of law, the custom proved to have existed from time immemorial in the township of Prestwich. These are really the substantial questions upon which we have to decide. With reference to the other point raised by Mr. Milward, I quite agree with my Lord and my Brother Willes, that, for the reason stated by them, there is no difficulty whatever in giving judgment for the plaintiffs.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The main point, and the only point on which the township is really interested is, whether the custom of choosing the churchwarden which is set up by the plaintiffs is proved or not. I entirely agree with the rest of the Court that it is proved. The evidence is very strong and uniform. And the fact that there are certain variations, which have been pointed out, in the entries, does not at all, to my mind, shake the reliance which I place upon the substantial uniformity of the custom; and in the case of The Duke of Beaufort v. Smith (4 Exch. Rep. 450; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 97), a claim of 4d. per way of all coal gotten within the manor and seignior, and exported to sea, was supported by evidence of the uniform payment of that toll for three centuries, although there were several intervals of time when it was not paid, and notwithstanding there were considerable variations in the entries describing the payment. With regard to the other point, viz., whether the separation of Whitefield has destroyed the custom, so as to disable the five remaining churchwardens from suing, or the churchwarden of the township of Prestwich alone from suing, I think that the power of the remaining churchwardens is not destroyed, but that it remains in them. Churchwardens do not form a corporation in the strict sense of the term, so that the loss of an integral part of the corporation destroys the whole, but they are rather an aggregate of individuals, who, in some sense, form a joint corporation, but not in the strict sense of the term; and in the case of an aggregate of individuals, the death of some of those individuals does not destroy in those corporations the right of the remainder to sue. The other points are really points of form, and do not go to the substance of the case; and upon them I entirely agree with the rest of the Court.²

The decision of the Judge at the trial that the deponent whose deposition has been taken under that act is unable from permanent sickness to attend the

(2) After the Court had delivered the above judgments, a discussion arose as to the substitution of the old churchwarden, Butterworth, and as to whether judgment ought to be for the churchwarden of the township of Prestwich alone. The Court held they had power not only to allow the substitution, but also, if necessary, to give judgment, under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 19, for one plaintiff, and gave leave to the plaintiffs to substitute or strike out as they thought proper.

Quære—whether an affidavit of a medical man is admissible to satisfy the Judge as to the illness of the witness?

Action to try the right to a fishery in the river Usk.

At the trial of this cause, before Blackburn, J., at the last Spring Assizes for the county of Brecon, the counsel for the defendant tendered in evidence the deposition of one Samuel Hawkins, who was of the advanced age of seventy-nine, and whose evidence had been taken under a commission under the 1 Will. 4. c. 22.

The 10th section of that act enacts, that “no examination or deposition to be taken by virtue of this act shall be read in evidence at any trial without the consent of the party against whom the same may be offered, unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Judge that the examinant or deponent is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, or dead, or unable from permanent sickness or other permanent infirmity to attend the trial; in all or any of which cases the examinations and depositions shall be received and read in evidence.”

In order to shew the inability of the witness Hawkins to attend the trial, which took place on Saturday the 24th of March last, the commission day being Tuesday, the 20th, the clerk to the defendant's attorney was called, who stated that, in company with Dr. Bullar, he saw Mr. Hawkins on Monday, the 19th of March last; that he was in bed, and appeared to be so ill as to be unable to move; and on cross-examination the witness stated that Hawkins's face was drawn up in agony. It was objected, on the part of the plaintiff, that this was not sufficient evidence, in the absence of medical testimony, that the witness Hawkins was unable to attend from permanent sickness or infirmity. The learned Judge said he was satisfied with such evidence, and decided on receiving the deposition.

The counsel for the defendant tendered an affidavit of Dr. Bullar, the medical man who had seen Hawkins; the learned Judge expressed some doubt about receiving it, but said he would take it in addition, so that the Court might judge whether it was admissible.

That affidavit, which had been sworn on the 19th of March, 1866, was as follows, viz.: “I, Joseph Bullar, of the town of Southampton, doctor of medicine of Edinburgh, make oath and say, that I regularly attend Samuel Hawkins, of Marwell Lodge, near Winchester, in the county of Hants, Esq., who has been examined by commission in this action, as his medical adviser; that I have seen the said S. Hawkins to-day; that the said S. Hawkins is unable from permanent sickness to attend the trial of this action at the Assizes for the county of Brecon, to be holden at Brecon in this present month; that the permanent sickness from which the said S. Hawkins suffers is chronic gout, and at the present time he is confined to his bed with an acute attack of gout in both feet and knees, and is unable to move.”

The deposition of Hawkins was then read, and a verdict having been found for the defendant, a rule nisi was afterwards obtained for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence of S. Hawkins ought not to have been admitted.

Manisty, Dowdeswell and H. Allen shewed cause.—In a matter of this kind, the Judge is the supreme and sole judge, and the Court will not interfere. Thus the Judge at the trial is the sole judge as to discharging the jury—Winsor v. the Queen (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 161; s. c. 1 Law Rep. Q.B. 390); and in granting a certificate for costs the Court will not review his opinion—Barker v. Hollier (8 Mee. & W. 513; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 474), Merrick v. Wakley (11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 249), Twagg v. Potts (4 Dowl. P.C. 266), Bury v. Dunn (1 Dowl. & L. 141; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 351, nom. Perry v. Dunn), and Cann v. Facey (4 Ad. & E. 68; s. c. 5 Law J.

Rep. (n.s.) K.B. 1). The Court cannot go into the question whether the illness was of such a character as to prevent the witness attending the trial; but if they can do so, then, it is submitted, there was sufficient satisfactory evidence of it. There is here even no affidavit to shew that the witness could have attended. In the 17th section of the 11 and 12 Vict. c. 42, which relates to depositions in criminal cases taken before a magistrate, it is provided that before such depositions can be read in evidence, it must be proved that the person whose deposition is proposed to be read is dead, or so ill as not to be able to travel; and in Stephenson's case (Leigh & Cave, 165), the Court of Criminal Appeal held that the question whether the illness proved is or not within that statute is a question for the determination of the presiding Judge, and that the Court ought not to interfere with his decision. There was, moreover, the affidavit of the medical man, which clearly shewed such permanent disability as would justify the Judge in deciding, as he did, to receive the deposition. Such affidavit was admissible in order to satisfy the Judge. In Pitt Taylor on Evidence, 4th edit. p. 474, a case is mentioned of Knight v. Campbell, in which Chief Baron Pollock, at the Guildford Summer Assizes, 1848, received an affidavit of a medical man as sufficient proof of the permanent illness of a deponent to let in his deposition.

Grove, H. Giffard and G. Hughes, in support of the rule.—The decision of the Judge can be reviewed by the Court, which has always a general jurisdiction to review what a Judge does, unless it has been expressly taken away by statute. In Pitt Taylor on Evidence, 4th edit. p. 34-36, the general doctrine is stated that the Judge in deciding cases respecting the admissibility of evidence, where the admissibility depends on a disputed fact, must alone adjudicate on the evidence both to prove and disprove that fact, and various instances are given in which the Judge must alone exclusively decide the preliminary question of admissibility; and yet the Court reviewed those decisions—Doe d. Jacobs v. Phillips (8 Q.B. Rep. 158; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 47), Doe d. the Earl of Shrewsbury v. Keeling (11 Ibid. 884; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 199), Bartlett v. Smith (11 Mee. & W. 483; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 287), Doe d. Jenkins v. Davies (10 Q.B. Rep. 314; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 218), Reece v. Walters (3 Mee. & W. 527; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 138), Boyle v. Wiseman (11 Exch. Rep. 360; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 284), and Sharples v. Rickard (2 Hurl. & N. 57; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 302). The provision in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, section 31, that no new trial shall be granted by reason of the Judge ruling that the stamp is sufficient, impliedly shews that but for that enactment his ruling on that point could be reviewed. In Cleave v. Jones (7 Exch. Rep. 421; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 105) Martin, B. says, "Whenever an objection is taken to the admissibility of evidence, the Judge is bound to try any collateral issue on which it depends, and to determine the law arising from the facts proved, in the same manner as a jury decides matters of fact. In Wright v. Doe d. Tatham (7 Ad. & E. 313; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 340) a preliminary question of that kind arose, and the Judge came to a certain conclusion; but that was subject to review in a Court of error, like any other matter of fact, though in one sense it was a matter of law." The meaning of the words "to the satisfaction of the Judge," in section 10. of 1 Will. 4. c. 22, is only that the jury have nothing to do with the matter. It is not the same as saying the decision of the Judge shall be final. Stephenson's case (Leigh & Cave, 165) is upon a very different statute, and the Court of Appeal in criminal cases is limited in its jurisdiction to questions of law and not of fact. Then the learned Judge had no evidence apart from that of the affidavit on which he should have decided that the depositions could be received—and the affidavit was certainly not admissible. The case referred to in Taylor on Evidence, where Pollock, C.B. received such affidavit, is questioned as an authority by Mr. Taylor. In The Queen v. Riley (3 Car. & K. 116), Patterson, J. ruled that to allow a deposition to be read under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, the surgeon should be called, if there be one attending the witness, in order to prove the illness.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. It was a motion for a new trial on the ground of the improper reception of the evidence of a witness of the name of Hawkins, which had been given on depositions, and the learned Judge at the trial admitted the depositions upon oral evidence, from which it appeared to his satisfaction that Hawkins was unable from permanent sickness or permanent infirmity to attend the trial. The messenger who was sent down to see him stated the symptoms on which the learned Judge acted, and it is said that the Judge acted on evidence that ought not to have satisfied him, and that we therefore ought to grant a new trial. The first point to be determined is, whether we have jurisdiction to review the decision which the learned Judge arrived at. The words of the statute are,—“ Unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Judge that the examinant or deponent is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, or dead, or unable from permanent sickness or other permanent infirmity to attend the trial,” the Judge is not to admit the depositions. It was said with a good deal of force and clearness, that the statute had intrusted the decision of that point entirely to the Judge, made him supreme in the matter, and given no other tribunal power to consider what the Judge had done. But as to that part of the argument, Mr. Grove and those who are with him have satisfied me that that is not the construction of the statute. The Judge at Nisi Prius sits as a member of the Court, and his opinion is subject to review by the Court in Banco from which the record has come. The words of the statute in question do not take away the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court; the Judge at the trial must satisfy his own mind, but the conclusion he comes to is subject to be reviewed by the Court from which the record issues.

Then, having jurisdiction in that general way, it is said that we ought to exercise it by holding that the learned Judge made a mistake, and that a new trial ought to follow. I think upon that part of the case the argument has failed. The strong presumption is, that the Judge at the trial has better and greater means of deciding than we have, because he has the evidence of his own eyes to see the witnesses, and the evidence of his own ears to hear what they say; whereas we have only the account of what passed before him. Moreover, I am of opinion that we ought not to exercise the jurisdiction which we have as a last resource, unless we are clear that injustice will be done if we do not interfere. If we could see that the Judge had been misled by a fraudulent mis-statement, that there had been anything like a resort to falsehood on the part of those who had got the deposition read, there would have been an end of the matter, and we both ought to and should have interfered. But I do not see the least ground for thinking that anything of the sort has taken place here. I do not see any sign of fraud or falsehood; neither do I find any reason for coming to the conclusion that injustice has been done as to a mistake of the facts, for I do not see now that Mr. Hawkins could have attended the trial. Then, does the witness come within the section? He would be clearly within the section if the words had been only “ unable to attend the trial.” The words are, “ unable from permanent sickness or other permanent infirmity ”; and the great stress of the argument has been, was he unable from permanent sickness or permanent infirmity to attend? What is the meaning of permanent sickness? There is, no doubt, a large class of human beings who have been ascertained to be incurable. I do not think the statute meant that, or anything approaching in degree to that, looking at the whole of the context. The examination is to be read if it appear to the satisfaction of the Judge that the examinant is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. If the examinant was just across the Tweed, or had gone to Dublin or to Calais, he would be beyond the jurisdiction of the Court; and it is clear that the Judge would be bound to receive his depositions, though shortly after the trial the man might be in England walking about the town of Brecon. I agree with Mr. Grove, that the great thing is to prevent a witness from being exempted from cross-examination; but it is impossible to prevent illness, and the statute evidently means that the illness must have such a degree of permanence about it as must make it morally sure that there is no chance of the witness being able to attend at those assizes. I would not attempt the impossible task of defining the degree where there is nothing to compare it with; but it ought to be a disease of a serious or grave nature. Now, in the present case, to say nothing of the examinant being beyond threescore years and ten, he had carried chronic gout about with him for some time, and at that particular season an acute attack of gout had supervened. Then there is a witness who swears that he believes the examinant is unable to attend the trial. Is that an exaggerated account of the state of this person? I am at a loss to find any piece of ground on which to rest a decision that the learned Judge who presided made a mistake in receiving the depositions. For anything I can see, Mr. Hawkins may be afflicted with chronic gout and other disease at this moment; at all events, I cannot say that the learned Judge was wrong, and unless I could clearly see that he was, I should not feel myself authorized to overrule the conclusion at which he arrived.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the question as to the admissibility of the affidavit, as at present advised I am far from agreeing with Mr. Taylor, in his work on Evidence, that the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron in the case at Guildford was an erroneous ruling; and I should require very great consideration before I could bring myself to differ from the opinion of that learned Judge, who unquestionably has had very considerable knowledge of what was the practice in respect of admitting such depositions. And any doubt I might feel in overruling the decision of the Lord Chief Baron would be fortified by what took place in the case of The Queen v. Ryle (9 Mee. & W. 29; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 234), which was a commission to inquire as to the existence of certain Crown debts for the purpose of putting the fact on the record; and on the trial before a jury an affidavit of debt was the only evidence that was given. The Court of Exchequer was applied to to set aside the inquisition, on the ground of the admission of improper evidence. There it was said by Lord Wensleydale that the rule as to not admitting an affidavit as evidence had grown up as a matter of practice, not as a matter of common law; and he goes on to say, in language appropriate to the present statute, that the jury were to satisfy themselves of the existence of the debt, upon all such evidence as would lead them to find the truth; and that for that purpose they were not confined to the examination of witnesses upon oath; and accordingly it was held that the jury might find the existence of the debt on the sole evidence of an affidavit, and the case of The King v. Hornblower (11 Price, 29) was overruled. I refer to this case for the purpose of shewing that it was quite a mistake to suppose, as has been sometimes suggested, that at a trial at Nisi Prius you must necessarily have the witness to cross-examine. I am, therefore, far from saying that the Lord Chief Baron ruled wrongly when he said that the Judge must satisfy himself by any means which ought to satisfy his conscience. What weighed most on my mind of what was urged on the contrary was the suggestion of Mr. Grove that evidence of this kind might be open to fabrication; and, no doubt, it is true that, owing to the absence of cross-examination, evidence of that kind is more open to fabrication than evidence which is given viva voce. On the other hand, it is quite open to a person who complains of false suggestions made for the purpose of inducing the Judge to admit evidence by depositions to make inquiry and to inform the Court of the falsehood, upon doing which he would obtain the redress of a new trial, and also obtain an indemnification for all the expenses to which he had been unjustly put. The next question is, with regard to the meaning of "permanent" illness in the statute. As to that, I entirely agree with my Lord, and do not propose to add a word to what he has said, for I think that if it were intended that "permanent" should have the sense of "incurable," the word "incurable" would have been introduced into the statute. Then comes the question, what is the meaning of "proved to the satisfaction of the Judge"? Apart from the considerations which I have already discussed as to the media of proof that the Judge ought to have before him, I apprehend that if there is evidence upon which the person acting might honestly come to the conclusion that the evidence was receivable, the Court ought not to interfere simply because it is not proved to their satisfaction, for that would be to contradict the statute, and to substitute the satisfaction of the Court for the satisfaction of the Judge at the trial. Look at what would be the effect if the Judge were not satisfied at the trial, and were to reject the depositions, would it be competent to the Court to say, though they had not seen the witnesses, and had not the same means of knowing what weight should be given to their evidence, that they were satisfied, and that, therefore, there ought to be a new trial? That is impossible; therefore the Court have no such means of interfering. But the Court is not therefore powerless to prevent injustice, because there is a general jurisdiction by which we may prevent an abuse of our process of any kind whatever, and in this jurisdiction is included the power of setting aside a verdict in cases in which it appears to the Court that justice has not been done at the trial. The true result to my mind, therefore, appears to be, that unless this was the proper subject-matter of a bill of exceptions, the jurisdiction of the Court in granting a new trial, even if we were dissatisfied with what satisfied the Judge, ought not to be exercised unless it is made out that injustice has been done. Now this may sound vague, but in practice it has been found precise enough, and it has abundance of authority and illustration in its favour. First of all, there is the case which has been referred to of a Judge at the trial ruling who was the proper party to begin. It has been settled that the Court will not in such a case interfere by granting a new trial, unless it appear that substantial injustice has resulted from a mistake of the Judge. That was laid down in Brandford v. Freeman (5 Exch. Rep. 734; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 36); and Black v. Jones (6 Ibid. 213; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 152) is similar, where the learned Judge, in addressing the jury, stated the law erroneously, and a motion was made for a new trial, and the Court of Exchequer, consisting of Lord Chief Baron Pollock, Mr. Baron Parke and Mr. Baron Alderson, stated that no bill of exceptions would lie to the ruling of a Judge upon a collateral point; but that Court went on to observe, "that if at any time the Court should feel that great injustice had been done by an erroneous statement of a point of law, though purely collateral, no doubt it would, in the exercise of its sound discretion, give relief." I need not pursue the authorities further. I have cited enough to shew that the Court does nothing unprecedented in saying that, with respect to a ruling of this description, which is to be to the satisfaction of the Judge, the Court ought not to interfere unless injustice has been done. If that be so, then what is the injustice that should be proved to have been done, and was proved here? I was at first struck by Mr. Grove's manner of putting it, that injustice is necessarily done by putting in the evidence of a witness who might peradventure be produced in court for cross-examination. Upon consideration, I think that argument must be treated as a fallacy, because the legislature has overruled that objection by allowing the witness, under circumstances to be made out to the satisfaction of the Judge, to be examined without being exposed to cross-examination. Therefore it really is begging the question to say that that is sufficient injustice to induce the Court to interfere, and I am led to the conclusion that the injustice must be such as where by inquiries since the trial, as to the real state and condition of the man, whose depositions were put in, it is proved that the Judge acted on an untrue suggestion; the untruth of the suggestion on which the Judge acted is the only injustice that I can make out at present which should induce the Court to interfere. But no such case has been presented to the Court. There is not any attempt to shew that the conclusion which the learned Judge at the trial came to was an unjust one, or that the same conclusion would not have been arrived at upon more full information if a new trial were to take place. Upon this latter ground I own I think that the Court is bound not to interfere, and that the rule ought to be discharged.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I certainly did entertain some doubt as to the question whether or not the decision of the Judge was not final, until I heard the argument of Mr. Grove; but he has abundantly satisfied me that the Court has power to supervise what has been done, on the general principle that there is in this Court, as well as in every other superior Court, a jurisdiction to supervise all proceedings before the Judges in actions in this court, as well as the proceedings of inferior officers. The observation of the learned counsel for the plaintiff was very strong, that if the statute had meant to exclude that, the legislature might very easily have added the words “whose decision shall be final.” The statute has not said so, and therefore I consider that what has been done is capable of review by this Court; but still the onus probandi is now shifted; it lies upon those who impeach the decision of the Judge intrusted by the statute with the decision of this question, to satisfy us that the Judge was wrong, and possibly to go further and shew that some injustice has been done. At all events, one or the other must be done. We ought either to see that he was wrong in point of law—as, for example, that he had no materials, or that there was fraud, or that some injustice had been done. I do not think one of those three matters is made out on the present occasion. That being so, the decision of the Judge must stand. I cannot help observing, though not at all dissenting from what my Brother Willes said on the subject of the affidavit, that as regards that question the Judge decided to admit the examination of the witness before the affidavit was read. That being so, he decided upon the testimony of the person who was examined and cross-examined on oath, and whatever interpretation is put upon the word “permanent,” there was some evidence from the testimony of this person, looking at the age of the individual, as well as at the nature of his infirmity, that he was not able to be present. I agree with what has been said by my Lord and my Brother Willes, as to the meaning of the word “permanent,” that it is not necessary to define it, and that it would be exceedingly difficult to define it. Possibly the word “permanent” may receive different meanings under different circumstances. Suppose, for instance, that a witness was examined at the coming sittings at Nisi Prius in a special jury cause, and there were no more sittings at Nisi Prius until next December: if it be shewn that he will not be alive, or that he will be unable to attend next December, is not his examination to be read? Suppose the same cause to be tried before the sheriff of London, who sits every fortnight, does “permanent” there mean the same thing? It is not necessary to decide that question; but the word “permanent” may possibly receive different constructions, according to the circumstances of the particular case. I have only one other observation. Speaking for myself, it must not be considered that I am putting any construction whatever on the statute of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, which is in very different language, relative to criminal proceedings, where the words are, “If it shall be proved by the oath or affirmation of a credible witness that a person is so ill,” and so on. Nothing, so far as I am concerned, in the opinion I have given on this case, has any application whatever to the other statute.

WILLES, J.—I entirely agree with my Brother Byles in that observation, and would wish to guard myself in the same way.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree in the observations with reference to the general jurisdiction of the Court as to the trial of issues out of its own court, and as to the conduct of the presiding Judge; but I think the Court ought not to review his decision under the statute in the sense of substituting their discretion for his, and allowing their decision to prevail. The statute enacts, that no deposition shall be read unless it appear to the satisfaction of the Judge that the deponent is unable to attend. It is the mind of the Judge that is to be satisfied; and I think the Court ought not on light grounds to assume to itself the power of putting its mind in the place of his, and saying it is not satisfied upon that evidence which satisfied him. If it was proved that there was perversity, or mistake, or fraud on the part of those who put forward the depositions, then the power of the Court exists to look into the conduct of the trial, and say that it is not to its mind satisfactory. In this case I can find nothing which the Judge has done which he was not perfectly entitled to do. He had oral evidence upon the question whether or not the witness was affected with permanent sickness so as to be unable to attend the trial; and the evidence which was given before him satisfied his mind that the witness was suffering from permanent sickness and unable to attend the trial. Therefore, his mind was satisfied. It was not a case where he acted on his own judgment alone; he acted upon the testimony of a witness. The utmost that can be said is, that two views may be taken of the evidence of the witness; his testimony might not have satisfied some minds that the deponent was suffering from permanent sickness, while other minds it might have satisfied. Certainly the Judge who heard the witness is much better able to decide on the effect of the testimony than any one can be who merely reads a report of the evidence, which, however faithful it may be, does not often give full effect to the bearing of the evidence. Then, upon the construction of the statute, the words "permanent sickness" certainly appear to me to imply something more than sickness which would prevent his attending that particular trial. I agree with my Brother Byles that those words may be applied to different circumstances in different ways; but they certainly appear to me to mean some sickness of an enduring character which may last beyond the then impending trial. It is unnecessary to decide whether the Judge could have received an affidavit, because I understand from the report that he had decided to admit the depositions before the affidavit was tendered to him, and he received the affidavit and added it to his note, that in case a motion was made here, and we undertook to review his decision, he might have the benefit of the affidavit if we thought it was admissible. I think it is unnecessary in this case to consider whether the affidavit was admissible or not; but I am also very far from saying that the Lord Chief Baron was not quite right in the decision he is reported to have given in the case referred to. This is a matter which does not concern the jury; it is a matter where evidence is wanting to satisfy the mind of the Court if it were a trial at bar, or the mind of the presiding Judge in a trial at Nisi Prius, and I am by no means satisfied that an affidavit is not perfectly legitimate evidence for that purpose. Upon the whole, I agree with the rest of the Court that the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

THORP v. FACEY AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. C.P. 349; 1 H. & R. 678; 12 Jur. N.S. 741.

Ejectment—Mortgagor in Possession—Statute of Limitations.

LIMITATIONS (STATUTES OF). MORTGAGE.—In an action of ejectment by a mortgagee against a mortgagor, to recover a house, the plaintiff gave in evidence the mortgage-deed, (which included the house and some other property,) and judgment in ejectment for the mortgaged property obtained in 1847; and shewed that a paper (suggested to have been the declaration in ejectment) was, in that year, served on the mortgagor, and that from 1847 the mortgagor, who had till then been in possession of all the property, only held the house:—Held, that there was no evidence of possession by the mortgagee, or of the creation of a new tenancy under him in 1847, so as to prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

Locke v. Matthews (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 98; s. c. 13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 753) distinguished.

This was an action of ejectment to recover a dwelling-house in the city of Exeter.

At the trial the plaintiff put in indentures of lease and release, dated the 4th and 5th of January, 1836, by which one Hugh Facey mortgaged certain freehold property, including the house in question, to Henry Thorp; the probate (the statutory notice having been given) of the will of Henry Thorp (who died in 1857), devising the property to him, and an examined copy of a judgment obtained in 1847, in an action of Doe, on the demise of Henry Thorp, v. Roe. He also shewed that, previous to 1847, Hugh Facey was in possession of all the mortgaged premises; that in that year a paper (which it was suggested was the declaration in the old action of ejectment) was served on Hugh Facey, and that some little time after the date of the judgment Henry Thorp was in possession of all but this house, in which Hugh Facey continued to reside till his death, and his son, Charles Facey, the defendant, or his tenants, ever since. A verdict was found for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for her, on the ground that the evidence adduced by her was sufficient to make out her case.

A rule nisi was obtained pursuant to such leave; and no one appearing to shew cause, the Court called on Lopes, in support of the rule.—The fair result of the evidence is, that in 1847 the old tenancy of the mortgagor was determined, and a new tenancy created as to the house—Locke v. Matthews (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 98; s. c. 13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 753); and that being so, the Statute of Limitations has not run.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. This is an action of ejectment, brought by a mortgagee against a mortgagor, for premises included in the mortgage-deed. There has been no entry and no payment of rent, to shew the right, within twenty years. But it is said that in the case of mortgagor in possession and mortgagee, the former stands in the relation of tenant at will to the latter; if that position were made good, perhaps the plaintiff would be entitled to succeed, because, in 1847, part of the land was taken, and if there were a tenancy at will and an entry on part of the land, this, perhaps, would make a new tenancy as to the residue, just as in Locke v. Matthews (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 98; s. c. 13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 753). But the defect here is, that there is nothing like the agreement in that case. A paper was ordered to be served on the occupier, which, perhaps, was a declaration in ejectment, and probably the premises were taken under it. But all that was shewn was that the mortgagor of the entirety remained in possession of part of the premises, and the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee does not make a tenancy at will; for it is clear from the learned note of Mr. Smith, in the case of Keech v. Hall (1 Smith's L.C. 290), that a mortgagor in possession is not a tenant at will to the mortgagee.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The act is decisive, for section 7, which enacts, that where a person is in possession or in receipt of the profits of land, as tenant at will, the right of the person entitled, subject thereto, to enter or bring an action to recover the land, shall be deemed to have first accrued at the determination of the tenancy or expiration of one year from its commencement, expressly provides that no mortgagor shall be deemed to be tenant at will, within the meaning of the section, to his mortgagee; and by section 10. mere entry is not to be deemed possession. Therefore, assuming that if the statute were out of the way, this would be the same case as that of an entry on a tenant at will, or an entry by a landlord for a forfeiture; and, as in the cases put in Co. Litt. 15a, 15b, 252b, the entry on part would be an entry on the whole, still the statute says, that this shall not be so in the case of mortgagor and mortgagee; and that where there is no special contract to the contrary, then, unless there has been possession of the land or receipt of interest within twenty years, the mortgagee is barred. As to the case of Locke v. Matthews (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 98; s. c. 13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 753), that case was rightly decided on the facts; there was evidence of a tenancy at will of a house and land, and of an agreement whereby part of the land was given up, and the tenant was to remain in possession of the house and residue of the land as tenant at will, and the question was, whether the time was to run from the tenancy of the whole or of the residue, and as it was clear that there was a new tenancy, the Court held that the latter was the case. As to the declaration in ejectment, its utmost effect is that of an entry; and a mere entry, by section 10, has no effect; the judgment does not give possession unless it be executed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The mortgagee was not in possession; and the statute says an entry is not possession; nor was he in receipt of the rents; therefore there is nothing to displace the statute.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—It is plain that the defendant is entitled to keep the verdict. The land was mortgaged in 1836, to secure a debt, and the mortgagor remained in possession, but not as tenant. An action of ejectment was afterwards brought, and the mortgagee took possession of most of the land. This was all that was proved at the trial. The mortgagee may have taken what he did as an equivalent of his debt, and left the rest of the property in the power of the mortgagor. The statute is a defence to the action.

Rule discharged.

Arbitration—Action on Award—Order of Reference.

ARBITRATION, REFERENCE AND AWARD.—By a Judge's order, made by consent of both the plaintiff and the defendant, an action of trespass and other matters in difference were referred, and, by the like consent, the parties were ordered to perform the award of the arbitrator. Afterwards an indorsement was made on the order by both parties agreeing that the arbitrator should have power to order what the parties, or either of them, should do to prevent a repetition of the trespass complained of. The arbitrator, by his award, ordered a wall to be built by the defendant:—Held, that the Judge's order and indorsement embodied an agreement by the parties to do what the arbitrator should so order, and that an action lay for its breach in not building the wall as ordered.

The case of Hookpayton v. Bussell (10 Exch. Rep. 24; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 267) distinguished.

Declaration, that before and at the time of the order hereinafter mentioned the plaintiff had commenced an action in this court against the defendant, and the declaration had been delivered, containing various counts in trespass for alleged trespasses by the defendant upon land of the plaintiff adjoining land of the defendant, and also for a certain trespass alleged to have been committed by the defendant, by pulling down, removing and destroying a certain fence which separated the said land of the plaintiff from the said land of the defendant, and which fence belonged to the plaintiff and the defendant as tenants in common. That thereupon, by an order, made in the said action, by one of the Judges of this Court, with the consent of the plaintiff and the defendant, it was ordered that the action, and all matters in difference between the parties, should be referred to the award of J. W, so as he should make and publish his award, &c.; and by the like consent, the Judge did further order that the said parties should in all things abide by, perform, fulfil and keep such award so to be made as aforesaid; that J. W, in pursuance of the order, took upon himself the reference; that by an indorsement on the said order, under the hands of the plaintiff and the defendant, it was agreed between them that the arbitrator should have power to order what the parties, or either of them, should do to prevent a continuance or repetition of the injuries complained of; that the arbitrator duly made and published his award in writing respecting the matters referred to; and thereby, with reference to the authority given to him by the said indorsement on the order under the hands of the plaintiff and the defendant to order and determine what he should think fit to be done by either of the parties to prevent a continuance or repetition of the injuries complained of in the declaration, and for the settlement of all matters in difference between the parties as aforesaid, the arbitrator, amongst other things, did order, determine and direct that the defendant should forthwith erect, or cause to be erected, in a good and workmanlike manner, a continuous wall of brick of the uniform thickness of nine inches, set in good lime mortar, so as to divide the premises of the defendant, which adjoined the premises of the plaintiff, referred to in the declaration, from the premises of the plaintiff, and such wall to be built in a certain line, &c. Breach, that the defendant built the wall, but it was not built in a good and workmanlike manner, and was not a continuous wall of brick, and not of the uniform thickness, &c.

C. Crompton, in support of the demurrer.—The question is, whether an action will lie for not performing an award made pursuant to a Judge's order. It is submitted that the order, though made by consent, gives no such right of action. The proper remedy to enforce the award would be by attachment, whereas this action would raise an inconvenient question for the jury to determine, whether the award has been performed, and that it would be particularly so in this case, where the award is not simply to pay a sum of money, but to do a certain work, namely, to build a wall of a certain thickness, and according to other particularities. The declaration states, it is true, that the Judge's order was made by consent, but that consent would only give the Judge jurisdiction to make the order, and there is no agreement averred to have been made between the parties to perform the award, for the breach of which agreement an action might have been brought. Without, however, such an agreement, it is submitted no such action as this will lie. It was expressly held by the Court of Exchequer in Hookpayton v. Bussell (10 Exch. Rep. 24; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 267) that an action does not lie for disobedience to a Judge's order, whether made by consent or not. In that case, the defendant having been arrested in respect of a debt, from which he was protected by an order of the Insolvent Court, applied for his discharge to a Judge at chambers, when the following order was made: "Upon hearing the attorneys or agents on both sides, I do order that, upon payment by the defendant of 5*l.* forthwith, the defendant be discharged, the defendant hereby undertaking to pay the rest of the debt and costs." And it was held that a declaration for breach of this agreement was bad, although it stated that the order was made with the consent of the plaintiff and the defendant. The Court of Exchequer in that case, on being referred to what was said by Mr. Justice Parke in Wentworth v. Bullen (9 B. & C. 840; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 33), to the effect that, where a Judge's order is made by consent, and is founded on a binding agreement, an action will lie on such agreement stated, that that was only a dictum, and that it did not meet with assent.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—In the notes to Williams's Saunders, vol. 2, p. 62 b, it is said, "so assumpsit will lie upon a submission by rule of Nisi Prius—5 East, Bonner v. Charlton. So on a submission by a Judge's order—4 Camp. 19, Still v. Halford."]]

The case of The Thames Iron-Works and Ship-Building Company v. the Patent Derrick Company (1 J. & H. 93; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 714) was one in which Vice Chancellor Wood decided that a Judge's order made by consent, whereby it was ordered that proceedings in an action should be stayed upon certain conditions, does not amount to an agreement to perform those conditions, and that a bill for a specific performance would not lie.

Holker, contra, was not heard.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. The declaration sets out an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, and a Judge's order to refer such action, and all matters in difference, and it states that such order was made by mutual consent, and that, by the like consent, it was ordered that the parties should abide by and perform the award. There was then an agreement that the cause and all matters in difference should be referred, and that the award should be performed; and, besides this, there was the Judge's order, for disobeying which an attachment would lie. Afterwards, on a meeting before the arbitrator, an indorsement was made by mutual consent on the Judge's order, giving the arbitrator power to order what the parties, or either of them, should do to prevent a continuance or repetition of what had been complained of. Now, I am of opinion that that indorsement, being on an agreement to refer, and to abide by and perform the award of the arbitrator, constituted an agreement that the arbitrator, should have power to order what should be done, and that the parties should perform what he should order. I am therefore of opinion that the action lies. It is said that such an action is inconvenient, and that an attachment would be the proper remedy. I think that an action in which damages may be recovered for not performing the award, is a more convenient remedy than an attachment and the putting a party in prison for disobedience. But Mr. Crompton says that no action will lie; and certainly the case of Hookpayton v. Bussell (10 Exch. Rep. 24; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 267), in terms, supports his argument; but I think when that case is looked at it will be found that the order there did not contain an agreement to perform the order. The defendant by the order in that case "consenting that, in default of payment of either of the said instalments, the plaintiff be at liberty to issue execution by feri facias or capias ad satisfaciendum." That was all the defendant there consented to, which is very different from an agreement to do anything. The other case which was cited, of The Thames Iron-Works, &c. Company v. the Patent Derrick Company (1 J. & H. 93; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 714), in like manner provided a particular penalty in case the defendants made default in performing the terms of the order. The judgments were right in both those cases, though they were expressed in terms wider than was necessary; and I must say that the opinion of Mr. Justice Parke, in Wentworth v. Bullen (9 B. & C. 840; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 33), is perfectly sound where he says, "But in considering the terms of this order, I am inclined to think there is evidence of a mutual agreement between the parties upon good consideration to forego the action for charging the plaintiff in execution for too much." "Now, though there is no remedy for disobedience of a Judge's order as such by one of the parties against another by action, but by attachment merely; yet if it be made by the consent of both and is founded on a binding agreement, an action will not the less lie upon that agreement, though it have also the additional sanction of a Judge's order. The contract of the parties is not the less a contract and subject to the incidents of a contract, because there is superadded the command of the Judge."

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. There are many authorities to shew that an order of reference by consent implies an agreement to perform the award. We were much pressed by the argument of the inconvenience which might arise where an action was brought in a case like the present, if the action should be again referred, and so a series of actions created. But if an action should be improperly brought, and there should be such an abuse of the process of the Court as has been suggested, I have no doubt there is power in the Court to provide a remedy for it.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I think the action will lie on an agreement embodied in the Judge's order. Here the particular agreement was not in the order but indorsed on it, and apparently without the Judge's consent; but it was an agreement between the parties, and for the breach of it an action would lie at common law. Then, how is that right of action ousted? It is said it is because the parties impliedly promise not to bring an action, and that the only remedy should be by attachment. Now, I do not think that there is any such implied promise; neither do I feel pressed by the argument as to inconvenience. It seems to me that where an act is to be done, as was here, to build a wall, the performance of that can be better ascertained by a jury or another arbitrator than by the Court on affidavits. With regard to authority, the cases are strong to shew that we are not deciding anything as law for the first time. There are the cases I have already referred to in the notes to 2 Wms. Saund. 62b, and also the case of Wharton v. King (1 Moo. & R. 96), where the precise point was taken which has been now contended for, and overruled by Lord Tenterden.

HAZELGROVE v. HOUSE.

35 L. J. Q.B. 1.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed under Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.—Release in general Terms restrained by the Words of the whole Deed.

BANKRUPTCY.—In a trust deed, expressed to be made between a debtor and his creditors, the debtor covenanted to pay his creditors a composition upon the amount of their respective debts. The creditors, in consideration of the covenant, &c., released the debtor "from all cause and causes of action and suit, contracts, damages, claims and demands whatsoever, which they then had, or at any time or times thereafter should or might have or be entitled to against the debtor, by reason or on account of any debt or debts, sum or sums of money, bills, bonds, notes, securities for money, contracts, provisoes, agreements, reckonings, accounts, dealings, or transactions whatsoever, from the beginning of the world to the date of the deed":—Held, that the release must be restrained by the words of the whole instrument, and would apply only so as to relieve the debtor from debts and provable claims which had accrued at the time of the execution of the deed; and therefore that the deed was not unreasonable.

Declaration on a guarantie for the price of goods sold by the plaintiff to one Richard House, with the common count on accounts stated.

Sixth plea to the declaration, except as to the costs of the action up to the pleading of the plea—That after the commencement of the action (the defendant being indebted to divers persons, and unable to pay his debts in full) a deed was made and executed by the defendant, and the following is a copy thereof, excluding certain schedules, (that is to say)—This indenture, made the 12th day of April, 1865, between John House, of Thornton Road, in Bradford, in the county of York, boilermaker, of the first part; Richard Lord and Thomas Robertshaw, both of Thornton Road, in Bradford aforesaid, engineers, of the second part; and all the several creditors of the said John House of the third part: Whereas the said John House is unable to pay his creditors the full amount of their respective debts, and hath proposed to his creditors to pay them a composition of five shillings in the pound, and to secure the distribution amongst them of the sum of 160*l.* as hereinafter mentioned, which they have agreed to accept and take upon the amount, and in full satisfaction of, their respective debts, in the manner and at the times hereinafter mentioned: Now this indenture witnesseth that, in consideration of the premises and of the release hereinafter contained, the said John House doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant and agree with each and every of the several creditors of him, the said John House, their respective executors and administrators, in manner following, (that is to say)—That he, the said John House, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall and will, on the 24th day of April instant, pay or cause to be paid to them, the several creditors of him, the said John House, respectively, or their respective executors, administrators or assigns, the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound upon the amount of their respective debts, and that he, the said John House, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall and will, on the 24th day of July next, pay or cause to be paid to them, the several creditors of him, the said John House, respectively, or their respective executors, administrators or assigns, the further sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound upon the amount of their respective debts, without any deduction whatsoever.—Then followed a covenant by the trustees, in consideration of the assignment thereafter contained, to pay to the creditors such a dividend or sum of money upon the amount of their respective debts as the sum of 160*l.* would pay and realize if divided rateably and proportionably amongst all of them, and a mortgage to the trustees by the debtor of certain goods and effects specified in a schedule to the deed for securing to them the said sum of 160*l.*—The deed then witnessed that, in pursuance of the said recited agreement, and in consideration of the covenants thereinbefore contained, and of the premises, they the said several persons and corporations, parties thereto of the third part, for and on behalf of themselves and their several and respective partners, did, and each and every of them did, by those presents absolutely remise, release, and for ever quit claim unto the said John House, his heirs, executors and administrators, all and all manner of action and actions, suit and suits, cause and causes of action and suit, contracts, damages, claims and demands whatsoever, which the said parties to the deed of the third part, or any or either of them, either alone or jointly with their respective partners, or which they or either of their respective partners then had, or which they or either or any of them, or any or either of their respective partners, the respective heirs, executors or administrators of them or their respective partners at any time or times thereafter could, should, or might have or be entitled to, from, upon, or against the said John House, his heirs, executors, or administrators, by reason or on account of any debt or debts, sum or sums of money, bills, bonds, notes, securities for money, contracts, provisoes, agreements, reckonings; accounts, dealings, or transactions whatsoever, owing for, or made upon, or entered into by the said John House to or with them the said parties to the deed of the third part respectively, either alone or jointly with their respective partners, or transacted, done, or pending between them respectively from the beginning of the world to the day of the date of the deed, save and except the covenants and agreements therein contained.—The deed concluded with a proviso that it should not operate unless executed, or in writing assented to by the statutory majority of creditors. The plea alleged compliance with the formal requirements of the statute as to registration, &c., and that the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and became and was bound by the deed.

Mellish (Waddy with him), in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. The release contained in the deed relied upon by the defendant is expressed in terms so wide that it makes the deed itself unreasonable. Those bound by the deed lose the benefit of all contracts, claims and demands which they now have or hereafter may have against the debtor. It is admitted that the case of Payler v. Homersham (4 M. & S. 423) may be somewhat opposed to this view. There, in an action on a bond, a release, in which the plaintiff had joined, was pleaded, by which the defendant was released from all claims which the parties then had or thereafter might have against him. It was held, that a replication that the money secured by the bond was not included, or meant to be included, in the sum set opposite to the plaintiff's name or in the release, was good. In the argument, a case of Knight v. Cole (1 Show. 150) was cited, where Lord Holt declared that the general words of a release could only be limited where the releasor was an executor, and afterwards brought his action in a different right. Lord Ellenborough, it is true, dissented from this opinion, saying that the general words of a release may be restrained by the particular recital, and that to construe an instrument truly you must have regard to all its parts and its particular words. But it is submitted that the view of Lord Holt was the more correct one. By the 153rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the damages arising from a breach of contract may be proved in bankruptcy, though it has been decided that the breach must precede the bankruptcy. But in this case the debtor obtains greater relief than in bankruptcy, for he is released now or hereafter from all claims arising out of "contracts."

[LUSH, J.—This deed can only affect creditors, and not those who are merely parties to contracts with the debtor.]

The answer to that is, that a debt may be due to a creditor, and he may also have a claim under an executory contract.

[LUSH, J.—The release must then be taken to apply to the debt, and not to the claim under the contract.]

Quain, for the defendant.—The deed appears to be made with creditors only, and not with those whose claims are unliquidated. The composition is to be paid on the amount of their respective debts. (He was then stopped.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—The defendant is entitled to judgment. The release, when qualified by the particular language of the deed, is not unreasonable. The word "contracts" is the only part of the instrument upon which the argument of Mr. Mellish is founded. He has urged that that word might embrace contracts broken after the date of the deed, from the consequences of which the debtor ought not to be protected. But the answer to that, as pointed out by my Brother Lush, is, that the deed is made between the defendant and his creditors, a class to which such contractors would not belong.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied that we ought to hold that the release is restrained and confined by what appears in the rest of the deed.

SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Judgment for the defendant.

BUVELOT v. MILLS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 3; L. R. 1 Q.B. 104; 13 L. T. 321; 14 W. R. 98.

Referred to, Hickmott v. Simmons, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Ch. 580; L. R. 2 Eq. 462 (M.R.).

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.)—Composition Deed—Composition payable to Scheduled Creditors only—Equitable Plea.

BANKRUPTCY.—A debtor executed a deed expressed to be made between himself, of the first part, and the several persons whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed and set, being severally creditors in their own right, or partners or agents or attornies of creditors, and all other persons being creditors of the debtor, of the second part. The deed recited an agreement to pay the parties to the deed of the second part a composition of 5s. in the pound on the amount of their respective debts, and contained a covenant by the debtor to pay them the several sums of money placed opposite to their respective names in the third column of the schedule to the deed, being the amount of the composition of 5s. in the pound. And it was declared that until failure in the performance of the contract for payment of the composition the debtor should not be sued for or by reason or on account of the debts specified in the second column of the schedule. The defendant (the debtor), not knowing that his acceptance had been indorsed to the plaintiff, did not insert him or the amount of his claim in the schedule:—Held, that the deed could not be pleaded as an equitable defence to an action by the plaintiff, as by the words of the covenant for payment, and those of the covenant not to sue, the right to a composition was expressly limited to scheduled creditors; and that the description of the sums of money to be paid was material and could not be rejected.

Quære—Whether in order to give effect to an equitable plea, promissory notes or other paper securities can be brought into court.

Declaration against the defendant as the acceptor of a bill of exchange indorsed to the plaintiff.

Plea, for defence on equitable grounds, that after the drawing and accepting of the bill of exchange in the declaration mentioned, and after the bill had been indorsed to the plaintiff as in the declaration mentioned, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons, and thereupon the deed, hereinafter particularly set forth, bearing date the 9th of November, 1864, was made and entered into by and between the defendant (the person therein named Henry Mills) of the first part, and the several persons whose names and seals were thereto subscribed and set, being severally creditors in their own right, or in copartnership, or being agents or attornies of creditors of the said Henry Mills, and all other persons being creditors of the said Henry Mills of the second part, which said deed, with the schedule thereto annexed, was and is in the words and figures following, that is to say:

This indenture, made the 9th of November, 1864, between Henry Mills, of the Radnor Tavern, Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, licensed victualler, of the first part, and the several persons whose names and seals are hereunto subscribed and set, being severally creditors in their own right, or in copartnership, or being agents or attornies of creditors of the said Henry Mills (and all other persons being creditors of the said Henry Mills) of the second part:

Whereas the said Henry Mills being indebted to the said several parties hereto of the second part respectively, and being unable to pay his debts in full, proposed to pay to the said persons a composition of 5s. in the pound on their said respective debts, in the manner and upon the terms hereinafter expressed, which proposal was accepted by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the said creditors whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, as appears by the respective hands and seals of such majority signed and set in the first and fourth columns of the schedule hereinafter written :

Now, this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the premises, he, the said Henry Mills, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, doth hereby covenant with the said persons parties hereto of the second part, and each of them, their and each of their executors, administrators and assigns, in manner following, that is to say, first, that he, the said Henry Mills, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, shall and will pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said persons respectively, their respective executors, administrators, or assigns, the several sums of money placed opposite to the respective names of the said persons in the third column of the said schedule, being the amount of the said composition of 5*s.* in the pound, which same several sums shall be paid without any deduction whatsoever, by two equal instalments of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound in manner following, namely, the first of such instalments at the expiration of three calendar months from the day of the date hereof, and the second of such instalments at the expiration of six months from the day of the date hereof; and, secondly, that he, the said Henry Mills, shall and will forthwith make and deliver to the said persons respectively, their respective executors, administrators and assigns, his promissory notes payable at three calendar months and six calendar months from the day of the date hereof for the amount of the said several instalments. And it is hereby declared, that until the said Henry Mills, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, shall fail to perform the covenant hereinbefore on his part contained, the said persons parties hereto of the second part respectively, their respective heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, shall not commence or bring any action, suit, or proceeding at law or in equity against, or make any claim or demand upon or in anywise molest the said Henry Mills, his heirs, executors or administrators, or his or their estate or effects for or by reason or on account of the said debts specified in the second column of the said schedule. Provided always, and it is hereby declared, that nothing herein contained shall make void, invalidate, or prejudicially affect any mortgage, charge, lien, security, or right which any of the said persons, parties hereto of the second part, have upon or affecting any specific property of the said Henry Mills for or in respect of any of the said debts specified in the second column of the said schedule, or any bond, bill, note, or liability given or payable by or affecting any person or persons other than the said Henry Mills for or in respect of any of the same debts, so that every such mortgage, charge, lien, security, or right, so far as the same concerns the property comprised therein or subject thereto, but not as concerns the said Henry Mills personally, and every such bond, bill, note or liability, so far as the same concerns any person or persons other than the said Henry Mills, but not as concerns the said Henry Mills, shall and may remain available both at law and in equity, in as ample a manner as if these presents had not been made.

At the foot of the deed was written a schedule of the names of creditors, with the amount of their debts. The plaintiff's name, however, was not included amongst them.

The plea, after alleging that the deed had been assented to by the statutory majority of creditors, and shewing compliance with the formal requirements of the trust-deed sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, stated that at the time of the execution of the deed the bill of exchange had been, though unknown to the defendant, indorsed to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was then, though unknown to the defendant, a creditor of the defendant in respect of the claim therein pleaded to, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and by reason of the defendant being, as he was, till the commencement of this suit wholly ignorant of the indorsement of the bill to the plaintiff, and wholly ignorant who the holder of the bill then was, and wholly ignorant of the plaintiff being a creditor of the defendant, or who was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the bill, the defendant was unable to insert the amount of the bill opposite the name of the plaintiff or opposite the name of any creditor in the second column of the schedule, and was unable to tender the deed to the plaintiff for the insertion of the amount or for execution, and was unable to tender to the plaintiff the promissory notes in the deed mentioned; and the defendant, after he discovered that the plaintiff was the holder of the bill, was at all times ready and willing to tender and offer, and within a reasonable time after the commencement of this suit tendered and offered to the plaintiff, the deed for subscription and execution by the plaintiff, and that the amount of the bill should be placed opposite to the name of the plaintiff in the second column of the schedule, and to give the plaintiff the promissory notes; but the plaintiff wholly refused to subscribe his name to the deed and to execute the same, or to allow of the amount of the bill being placed opposite to his name in the second column of the schedule, or to receive the promissory notes. And all conditions having been performed and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became and was, and is, bound by the deed as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder in demurrer.

(Replication, that the plaintiff never executed or assented to the deed, and the debt sued for never was specified in the second column of the said schedule.

Demurrer to the replication, and joinder in demurrer.)

J. Brown, for the plaintiff.—The plea is bad, since the debtor only covenants to pay a composition to his scheduled creditors, and the name of the plaintiff is not included in the schedule.

[SHEE, J.—There is a contract with all his creditors. May not the words “the sums of money placed opposite the names of the persons in the third column of the schedule” be rejected as falsa demonstratio?]

They are express words of limitation. Even if the covenant does include the plaintiff, it has not been performed, and he is at liberty to sue.

Macnamara, for the defendant.—The plea is good, as the covenant is to pay the composition to the whole of the creditors, and is for their benefit. The allusion to the sums placed opposite to their names in the schedule is simply to define the amount to be paid, which is only a matter of calculation. In the case of Clapham v. Atkinson, in the Exchequer Chamber (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49), it was objected, that the deed was made only with the creditors executing it; but it was said by Williams, J. that this objection must fail, for all the creditors had the option of coming in and signing.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If the debt of a creditor had been inaccurately stated in the schedule, could he have sued for a larger amount?]

Undoubtedly, if the argument that the words “in the schedule” are mere matter of description, is a valid one. In Harrhy v. Wall (1 B. & Ald. 103) a composition-deed expressed to be made with the creditors, whose names were subscribed and debts set against their names, had been placed before a creditor. He executed the deed, but did not insert the amount of his debt. It was held, that he could maintain no action for his original debt, as his execution was good for whatever might be the amount of his debt. There the creditor signed: here he is in the same position as if he had. It is a fraud on the other creditors for the plaintiff to sue—Chitty on Contracts, 7th edit., 615. In Reeves v. Lambert (4 B. & C. 214) the acceptor of a bill in passing through the Insolvent Court described in his schedule the drawer as the holder of the bill, though it had previously been indorsed to the plaintiff. It was held, that the insolvent had sufficiently described his debt, and had a good defence to an action by the plaintiff. Whitmore v. Turquand (3 De Gex, F. & J. 107; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 345) decided that where a composition was made payable to those who signed the deed within a certain time, this condition would not exclude creditors who afterwards assented to the deed.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Clapham v. Atkinson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49) cannot apply here, for the creditor would be in no better position by signing, as his debt could not be scheduled after the deed became operative.]

The question remains, is the reference to the schedule material? Then as to the covenant not to sue. It is true that in Ray v. Jones (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 416; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306) it was held that such a covenant was no defence to an action at law. But, as was suggested in that case, it may be good as an equitable plea.

J. Brown, in reply.—The covenant not to sue cannot be pleaded as an equitable plea, as in this case. Equity would only grant an injunction upon the condition that the promissory notes were delivered to the plaintiff. In Wood v. the Copper Miners' Company (17 Com. B. Rep. 561; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 166), Wodehouse v. Farebrother (5 El. & B. 277; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 18), and The Mines Royal Society v. Magnay (10 Exch. Rep. 489; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 7), it was held, that an equitable plea is no defence where the Court of Chancery would only grant an injunction upon terms and conditions which Courts of law have no power of enforcing. According to the practice of the Courts of Westminster, money only, and not paper securities, can be brought into court.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—What is your authority for that proposition? I do not think that such a difficulty as that would induce us to give judgment for the plaintiff.]

At all events, the objections to the form of the deed cannot be got over. If a creditor, who is not scheduled, is entitled to the composition, other creditors may find the calculations which, perhaps, induced them to sign, altogether deranged. Lastly, the covenant not to sue is expressly made on account of the debts specified in the schedule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the plea is bad, and that there should be judgment for the plaintiff. It is impossible to avoid seeing that the acceptance in question was not taken into account by the debtor when the deed was drawn up. He seems to have altogether forgotten and lost sight of it. The words of the covenant to pay the composition refer solely, as it appears to me, to debts enumerated in the schedule. It is as follows: "That the debtor shall and will pay or cause to be paid unto said persons respectively, their respective executors, administrators and assigns, the several sums of money placed opposite to the respective names of the said persons in the third column of the said schedule, being the amount of the said composition." So that debts only are referred to the amount of which is ascertained. Now, it seems to me that the covenant cannot apply to debts not comprised in the schedule, and that no provision is made for the plaintiff. But, in order to make one of these deeds binding upon creditors who are not parties to it, except by the act of parliament, it ought, I think, to provide for all creditors, assenting or not. Inasmuch, therefore, as no arrangement is made for the case of every debt, and even if the plaintiff had been willing to take the composition, he could not have insisted upon it under this covenant, I think that the deed, so far as this action is concerned, is inoperative.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that although this was the conclusion at which I arrived, after the reading of the deed, yet the ingenious argument of Mr. Macnamara induced me to think that the words "sums of money set opposite the names in the third column of the said schedule," were mere erroneous description. But I now think that we have no right to reject them, and that they bind the parties to the deed. I cannot help thinking that if the covenant not to sue be contrasted with that for the payment of the composition, it will be found to be quite impossible to read the letter as Mr. Macnamara had proposed. I am, therefore, of opinion, on the ground that the deed ought to be no bar against a creditor for whom it makes no provision, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole title of the plaintiff to a composition rests upon the covenant for payment. It is true that here in the recital it is stated that there had been an agreement that the composition should be paid to the creditors upon the amount of their debts. But by the covenant, which is the effective part of the deed, the debtor has only to pay the amounts entered in the schedule. Now, if the schedule were incorporated in terms with the covenant, it would be an engagement to pay to a class of persons certain fixed sums. And I do not see how we can reject any part of this engagement, so as to enlarge the number of persons to be paid, or to increase the amount which they are to receive. The fact that the reservation of remedies against sureties is in respect of debts specified in the schedule, shews that the limitation was not accidental. The result of this is, that the benefit of the covenant is limited to those who are mentioned in it, and the plaintiff, not having the necessary qualification, is excluded. The plea is, therefore, no defence to the action.

BOND AND ANOTHER v. WESTON.

35 L. J. Q.B. 7; L. R. 1 Q.B. 169.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.)—Deed of Inspectorship—Reasonable Clauses—Release not restrained by Covenant not to sue.

BANKRUPTCY.—A deed of inspectorship is not unreasonable because it contains such provisions as the following: That a resolution signed by the majority in number and value of the creditors, parties to the deed or bound by it, shall be binding on all persons parties to the deed or bound by it, and effectual for the allowance and passing of the accounts of the trustees and for discharging them from the trusts of the deed, and all claims and demands in respect of it.—That in case the trustees appointed by the deed, or any of them, or any trustee to be appointed as mentioned afterwards, should die or should refuse or decline or become incapable to act in the matters and things intrusted to them by the deed, a majority in number and value of the creditors present at a meeting convened by circular, sent by any creditor of the debtor by post or otherwise, might nominate or choose such other person or persons as they should think fit to be trustee or trustees in the place of any such trustee or trustees.

A deed of inspectorship contained, in different parts of the instrument, a general release of the debtor from all claims, &c. (except under the provisions of the deed), and a covenant by the creditors not to sue the debtor for a limited time in respect of any debt or demand provable under the deed, and that if any of them did so the deed should operate and have the effect of an order of discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and be pleadable in bar to every such action:—Held, that the release was not restrained by the covenant not to sue.

Declaration on a promissory note, with the common counts.

The defendant pleaded a plea, puis darrein continuance, setting out a deed of inspectorship, to which he and all his creditors were parties.

The plaintiff demurred to the plea, and the defendant joined in demurrer.

The following are the only parts of the deed which are material for the purposes of this case: Proviso, that any resolution signed by the majority in number and value of the creditors, parties hereto or bound hereby, shall be binding on all the several parties hereto or bound hereby, and shall be effectual for the allowance and passing of the accounts of the said trustees and for discharging them from the trusts hereof, and from all claims and demands in respect thereof. That in case the said trustees hereby appointed, or any or either of them, or any trustee to be appointed as hereinafter mentioned, shall die, or shall refuse, or decline, or become incapable to act in the matters and things hereby intrusted to them as aforesaid, then and in every such case the major part in number and value of the creditors of the said Edward Weston present at a meeting convened by circular sent by any creditor of the said Edward Weston, by the post or otherwise, may nominate and choose such other person or persons as they shall think fit to be a trustee or trustees in the place or stead of such of the said trustees who shall so die, or refuse, or decline, or become incapable to act as aforesaid.

The deed also contained in its earlier part a covenant by the creditors that they would not until the 17th of April, 1866, or such enlarged time as in the deed mentioned, sue, arrest, prosecute, impede or molest the said Edward Weston in the management of his trade, business or affairs under the control and inspection provided, nor seize nor possess themselves or himself of, or attach or intermeddle with the goods, chattels, estates, property or effects of the said Edward Weston or the hereditaments, tenements, goods, chattels, effects and premises hereinbefore conveyed and assigned, or any part thereof, in respect of any debt or demand provable under these presents; and that in case any of them, or any person bound by the deed, or the executors, administrators, partners or principals, or any of them, should act contrary to the agreement lastly hereinbefore contained, these presents and the provisions herein contained should operate and have the same effect as an order of discharge of the said Edward Weston would have under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in case the said Edward Weston had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and that in every such case these presents might be pleaded in bar to all and every such debts, claims, demands, actions, suits and proceedings in like manner and with the same effect as such order of discharge might be pleaded and used, in case the said Edward Weston had been adjudicated a bankrupt, in respect of any of the said debts, claims and demands of the person or persons who, or whose partners or principals, should act contrary to the said agreement, and had obtained his discharge under the said adjudication. The deed concluded with a release of the said Edward Weston "from all manner of debt and debts, sum and sums of money, bills, bonds and notes, accounts, reckonings, judgments, executions, actions, suits, claims, and demands whatsoever, which they, the releasing parties, or any or either of them, or any or either of their partner or partners, then had or thereafter might have against the said Edward Weston, his heirs, executors, or administrators, for or in respect of any debt, transaction, matter, or thing up to the day of the date hereof, save and except under the provisions in the deed contained, or the rights thereby reserved to them the said releasing parties, or any of them."

Hannen, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad, as the deed upon which it relies ought not to bind a dissenting creditor. The principal objections to the deed are the powers given to the inspectors and the mode of appointing fresh trustees. The proviso, that in case of the death of a trustee, or his refusal to act, or incapacity, the major part in number and value of the creditors present at a meeting convened by circular, sent by any creditor, may nominate and choose another as they think fit, and that the trustees so appointed are to be indemnified from the consequences of all transactions and engagements connected with the business of the estate, is unreasonable. The statutory majority of creditors ought not to be allowed to delegate their powers to a smaller number.

[LUSH, J.—The proviso does not say a majority of the assenting creditors. Any creditor would be at liberty to attend the meeting.]

Again, the clause providing that a resolution, signed by the majority in number and value of the creditors parties to the deed, shall be binding and effectual for the passing of the accounts, is unreasonable. Any one creditor ought to be at liberty to question the accounts.

[LUSH, J.—It is a majority of the creditors bound by the deed—that is, of the whole creditors.]

The deed provides that it shall operate and have the effect of an order of discharge in bankruptcy. But it also contains a general release by the creditors. These provisions are contradictory unless their effect is to restrain the release.

[Field, for the plaintiff, pointed out that the release excepted claims under the provisions of the deed.]

That does not reconcile the words of the deed.

Field and Macnamara, in support of the plea, were not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the clauses which have been noticed by Mr. Hannen cannot cause any inconvenience. The release is not inconsistent with the clause providing that the deed shall have the effect of an order of discharge in bankruptcy. This clause was probably introduced for the better protection of the debtor. As to the powers for appointing new trustees and dealing with the accounts, they are necessary for the effectual working of the deed.

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

THE EUROPEAN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY v. WESTALL.

35 L. J. Q.B. 9; 6 B. & S. 970; L. R. 1 Q.B. 167; 14 W. R. 177.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192)
—Deed of Assignment by Partnership Firm—Separate Creditor.

BANKRUPTCY.—In an action against a shareholder for calls, the defendant pleaded, as an equitable defence, that he, jointly with two others, all members of the same partnership firm, executed a deed, by which they conveyed to trustees all their estate and effects absolutely, to be applied and administered for the benefit of their creditors "as if they had been at the date of the deed duly adjudged bankrupts." The deed (which was set out in the plea) contained no clause of release. The plea alleged that the deed had been duly assented to by the statutory majority of creditors of the debtors, and that the formal requirements of the Bankruptcy Act, s. 192, had been complied with:—Held, that the plea was bad, as the deed upon the face of it could operate only for the benefit of the partnership creditors, and could not therefore avail the defendant in an action by a separate creditor.

Declaration for calls payable by the defendant as a shareholder in the company of the plaintiffs.

Third plea, for a defence on equitable grounds, that after the accruing of the alleged causes of action, and after the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, commenced and took effect, to wit, on the 21st day of October, 1864, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs and divers other persons respectively, and thereupon an indenture was made in the words and figures following, that is to say, "This deed, made the 21st day of October, 1864, between William Bury Westall, Jonathan Westall and James Bury Westall, all of White Ash Mills, near Church, in the county of Lancaster, cotton manufacturers and co-partners, and also carrying on business in the city of Manchester, as merchants and commission agents and co-partners, under the style or firm of Westall Brothers, of the one part; Lewin Barned Mozley, of Liverpool, in the said county of Lancaster, banker, R. C. Richards, of Kirkham, in the said county, cotton-spinner, and John George Thomas Child, of Manchester aforesaid, accountant, on behalf and with the assent of the undersigned creditors of the said William Bury Westall, Jonathan Westall and James Bury Westall, of the other part; witnesseth, that the said William Bury Westall, Jonathan Westall and James Bury Westall hereby convey all their estate and effects to the said Lewin Barned Mozley, R. C. Richards and John George Thomas Child, absolutely, to be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the said William Bury Westall, Jonathan Westall and James Bury Westall, in like manner as if the said William Bury Westall, Jonathan Westall and James Bury Westall, had been at the date hereof duly adjudged bankrupts. In witness whereof, the said parties hereto have set their hands and seals the day and year first above written."—Averment of compliance with the formal requirements of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192, as to registration, &c., and that the plaintiffs, before and when the said deed was made, were creditors of the defendant in respect of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and had had due notice of the deed, and been requested to execute the same, and might and could have executed the same had they been so minded, and still might execute the same, and the deed was in full force and effect, and all things on the defendant's part had been done and happened to render the deed as valid, effectual and binding upon the plaintiff as if they had been parties to and had actually executed the same; whereby and by force of the said deed, and according to the form and effect of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the defendant had been and was released and discharged from the alleged causes of action and this action.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

Rew, in support of the demurrer.—It has been already decided that a plea, such as the one in question, is not good at law. In Clarke v. Williams (3 Hurl. & C. 508; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 60) it was argued that the plea might be good by way of accord and satisfaction; but the Court gave judgment against it, saying that the only way in which a deed of this kind could be pleaded as a bar would be by shewing that the statute had given it that effect and operation.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose that a debtor conveys the whole of his estate, and that each creditor is bound as if he had actually signed, will not equity restrain an action by a creditor?]

No; equity will only interfere if the creditor has actually signed. Again, by the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, no process is to be available against the person or property of a debtor who has executed a valid deed, without the leave of the Court, that is, of the Court of Bankruptcy. Equity would therefore refuse to interfere, on the ground that the estate was under the control of the Court of Bankruptcy. In The Ipstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (2 Hurl. & C. 828; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 193) it was held, that the only remedy of a debtor who has executed a deed according to the form given in schedule D. to the last bankruptcy act, is to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy to stay proceedings—and the case of Eyre v. Archer (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 638; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 296) is to the same effect.

[LUSH, J.—How could the Court of Bankruptcy interfere to protect a debtor who had executed one of these deeds?]

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 1, the Court of Bankruptcy shall have and exercise for the purposes of the act all the powers and authorities of the superior Courts of law and equity. This confers upon the Court of Bankruptcy the power which the Lord Chancellor possessed of restraining a creditor who had elected to prove. If the legislature did not intend that the statutory form of deed should be pleaded as a bar, it cannot be made to have that effect by setting it up as an equitable defence. Moreover, this is a deed by partners, who assign their joint estate to be administered as in bankruptcy. No provision is therefore made for the plaintiffs, who appear to be a separate creditor. The consequence is, that the deed is not within the words of section 192. of the late act, as it is not on the face of it a deed for the benefit of all the creditors of the defendant—Walter v. Adcock (2 Ves. & B. 253). The deed is expressed to be between the firm and a trustee on behalf of the undersigned creditors. But it does not appear that any of the creditors have signed. They have only assented in writing.

C. H. Hopwood, in support of the plea, was requested to confine his argument to the question, whether the deed provided for all the creditors of the defendant, or only the partnership creditors.—The plea shews that the defendant has surrendered the whole of his property for the benefit of his creditors, and that a majority of the creditors of every description have assented to it; under these circumstances, the plaintiffs are bound by the deed, and are in the position of creditors who have proved, and therefore equity would restrain this action. In Ex parte Woolley (2 Ves. & B. 253) the Lord Chancellor declared that a creditor who had proved thereby relinquished his action. In Ex parte Diack (2 Mont. & Ayr. 675) it was said that the Court of Review would issue a perpetual injunction to restrain an action by a creditor who had proved; and in Ex parte Glover (1 Glyn & J. 270) the Vice Chancellor stayed proceedings at law by a creditor who had applied to prove. In Walker v. Neville (3 Hurl. & C. 403; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73), where a deed executed by a partnership firm was pleaded, and the plea stated that a majority of the creditors and each of them assented, it was held that this was a sufficient averment that a majority of each class, that is, of the joint creditors and the separate creditors, had assented. If it be necessary, the defendant will ask leave to amend his plea in accordance with this decision.

Rew, in reply.—The words “each of them,” upon which the Court of Exchequer relied in the case of Walker v. Neville (3 Hurl. & C. 403; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73), make all the difference, for they shewed that provision was made for the separate creditors. This is not a case for amendment, as the objection is one to the form of the deed.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose the firm had six joint creditors and each member twenty separate creditors, could the creditors of one member prevent the composition from taking effect?]

That shews the nature of the objection.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The plea certainly cannot be supported. The deed which it sets up deals with a class of creditors to which the plaintiffs do not belong, and they would have no right to execute the deed.

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J., and LUSH, J., concurred.

Debtor and Creditor—Trust Deed—Effect of Order for Payment of Debt under Garnishee Sections of Common Law Procedure Act, 1854—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 184, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, ss. 192, 197.

ATTACHMENT. BANKRUPTCY.—In an action, by the plaintiffs, as trustees under a deed of assignment, according to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192, for non-payment of money due to the assignor, the defendant pleaded that by a garnishee order, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, he was directed forthwith to pay to secured judgment creditors of the assignor the amount of the debt; that the order was served on the defendant before he had notice of the trust-deed, and that, in order to avoid execution being levied upon him, he paid to the judgment creditors the amount of the debt, and was thereby discharged from the claim of the assignor and of the plaintiffs:—Held, that the plea was bad, as it did not shew that the payment to the judgment creditors was made before notice of the deed. That the plaintiffs, according to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 197, were entitled, as against third persons, to the rights and powers of assignees in bankruptcy, including those given by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 184; and that their title was therefore to be preferred to that of a judgment creditor, founded only upon an order for payment of a debt under the garnishee clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which had not been complied with at the date of the registration of the deed.

Semle—That payment, under the Judge's order, even before notice of the registration of the deed, would have afforded no defence.

Declaration—by the plaintiffs—(trustees on behalf of the creditors of Randal Stap, a debtor, under a deed or instrument made and entered into between the said Randal Stap and certain of his creditors and the plaintiffs, as trustees as aforesaid, relating to the debts and liabilities of the said Randal Stap, and his release therefrom, according to the clauses of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, relating to trust-deeds for benefit of creditors, and under which said deed or instrument, all things necessary in that behalf having happened and been done, all the property comprised in the said deed or instrument, including the causes of action hereinafter mentioned, were and are vested in the plaintiffs as such trustees as aforesaid)—against the defendant, as clerk to the local board of health for the district of the township of Darlington, upon a deed made between the local board and Randal Stap, by which Stap, in consideration of the sum of 8,610*l.*, to be paid to him by the local board, covenanted to do certain work for them according to certain plans and specifications, with power for the architect of the board to direct alterations or additions to the works, the difference to be added to or deducted from the sum of 8,610*l.*; and the local board agreed to pay to Stap the sum of 8,610*l.* by instalments, the balance (less 350*l.*) to be paid on completion of the works, the said sum of 350*l.* to be kept in hand by the board until six months after the completion of the works to meet contingencies. Averment—That Stap performed the said works contracted for, and certain additions and alterations thereto, under the directions of the architect; and that the sum to be paid to him for the works amounted to 9,884*l.* 13*s.* 10½*d.*, and that all conditions were performed and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs, as such trustees, to receive payment from the local board of the balance of the sum of 9,884*l.* 13*s.* 10½*d.* Breach—That the local board, although they had paid to the said Randal Stap the sum of 9,282*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, part of the sum of 9,884*l.* 13*s.* 10½*d.*, had not paid the residue of the sum of 9,884*l.* 13*s.* 10½*d.*, or any part thereof, and the same remained due and unpaid.

The declaration also contained the common counts for work done and materials provided, and money paid by and money due on accounts stated with Randal Stap before the making of the deed.

Fourth plea, as to so much of the first count as relates to 171*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* (other than 80*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* paid into court), that after Randal Stap had performed the works, additions, and alterations in the first count mentioned, and there was due and payable to him in respect thereof by the local board, over and above the 350*l.* so to be kept in hand as in that count mentioned, a sum of money far exceeding the sum of 171*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* in the introductory part of the plea mentioned, certain creditors of Stap, named William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, obtained two judgments against him, for the sums of 67*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* and 104*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* respectively, and by two orders of Shee, J., dated the 25th of August and the 27th of August, 1864, respectively, all debts owing or accruing from the local board to Randal Stap were attached, to answer the said judgment debts; and it was also ordered by the same orders that the local board, their attornies or agents, should attend before the said Judge, to shew cause why they should not pay to the said William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, so much of the debt due to Randal Stap as might be sufficient to satisfy the judgment debts. The plea went on to state that the orders were duly served upon the defendant and the local board on the 26th and 29th of August, 1864, respectively, and the local board not knowing of any cause to shew why they should not pay the two sums of 67*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* and 104*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*, or either of them, to the said William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, and not knowing of the trust-deed, or that the causes of action in the declaration mentioned had been assigned, did not, nor did the attornies or agents, appear before the said Judge, or upon either of the orders or the summons to attend (therein contained), and thereupon, by two other orders of the said Judge, bearing date respectively the 2nd of September, 1864, and the 7th of September, 1864, the said Judge ordered that the local board should forthwith pay to the said William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, so being such judgment creditors, the said debt due from the local board to Randal Stap, or so much thereof as was sufficient to pay the respective judgment debts of 67*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* and 104*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*, and that in default thereof execution might issue for the same, each of which last-mentioned orders was thereupon, on the 13th of September, 1864, and before the defendant or the local board had any notice or knowledge of the trust-deed served upon the defendant and the said local board, and payment of the judgment debts, amounting to the said sum of 171*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, was demanded under the orders by and on behalf of the said William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, and the local board, in compliance with the orders, and in order to avoid executions for the same being levied on their goods and chattels, and because they could not otherwise have avoided such executions for the sums so ordered to be paid as aforesaid, paid the same to the said William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, as such judgment creditors as aforesaid, and were thereby discharged from all claims of Randal Stap, and of the plaintiffs, as such trustees as aforesaid, in respect of the sum of 171*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* in the introductory part of this plea mentioned, being the amount of the judgment debts so paid as aforesaid.

Seventh plea, to the money counts, so far as the same relate to 171*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* (other than the sum of 80*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* paid into court.) This was a special plea of payment, repeating the facts stated in the fourth plea.

Replication to the fourth and seventh pleas—That the deed or instrument in the declaration mentioned to have been made between Randal Stap and his creditors was registered according to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, before payment by the said local board to the said William Russell the elder, William Russell the younger, and Simeon Russell, or the said sums of money or either of them, or any part thereof, in the said fourth and seventh pleas, or either of them, mentioned.

Demurrer to the replication, and joinder in demurrer.

Rew, in support of the demurrer.—The replication is bad. The pleadings, which are rather intricate, shew that the defendants paid the money in order to avoid execution being levied upon them.

[MELLOR, J.—Ought you not to have averred that the money was paid before the registration of the deed?]

By the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 61, a Judge may, upon an ex parte application, at once order debts due to the judgment debtor to be attached.

[LUSH, J.—The plea does not say that when you paid the judgment creditor you had no notice of the deed.]

The payment would be a good defence even if made after notice of the deed, though it cannot be assumed that the defendants knew of the deed when they paid the money.

[LUSH, J.—Suppose that there had been an actual bankruptcy. It has been held that, if an act of bankruptcy is committed between the seizure and sale under an execution; payment after notice of the proceeds of the sale to the judgment creditor cannot be justified—Notley v. Buck (8 B. & C. 160). Now, by section 197, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, trustees such as the plaintiffs are to have all the rights of assignees in bankruptcy.]

The order is absolute, and must be obeyed. It is not conditional, like that in Holmes v. Tutton (5 El. & B. 65; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 346). The defendants are stated to have paid the money in order to avoid execution being levied upon them. It might be different if they had had time in order to inquire whether the deed was valid.

Warton (Barnard with him), in support of the replication.—The plaintiffs rely upon the case of Holmes v. Tutton (5 El. & B. 65; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 346). There debts owing to the judgment debtor were attached under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854; ss. 61, 62, and 63. On the day when the order was served, but after service, the judgment debtor signed a declaration of insolvency, and was next day adjudicated bankrupt. It was held, that although the defendant was bound so that the garnishee could not pay the original creditor or any one claiming under him, yet the binding must be considered as subject to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts for the distribution of property; and Lord Campbell, in his judgment, says, that the expression “bind” in the garnishee clauses has no stronger effect than the operation of a common law judgment. Magrath v. Hardy (4 Bing. N.C. 782; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 299) strongly resembles this case. There, in an action for money had and received, there was a plea of payment under an attachment in the Lord Mayor’s Court. A replication that there was no execution executed was held good, as the custom set up in the plea provided that after execution executed the garnishee should be discharged as against the judgment debtor. In Westoby v. Day (2 El. & B. 605; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 418) payment in the Mayor’s Court by the garnishee, who had notice before the proceedings that the defendant, or judgment debtor, had parted with his interest in the debt, was held not to be justifiable. And in the late case of Tilbury v. Brown (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 46), where an order under section 63. directed the garnishee to pay to the plaintiff the debts due to the defendant, subject to an award for ascertaining their amount, and an award was made, but before payment of the sum awarded the defendant became bankrupt, Crompton, J. held, that there was no distinction for this purpose between orders under sections 61. and 63, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the money. These cases shew that the effect of a conditional order is not under these circumstances different from that of an order absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I think that the plea is bad, and that our judgment must be in favour of the plaintiffs, although Mr. Rew has supported his view of the case with much ingenuity. The facts as disclosed by the pleadings appear to be these: The defendant, as clerk to a local board of health, was indebted to the judgment debtor. The judgment creditor obtained the usual garnishee order, attaching debts due from the defendant. In the interval between the order nisi and the order for execution to issue, everything was completed necessary to make the plaintiffs trustees under a deed duly registered within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The defendant avers that the order was made absolute and served upon him before he had notice of the trust-deed; but he omits to aver that when he paid the money he had no notice of the deed. And I am certainly disposed to think it essential, in order to make this a good plea, that notice or want of notice at the time of payment should be averred. Therefore, if there is any distinction between payment before and after notice, we must take it that payment was made after notice of the deed. Now I have come to the conclusion that the words of the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861—[His Lordship read the section]—are wide enough to shew that trustees under a deed such as this (if valid) are placed in the same position as assignees under an ordinary bankruptcy. This has the effect of making provisions as to acts of bankruptcy apply to the administration under a trust-deed. Therefore, as the payment was after notice of the registration, it is not sufficient to say that it was made in order to avoid execution under the garnishee order. I do not think, as the defendant's counsel contended, that the order bound the defendant personally; I think that he is absolved by payment to the judgment debtor. It may be that the debt was not payable out of any particular fund, but the defendant could have applied to a Judge at chambers to have execution stayed. It is a hardship which often arises in cases of bankruptcy, and we must give effect to the bankrupt law where the order of attachment is absolute, in the same way as where it is only an order nisi.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plea does not allege that the defendant did not have notice of the registration of the deed till after payment. Can such a plea under any circumstances be good? I think that it does not shew a complete defence to the action; for I am disposed to think that the effect of the act of parliament is to place trustees on the same footing as assignees in bankruptcy. As, therefore, the title of the trustees was completed before the payment, the discharge from claims by the judgment debtor, which the plaintiffs allege that they have obtained, cannot avail them in this action. The 197th section of the last act provides that trustees shall have the same powers as against third persons as assignees in bankruptcy. This makes the decisions in Holmes v. Tutton (5 El. & B. 65; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 346) and Tilbury v. Brown (2 El. & B. 605; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 418) authorities in favour of the plaintiffs, whom I think entitled to recover.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plea, in my judgment, is bad, because it does not aver a legal obligation to pay the money to a third person. It has been held that if bankruptcy intervenes before the garnishee has paid under the order, the judgment creditor must come in with the other creditors. Now, the 197th section of the last Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is in these words:—[His Lordship read the section]. The effect of this section is, therefore, to give the plaintiffs the rights of creditors' assignees under a bankruptcy. Now the defendant's plea does not shew that payment was made under a garnishee summons prior to the registration of the deed, that is, prior to what, in the present instance, is equivalent to a bankruptcy. It has been contended that payment after registration, without notice of the deed, would be good. I should be inclined to decide against that proposition, but it is not necessary to consider it in order to give judgment against the defendant.

JENNINGS v. THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Q.B. 15; L. R. 1 Q.B. 7; 12 Jur. N.S. 331; 13 L. T. 254; 14 W. R. 28.

Carriers by Railway—By-Law—Refusal to shew Ticket.

CARRIERS.—Where a by-law of a railway company imposes certain duties on passengers, and lays correlative duties on the company, the company must have strictly complied with the by-law on their part to entitle them to enforce it against the passenger.

A by-law provided that no passenger would be allowed to travel upon the railway without having first paid his fare and obtained a ticket, and that each passenger, on payment of his fare, would be furnished with a ticket, which ticket such passenger was to shew and deliver up when required by the guard or other authorized servant. A passenger, having three servants with him, paid his own and their fares, and was furnished with four tickets, for a certain train. He took his seat, with the tickets in his possession, in one part of the train, and the servants entered another part. The train was divided into two parts by the company, and the servants were thus separated from their master. The part of the train in which the master was seated was first despatched, and before leaving he shewed the tickets for himself and servants. Afterwards, when the second part of the train was about to be despatched, a duly authorized servant of the company demanded the tickets of the passenger's servants, which they were unable to shew, and, thereupon, were not allowed to travel by the train, which was despatched without them:—Held, that the company could not justify their refusal to carry the servants, inasmuch as the company had given the tickets to the master, and by the division of the train separated him from his servants.

This was an action brought to recover damages from the defendants, as common carriers, for the unlawful detention of the plaintiff's servants and horses. The first count of the declaration was for not carrying certain race-horses which the defendants had received from the plaintiff for carriage from Lincoln to Peterborough, by a certain train, for which they were received, by reason whereof the horses arrived by a later train, and were separated from the plaintiff and his servants. And the second count of the declaration alleged that the defendants were carriers of passengers by trains from Lincoln station to Peterborough station, for reward to the defendants in that behalf, and that thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff paid to the defendants, at their request, a certain reward for the carriage of himself and certain servants of the plaintiff, by a certain train from Lincoln to Peterborough, and, at the request of the defendants, he himself became a passenger, and at the request of the defendants, caused his servants to become passengers, to be carried by the said train from Lincoln to Peterborough, for the said reward, the defendants promised the plaintiff to carry him and his servants by the said train from Lincoln to Peterborough, and all things were done and happened to entitle the plaintiff to have the defendants carry his servants as aforesaid; yet the defendants did not nor would carry his said servants; but wholly refused so to do, whereby the plaintiff lost the services of his servants, and alleging further damage. The third count was for an assault upon Charles Salmon his servant and imprisonment of him, whereby the plaintiff lost his services. And the fourth count was for wrongfully preventing certain servants of the plaintiff travelling by the railway.

The defendants pleaded, fifthly, to the second count, that by one of the by-laws of the said company, duly made under and by virtue of an act of parliament before the making of the promise in the second count mentioned, and of which the plaintiff had due notice, it was ordered as follows: "No passenger will be allowed to enter any carriage used on the railway, or to travel therein upon the railway, without having first paid his fare, and obtained a ticket. Each passenger, on payment of his fare, will be furnished with a ticket, specifying the class of carriage and the distance for which the fare has been paid, which ticket such passenger is to shew when required by the guard in charge of the train, and to deliver up before leaving the company's premises, upon demand, to the guard or any other servant of the company duly authorized to collect tickets." And the defendants further say, that the said servants of the plaintiff had not obtained tickets, and could not produce the same pursuant to the said by-laws, wherefore the defendants refused to carry the said servants. And for the seventh plea, the defendants, as to the third count, say, that the said Charles Salmon was unlawfully in the said railway train (being a railway train of the defendants), and could not produce or shew a ticket, pursuant to the said by-law, and refused to leave the said train when requested so to do, wherefore the defendants, by their servants in that behalf, gently laid their hands on the said Charles Salmon, and removed him from the said railway train, doing no unnecessary damage and using no unnecessary violence. And for a ninth plea the defendants, as to the fourth count, say, that the conveyance in that count mentioned was the conveyance of the defendants, and that they were lawfully possessed thereof, and because the said servants of the plaintiff were unlawfully, and without the consent of the defendants, about to enter the said conveyance, and were not lawfully entitled to travel as passengers therein, the defendants prevented their travelling by the said conveyance, and compelled them to quit the same, as they lawfully might, for the cause aforesaid.

The plaintiff was a trainer and owner of race-horses, and being about to leave Lincoln, on the last day of the races there, on the 25th of February, 1865, for Peterborough and Newmarket, took a ticket for himself, first class, and for three stable-boys, third class, and for three horses, by the 6 o'clock p.m. train. The boys were to travel with the horses in the horse-box, according to the usual practice permitted by the company, when third-class tickets for them had been previously taken. When the train was about to start, it was found that it was too long and too heavy, and it became necessary to divide it into two trains. The first division containing the passengers, amongst whom was the plaintiff, was despatched a few minutes after 6 o'clock; the latter division, containing the horse-boxes and the boys, started at 6.35 p.m. The plaintiff had taken his seat in the train before the division was made, and had in his possession the tickets for the boys, and shewed them, along with his own, to the ticket examiner, before his part of the train started; and when the latter division of the train was about to start, the company's servant, duly authorized, called upon the plaintiff's boys, amongst the other occupants of the horse-boxes, to shew their tickets. They said their master had them; but this the company's servant refused to believe, and they were accordingly refused permission to go by the train, which, thereupon, started without them, and they were left behind at Lincoln.

The action was tried, before Erle, C.J., at the Summer Assizes for Cambridge, when the jury found that there was a contract by the defendants to carry the plaintiff and his servants and horses by the 6 o'clock train, and that the defendants had broken that contract. The plaintiff had a verdict for 5*l.* 12*s.*, but the learned Judge gave the defendants leave to move to set aside that verdict, and to enter a verdict for them on the fifth plea, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict on the fifth plea, and that there was evidence upon which the jury should have found for the defendants.

Keane (Markby with him) now moved for a rule pursuant to the above leave. (They also moved to have the verdict set aside, and entered for them on the seventh and ninth pleas, and on the further grounds that the verdict was against evidence, and of the misdirection of the learned Judge. The argument, however, only turned on the second count and fifth plea.)—The defendants were justified under their by-law in refusing to allow the plaintiff's servants to go with the horse-boxes in the second part of the train. They did not produce their tickets when called upon by a person duly authorized. In Woodard v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 196) a similar by-law was enforced.

[SHEE, J.—The by-law only applies where the company furnishes each passenger with a ticket; it does not apply where they furnish tickets for several persons to one passenger.—COCKBURN, C.J.—You must make out a contract by which the stable-boys are always to have the ticket ready to be produced; here the contract was that the master should take and keep the tickets and the boys to travel with the horses in the horse-box.]

It must be admitted that the fare of the boys was paid, and a ticket provided for them; but it is submitted that it was the duty of the master to have handed the tickets over to the boys, so that they could have produced them when required.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Was it not the duty of the company's servant to go to the master for the tickets under the circumstances? The company by dividing the train put it out of their power to inquire of the master.]

No doubt, if the train had not been divided, the present difficulty would not have arisen; but since it has arisen, the company are entitled to stand upon their by-law. Because a by-law is not always enforced by the company, it is no reason that they should entirely lose their power of putting it in force—Rhymney Valley Company (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 482, per the Master of the Rolls).

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think there should be no rule. It is unnecessary to determine whether, if the company had delivered a ticket to each stable-boy himself, and he had not produced his ticket when demanded, they could have turned him out of the train. I decide on the ground that the by-law is a by-law for the protection of the company, and if they seek to enforce it, they must keep themselves in a condition to enforce it; they have not done so, because they gave the tickets to the master for the boys, and the boys were to go by the same train. But the company unfortunately broke their contract in not sending the boys with their master. It was a misfortune that the master and boys were separated, but neither are the boys or the master to be responsible for that; and the company have failed to bring themselves within the by-law, in that they have not given a ticket to each person.

Ejectment—Limitation Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 2.—Encroachment—Possession for less than Twenty Years—Devisable Interest—Estoppel.

EJECTMENT. ESTOPPEL.—The mere possession of land for less than twenty years confers upon the possessor a prima facie heritable and devisable interest in fee therein good against all the world, but the true owner of the soil, and the devisee in fee of such possessor, may maintain ejectment against any person whose title is founded merely on subsequent adverse possession for less than twenty years.

Semble—Where a widow takes under a devise durante viduitate, with remainder to another in fee, and marries, her husband, who enters after the marriage into possession of the same land and continues to occupy it with her, is estopped from denying the title of the devisor to the land.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover possession of a cottage and garden, tried, at the Bedfordshire last Lent Assizes, before Cockburn, C.J., when a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, with leave for the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him as to the whole or part of the land in dispute.

The plaintiff, Rebecca Asher, was the wife of the co-plaintiff John Asher, and was heir-at-law to Mary Ann Williamson. Mary Ann Williamson was the daughter of Thomas Williamson. Thomas Williamson in 1842 inclosed a piece of land from the waste of the manor¹ adjoining the highway at Keysoe, in Bedfordshire. About 1850 he built a cottage upon it and took in another piece adjoining. He lived in this cottage and occupied the land until 1860, when he died. He left a will, by which he devised the cottage and land to his wife durante viduitate, and after her death or second marriage, which should first happen, to his only child, Mary Ann Williamson, in fee. The widow continued to occupy the cottage and land after the testator's death, and the daughter lived with her. The widow subsequently married the defendant in April, 1861, who thereupon went to live in the cottage and had since continued to live there. The daughter lived in the cottage with them till she died, in February, 1863, being then eighteen years of age. Her mother, the defendant's wife, died in May, 1863.

Merewether, on a previous day, had obtained a rule, pursuant to the leave reserved at the trial, calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict obtained for them should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant instead thereof, on the ground that no title in the plaintiff, Rebecca Asher, was shewn to either portion of the land inclosed. Against this rule

Markby now shewed cause.—Upon this rule the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the whole of the land, if he can shew that he is entitled to either portion. The only difference as to the rights respectively affecting them is, that as to the parcel first inclosed the owner of the soil is barred by twenty years' possession (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 2), and as to the latter he may yet come in. The defendant relies on his possessory title, and the question is, whether a person dying in possession of land to which his only title is possession for less than twenty years, has any power to choose his successor, or whether the succession must be left to chance. Doe d. Pritchard v. Jauncey (8 Car. & P. 99) is an authority in favour of the plaintiffs. In that case the father inclosed a piece of land, occupied it for seventeen years, and then died intestate. The widow occupied it for twenty-nine years after his death, conveyed it in fee to the defendant, and died. The lessor of the plaintiff was the son of the person who inclosed it, and the jury found that the widow occupied it by his assent, and the plaintiff as heir-at-law was held entitled to recover from the defendant, notwithstanding that his ancestor's title was founded only on seventeen years' possession of the land before his death. The ruling, it is true, in that case, was only at Nisi Prius; but it has never been questioned.

(1) There was some evidence at the trial of the ownership of the manor, which Markby, for the plaintiffs, objected to as insufficient, but Cockburn, C.J. ruled to be sufficient for that purpose; but no mention was made of this in the argument.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It is clear that under the old law of disseisin the disseisor during his lifetime might be entered upon by the disseisee; but upon the death of the disseisor such right of entry was tolled, and the disseisee was put to his writ of right against the heir of the disseisor. Applying that to the present case, there would seem to be a heritable right, and if there is a heritable right, there would therefore be a devisable one.]

Just so. Doe d. Carter v. Barnard (13 Q.B. Rep. 945; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 306) is consistent with this view. There the plaintiff was nonsuited. Her title was founded on her husband's possession of the land for eighteen years before and up to his death, and her own possession for thirteen years subsequent to that event and until a short time before the action. The defendant had entered as mortgagee of the owner of the land, whose title was said to be barred by being kept out of possession during the possession of the husband, and the lessor of the plaintiff after him. It was, no doubt, there held that the lessor of the plaintiff could not recover, but that was because she could not tack her own possession on to her husband's so as to give her a title; and the reason given was, that she was unable in fact to connect her possession with that of her husband by descent, will or conveyance, and that when she proved the possession of her husband and that he died in possession leaving children, it was primâ facie evidence that the right in which she claimed had passed to his heir, against which her own possession for thirteen years could not prevail, and so she proved the title under which she claimed to be in another. This reasoning, therefore, shews that less than twenty years' interest confers a heritable and devisable title.

Next, the defendant was estopped in this case from denying the plaintiff's title. He took possession under the will, inasmuch as he entered and occupied by reason of his marriage with the widow of the devisor and of her previous possession thereunder, and therefore he cannot set up a title inconsistent with the will—Doe d. Willis v. Birchmore (9 Ad. & E. 662; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 108). He also referred to Andrews v. Hailes (2 El. & B. 349; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 409).

Merewether, in support of his rule.—The defendant is not estopped, inasmuch as he did not enter under the will, but upon his marriage with the widow he took independent possession of the cottage along with her in spite of the will. The daughter's title under the will accrued at the moment of the marriage, and she might have claimed, and therefore his entry into the cottage afterwards was in spite of her.

[SHEE, J.—The daughter was living in the house with them: was there not, therefore, continued possession under the will?]

She went to live with them, but did not take possession under the will, and the defendant's possession was independent of her.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The widow kept actual possession after the marriage, as she had before it. Her possession was rightful before, but became wrong after. She was estopped at the time of her marriage, and she would not be the less estopped after marriage has put an end to her estate. The husband got actual possession with her; then how can he be less estopped than she was?]

It is submitted that the husband did not get possession with the wife, but independently of her and the will.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There was nothing to disconnect the possession of the wife from that of the husband; and then, it seems to me, there is this dilemma, either the possession of the husband and the wife is not adverse to the devise in fee, and so there is a tenancy at will, and the husband is estopped, or it is adverse, and then we have it that a person in possession has died and devised the land to the daughter, through whom the plaintiff claims, which shews a better title than the defendant's.]

Next, the devisor must have had an exclusive right as against all the world to enter and possess the land at the time of his death in order to give him a devisable interest. It is submitted that if a person gets open possession of land (whether for one year or for nineteen years makes no difference), he cannot be ejected by a person who can only shew a right by prior possession for less than twenty years.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—So that a person who has entered for one year upon a prior and lawful possessor, except as against the real owner, for nineteen years, can, by keeping possession for that one year, at the end of the year bar both the real owner and the other person?]

Yes. Dixon v. Gayfere (No. 1) (17 Beav. 421; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 421) is relied upon by the defendant in support of the proposition that mere possession against the true owner for a period of less than twenty years confers no right to the land which the possessor can enforce against a person who subsequently gets into possession without title. The Master of the Rolls there puts the case of a series of trespassers, each adverse to one another and to the rightful owner, who take and keep possession of an estate in succession for various periods, each less than twenty years, but exceeding in the whole twenty years, and says that at law, no doubt, "if the legal estate could not be shewn to be in either of them, the last possessor—that is, the person actually in possession—would hold the property, not by reason of his own title, but by reason of the infirmity of the title of the claimants."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The decision in that case may be right in equity, but is wrong in law.]

In Doe d. Hughes v. Dyeball (Moo. & M. 346) the lessor of the plaintiff shewed only one year's possession, and that was deemed sufficient to support an ejectment against a person who had come in and turned him out.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The defendant is in a dilemma; either the possession was adverse to the devisee or it was not. If the possession was not adverse to the devisee under the devise of the inclosed land, then it was a continuance of the possession of the widow, which she should have given up upon her marriage; and in that case she and her husband both became tenants of the devisee, and estopped from denying her title. But if the possession was adverse to the rights of the devisee, then was that possession of such a nature as to operate to divest her right? In order to shew that her right is destroyed, Mr. Merewether must contend that once possession is acquired against the rightful owner, it does not operate to keep out the rest of the world, except the owner. I take it to be established by authority that possession is good against all the world except the person who can shew a better title than the one in possession. Doe v. Dyeball (Moo. & M. 346) shews that possession, even for a year, is sufficient against a mere subsequent possession. The whole law of disseisin was founded upon the principle that the disseisin gives title to the disseisor against all the world but the disseisee. Supposing the original possessor had been expelled by having a person take possession, and saying that he (the original possessor) had no right to take this land, and that he (the new comer) would take it from him, the man originally taking possession, if he were turned out, could have maintained ejectment; then how is the state of a devisee different from his? The devisor devises to his wife during her widowhood, and to the daughter in fee upon the marriage of the widow. The daughter, therefore, takes upon the latter event. The devisor had a right to devise that interest which the law gives him against all the world save the true owner. The defendant, however, intercepts the rights of the devisee, and gets into possession. The defendant and the widow take possession, but as they could not have interfered with the devisor's possession in his lifetime, so they could not with the daughter's in her lifetime. She dies, but her heir has the same right to recover that she had; therefore, I think, the action is well brought, and the plaintiff entitled to recover. The devisor, if he had been alive, might have brought ejectment, and as the right to take possession passed to the daughter, that right passes also to her heir, the defendant having acquired no right to possession. I think there should be no breaking in upon a sound salutary provision such as that which protects possession from disturbance. It is well known that encroachments on the waste of a manor have been made by poor people are permitted by the lord of the soil to occupy without interference; we cannot permit it to be asserted that, by law, it is in the power of any person who may so choose to deprive those left by the lord in possession.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Possession is primâ facie evidence of seisin in fee. The possession here is the possession of the disseisor. I quite agree with my Lord that it would be dangerous to allow every one to require a man to shew a possession for twenty years. The law gives credit to the first possession—Doe v. Dyeball (Moo. & M. 346). The person who takes, therefore, under the devisor need not shew a twenty years' possession; it is enough to shew simple possession. In Doe d. Carter v. Barnard (8 Car. & P. 99) the lessor of the plaintiff, in shewing her own title, shewed that some one else had a better title. Again, in an action of ejectment, no one claiming under a will need do more than shew the will and a receipt for rents, and need not shew a reception of rents for twenty years. The defendant, therefore, in this case, cannot set up a title against the heir-at-law of the daughter. I agree with my Lord on the importance of keeping up the protection to quiet possession.

Principal and Agent—Partners—Ostensible Principal—Liability of Principal for Acts of Agent.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—The principal in a business who holds out an agent to the world as ostensible principal, and carries on the business under the management of and in the name of such agent, is bound by all such acts and contracts of the agent as are incidental to the ordinary conduct of the business, and such liability as to the rest of the world cannot be restricted by any private arrangement between them.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff Edmunds, as one of the registered public officers of the Birmingham and Midland Banking Company, against Joseph Bushell and Charles Jones, to recover 184*l.* 7*s.*, for principal and interest due on a bill of exchange, dated the 1st of February, 1865, at four months, for 184*l.* 2*s.*, drawn by one Britten and accepted by "Bushell & Co.," and indorsed by Britten to one Taylor, and by Taylor, a customer of the bank, to the banking company. The writ of summons was indorsed according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855. The defendant Bushell did not appear to the writ, and judgment was accordingly signed by the plaintiff against him. The defendant Jones obtained leave to appear and defend the action, and pleaded a denial of the acceptance of the bill sued upon.

The action came on to be tried, at Croydon, at the last Summer Assizes, before Crampton, J.

It appeared that the defendant Jones was a straw-hat manufacturer at Luton, in Bedfordshire, and that he had a branch establishment in London, under the name of "Bushell & Co." Bushell was employed by Jones as his manager of the branch establishment, under an agreement made between them, and dated the 22nd of December, 1863; which agreement stated that,— "Whereas, for the considerations hereinafter mentioned, the said Joseph Bushell agrees with the said Charles Jones, that he, the said Joseph Bushell, shall and will henceforth be and so continue until this agreement shall be determined by either party, by notice as hereinafter mentioned, the manager of the said Charles Jones in the branch establishment of his trade and business of a straw hat and bonnet manufacturer, to be henceforth carried on by the said Charles Jones under the name or style of Bushell & Co., upon certain premises lately taken by him, and known as No. 36, Milk Street, Cheapside, London, and shall and will during the continuance of this agreement give up his whole time and attention to the same, in managing, conducting, superintending and improving the same, to the utmost of his power and ability; and also shall and will during the continuance of this agreement do and perform all such acts, matters or things in the said trade or business as the said Charles Jones shall from time to time direct; and also shall and will during the continuance of this agreement be just and faithful to the said Charles Jones in all his business dealings and transactions whatsoever, and shall and will keep such books of account as shall be necessary, wherein he shall fairly write and enter all monies received and paid, and all goods in the said trade which shall be bought or received, sold or delivered out, upon credit or otherwise, and the price and prices at which the same shall be bought or sold, and all other matters and accounts which shall be necessary to manifest the state of the said trade, which said books or book of account shall always remain and be kept in the usual place of carrying on the said trade; and shall and will, whenever the monies received by him in respect of the said trade or business shall exceed in amount the sum of 5*l.*, forthwith pay the same into the London and County Bank, London, to the credit of the said Charles Jones or otherwise, as he may from time to time direct. And in consideration of the agreement hereinbefore contained on the part of the said Joseph Bushell, he, the said Charles Jones, agrees that he shall and will, during the continuance of this agreement, find and provide the stock-in-trade and sufficient capital necessary for the due and proper carrying on of the said trade or business, and also shall and will pay to the said Joseph Bushell every quarter during the continuance of this agreement, or in the event of the determination of this agreement during the currency of any quarter than a proportionate part thereof, so much money by way of remuneration for his services as will amount or be equivalent to one-half part of the clear gains or profits arising from the said trade or business so to be carried on by the said Joseph Bushell as manager, after deducting the rent of the said premises, 5*l.* per centum per annum interest on the capital from time to time employed by the said Charles Jones therein, and all other debts or dues which shall be paid or payable in respect of the said trade or business, and also all losses and damages which shall happen to the said trade by reason of bad debts or otherwise. And it is hereby declared and agreed by and between the parties hereto, that it shall be lawful for either of them, the said Charles Jones or Joseph Bushell, at any time to determine this agreement, upon giving unto the other of them three calendar months' notice thereof in writing; and on the expiration of the said three months and the payment of what shall be due unto the said Joseph Bushell, every article, clause and agreement herein-before mentioned shall cease and be void, anything herein contained to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding."

Bushell's name was over the door of the branch establishment. Bushell had no authority from Jones to accept bills on his behalf. Prior to the acceptance sued on, it had been brought to the knowledge of Jones, in July, 1864, that bills had been accepted by Bushell for payment of goods supplied to him, and Jones then remonstrated with Bushell for accepting bills without authority, and Bushell promised Jones not to do so for the future.

The banking company when they took the bill had no knowledge of the defendants or their mode of carrying on business. The acceptance of the bill now sued on was in Bushell's handwriting. It did not appear whether any consideration had been given for the bill originally, but the banking company had given full consideration to Taylor, who indorsed the bill to them.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 185*l.* 17*s.*, with leave to the defendant Jones to move to set aside that verdict and to enter a verdict for himself, if there was no evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find a verdict for the plaintiff.

J. Brown now moved accordingly.—Jones is in the position of a person who has held out Bushell as a partner; but his liability cannot be more than that of a nominal partner. The plaintiff was a total stranger to Bushell & Co. He was the public officer of the bank, and took the bill in payment of a debt from Taylor, a customer of the bank. But a nominal partner's liability to the responsibilities of a real one is imposed, in order to prevent those persons being defrauded or deceived who may deal with the firm, of which he holds himself out a member, on the faith of his apparent responsibility; but where the person dealing with the firm has never heard of him as a component part of it, that reason no longer applies—Waugh v. Carver (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. (5th edit.), 818, 843). In Young v. Axtell (Ibid. 827), which was an action to recover 600*l.* and upwards for coals sold and delivered by the plaintiff, a coal-merchant, an agreement between the defendants was given in evidence, stating that the defendant, Mrs. Axtell, had lately carried on the coal-trade, and that the other defendant did the same; that Mrs. Axtell was to bring what customers she could into the business, and that the other was to pay her an annuity, and also 2*s.* for every chaldron that should be sold to those persons who had been her customers, or were of her recommending. The plaintiff also proved that bills were made out for goods sold to her customers in their joint names; and the question was, whether Mrs. Axtell was liable for the debt. Lord Mansfield said, "he should have rather thought that Mrs. Axtell would be liable, not on account of the annuity, but the other payment, as that would be increased in proportion as she increased the business. However, as she suffered her name to be used in the business, and held herself out as a partner, she was certainly liable, though the plaintiff did not at the time of dealing know that she was a partner, or that her name was used." But this ruling extends the nominal partner's liability too far. In Dickenson v. Valpy (10 B. & C. 140) Park, J. says, "If it could be proved that the defendant held himself out—not to all the world, for that is a loose expression—but to the plaintiff himself, or under such circumstances of publicity as to satisfy a jury that the plaintiff knew of it, and believed him to be a partner, he would be liable." So a man cannot be charged as a partner by one who when he contracted was in ignorance that the nominal partner's name had been used, and so no false impression could have existed on his mind at all—Carter v. Whalley (1 B. & Ad. 11).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The question here is one of agency, and not of nominal partnership. The defendant holds a man out in a position which gives him credit which he would not otherwise have obtained. He puts Bushell in a position to carry on the business as ostensible owner: does not that impliedly give him authority, as respects the world, to do all things ordinarily necessary to carry on that business?]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that there should be no rule. The defendant carries on business at Luton, in Bedfordshire, and also in London, but in London in the name of Bushell & Co. At the same time he employs Bushell as his manager, who became, therefore, his agent, but who was held out to all the world as a principal in London. The case, therefore, comes within the principle that if you employ a person as agent, in some particular agency which involves a peculiar authority, you cannot divest him of that authority as against the world by a private arrangement. Bushell therefore must have whatever authority is incidental to the character of a principal in such a business as the defendants'. It is incidental to the character of that business to accept bills to meet liabilities incurred in the course of it; therefore, Bushell cannot, as to the rest of the world, be deprived of that authority by a private arrangement between Jones and Bushell.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case differs from those where one member of a partnership holds out another as partner. Here the defendant Jones is owner of the business, and the question is, whether Bushell was allowed to appear to the world as a principal by the owner of the business. I think it would be dangerous to allow one person to carry on a business by and in the name of another, and at the same time permit him secretly to deprive that other of the authority necessary to carry on that business, and bind him as to the rest of the world.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The leave to move in this case is a special leave. I think there was reasonable evidence to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff, and by so holding, I do not think that we are in danger of discrediting the rule which requires that an agent through whom it is sought to make the principal liable must be shewn to have been held out by the principal as having such authority.

Rule refused.

Master and Servant—Negligence of Fellow Servant—Common Employment.

MASTER AND SERVANT.—The rule which exempts a master from liability to his servant for injury arising to such servant from the negligence of his fellow servant employed with him for a common object, is not confined to a common immediate object, but embraces all cases where the risk of injury from the negligence of the one is so much a natural and necessary consequence of the employment which the other accepts that it must be included in the risks which are to be considered in his wages.

A carpenter employed to do work for a railway company, and amongst other things paint a shed at their station, is so necessarily brought into contact with the traffic of the line that risk of injury from the carelessness of porters employed to turn carriages on the turn-tables on the line is naturally incident to such an employment and within the rule.

The facts of this case were shortly these: The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as their servant to do work as a carpenter and joiner on their station whilst the railway traffic was being carried on in it by the servants of the defendants. In the course of painting an engine-shed at the station the plaintiff got upon a ladder which was placed near to one of the turn-tables. The servants of the defendants who were engaged in shifting a carriage, allowed it to project so far beyond the turn-table that in turning it the end of the carriage struck against the ladder, and the plaintiff was thrown off and injured. Those who were shifting the carriage were guilty of negligence, and there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

At the trial the verdict in the action was directed for the defendants, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for 250l., on the ground that there was no common employment between the defendants' servants and the plaintiff, such as to exempt the defendants from liability.

The rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff was discharged by the Court of Queen's Bench.¹

Macnamara (Hughes with him), for the appellant, the plaintiff in the action.—The plaintiff would be entitled by the general rule to recover against the defendants for the injuries he has sustained if it were not for the exemption grafted on the general proposition that in the absence of personal negligence on the part of the master he is not liable for an injury sustained by one servant through the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in a common work or employment with him. The question in this case therefore is, whether the plaintiff and the servants employed 'in turning the carriage on the turn-table were engaged in a common work or employment. In order to define common work or employment, it is necessary to look for the reason of the exception, which is that the servant contracts with the master with reference to the risks he knows or expects to be involved in the service which he undertakes. If he suffers injury from one of the risks he could have known or contemplated on making the contract, he has no cause of action against his master, in the absence of personal negligence in the latter; but if his injury arises from a cause he could not have anticipated, he ought not to be deprived of his remedy against his master. In all the cases where the master has been held exonerated the servants have clearly been engaged in a common work. In Bartonshill Coal Company v. Reid (3 Macq. Scotch App. Cas. H.L. 295) Lord Cranworth says, "The driver and guard of a stage-coach, the steersman and rowers of a boat, the workman who draws the red hot iron from the forge and those who hammer it into shape, the engineman who conducts a train and the man who regulates the switches or the signals, are all engaged in a common work. And so in this case, the man who lets the miners down into the mine in order that they may work the coal, and afterwards brings them up together with the coal which they have dug, is certainly engaged in a common work with the miners themselves. They are all contributing directly to the common object of their common employer in bringing the coal to the surface." In The Bartonshill Coal Company v. M'Guire (3 Macq. Scotch App. Cas. H.L. 308) Lord Chelmsford said, "The Lords of Session in the case of Reid decided that Shearer and the deceased were not collaborateurs, because Shearer had the superintendence of the machinery for lowering and raising the men and the materials for the mine. A superintendence which took his duties altogether from common employment with the men below, and the deceased's business was to excavate coal from the pit, a line of business entirely different from that of the engineman. But, my Lords, it appears to me that the deceased and Shearer were engaged in one common operation, that of getting coals from the pit. The miners could not perform their part unless they were lowered to their work, nor could the end of their common labour be attained unless the coal which they got was raised to the pit's mouth, and, of course, at the close of their day's labour, the workmen must be lifted out of the mine. Every person who engaged in such an employment must have been perfectly aware that all this was incident to it, and that the service was necessarily accompanied with the danger that the person intrusted with the machinery might be occasionally negligent and fail in his duty." Lord Cranworth, at page 277 of Reid's case (3 Macq. Scotch App. Cas. H.L. 295), says, that a servant undertakes the service with reference to the risks he runs from fellow-servants "engaged with him in the common occupation," or, as the same learned Lord calls it in page 282, "common work." And at page 284 he says, "When the workman contracts to do work of any particular sort he knows, or ought to know, to what risk he is exposing himself; he knows if such be the nature of the risk that want of care on the part of a fellow-workman may be injurious or fatal to him, and that against such want of care his employer cannot by possibility protect him." Again, at page 293, after considering Gray v. Brassey (15 Court of Sess. Cas. 2nd ser. 135) and the judgment of the Lord President therein, his Lordship said, "He considered the question to turn on what is to be regarded as common service. He intimated that it is not enough that the servant injured and the servant causing the injury should be servants of the same master—they must be employed on the same work; and he observed, truly, that if a gentleman's coachman were to drive over his gamekeeper the master would be just as responsible as if the coachman had driven over a stranger. . . . The opinions thus enunciated are, I conceive, in strict accordance with the doctrine of the English cases."

(1) See the report of the argument and decision below, 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 260.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Do you say that the gamekeeper would have an action against his master, supposing that on the occasion of a shooting party, as he went in the drag with the party to the covers, the coachman who drove them drove so negligently that the gamekeeper was thrown out and driven over?]

On the cases, it is submitted, he would, unless he were a volunteer, or it was part of his employment.² In Maguire's case (3 Macq. Sc. Cas. 300)

(2) From the following case, which has occurred in America, it would seem that no action would lie in such a case as that put by the Lord Chief Baron. In Gilshannon v. the Stony Brook Railroad Corporation (10 Cush. Rep. 228) (1852), the plaintiff was a common labourer employed in repairing the defendants' road-bed, at a place several miles from his residence. Each morning and evening he rode with other labourers to and from the place of labour on the gravel train of the defendants. This was done with the consent of the company and for mutual

Lord Chelmsford, after referring to the prior cases on this subject, says, at page 307 of the report, "In the consideration of these cases it did not become necessary to define with any great precision what was meant by the words 'common service' or 'common employment,' and perhaps it might be difficult beforehand to suggest any exact definition of them. It is necessary, however, in each particular case to ascertain whether the servants are fellow-labourers on the same work, because, although a servant may be taken to have engaged to encounter all risks which are incident to the service which he undertakes, yet he cannot be expected to anticipate those which may happen to him on occasions foreign to his employment. Where servants, therefore, are engaged in different departments of duty, an injury committed by one servant upon the other by carelessness or negligence in the course of his peculiar work, is not within the exception, and the master's liability attaches in that case in the same manner as if the injured servant stood in no such relation to him." At page 311 of the same judgment he comments on M'Naughton v. the Caledonian Railway Company (19 Court. of Sess. Cas. 271), and says, that case "may be sustained without conflicting with the English authorities, on the ground that the workmen in that case were engaged in totally different departments of work; the deceased being a joiner or carpenter who, at the time of the accident, was engaged in repairing a railway carriage, and the persons by whose negligence his death was occasioned, the engine-driver and the person who arranged the switches." In M'Naughton v. the Caledonian Railway Company (19 Court of Sess. Cas. 271), M'Naughton was employed as a carpenter or joiner in repairing a railway carriage on a siding, and was killed by a collision caused by an engine driving violently into the siding, and the defendants were held liable. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary in the above case is given in Smith's Master and Servant, 2nd edit. 145: "It may be that the two persons, viz. the wrongdoer and the injured, though both at the time servants of one master, are engaged in different operations and in distinct departments of work. A dairymaid is bringing home milk from the farm, and is carelessly driven over by the coachman. A painter or slater is engaged at his work on the top of a high ladder, placed against the side of a country-house, and is injured by the carelessness of the gardener, who wheels his barrow against the ladder and upsets it. . . . In such and similar cases it could hardly be contended that the rule laid down in Priestly v. Fowler (3 Mee. & W. 1; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 42) would apply." It is submitted, therefore, in this case that whilst the carpenter may know the risks of bad scaffolding, the danger of tools and the risks he runs from the carelessness of other carpenters, he can know nothing of turn-tables, or when or how they should be used or the dangers attaching to them. The railway porters may know all about such matters, but the carpenter cannot be expected to know anything about them. Nor, in fact, is there anything in common between the work of a carpenter in or about the sheds or platform and that of the porters who are engaged in working the trains and attending to the passengers. Neither is the one work a continuance of the other, as in the case of the miners and the engineman employed to take them up and down the pit. The carpenter acts without and independently of the porter, and vice versa.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The railway is a large concern, and, for the purpose of convenience; no compensation being paid directly or indirectly by the labourers for the passage, and the company being under no contract to convey the labourers to and from their work. While thus on their way to their work on one occasion a collision took place with a hand car on the track, through the negligence of those having charge of the gravel-train, and he was thrown off and run over by the gravel-train, for which injury the action was brought; and it was held, that the defendants were not liable, and the nonsuit of the plaintiff stood. And Mr. Justice Dewey, in delivering judgment, says, "How does this case differ from that suggested at the argument of the counsel for the defendants, who supposed a case where the business for which the party is employed is that of cutting timber or standing wood, and the servant receives an injury in his person on the way to the timber lot by the overturning of the vehicle in which he is carried by the negligence or careless driving of another servant? There is no liability on the part of the master in such a case."

conducting its business, the carpenter's work and the iron work must be kept in good order.]

He referred to Priestly v. Fowler (3 Mee. & W. 1; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 42), Hutchinson v. the York, Newcastle and Berwick Railway Company (5 Exch. Rep. 343; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 296), Wigmore v. Jay (Ibid. 354; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 300), Waller v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (2 Hurl. & C. 102; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 205). In Holmes v. Clark (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 356; s. c. 2 Hurl. & C. 102) Mr. Justice Byles, in his judgment, asks—"Why may not the master be guilty of negligence by his manager or agent whose employment may be so distinct from that of the injured servant that they cannot with propriety be deemed fellow servants?" Scarle v. Lindsay (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 429; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 106) was an action by the third engineer of a steam-vessel against the owners for injuries he suffered when working at a winch, in consequence of the handle of the winch, by which the screw was worked, coming off through the want of a nut or pin to secure it, which the chief engineer ought to have seen in its place. He was nonsuited, and the nonsuit upheld; but there Mr. Justice Keating, in his judgment, lays stress upon the fact that the plaintiff was an engineer and knew the danger of working the winch in an imperfect state.

[BRAMWELL, B. referred to Wiggett v. Fox (11 Exch. Rep. 832; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 188). Your contention would narrow "common object" to common immediate object.]

ERLE, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court.—We think that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. The plaintiff was in the employ of the defendants to do the carpenter's work. The wrongdoers were porters in the employ of the defendants, and engaged in moving a carriage on a turn-table, and through their negligence in so doing, pulled down a ladder placed near to it and against a shed, upon which the plaintiff was standing at his work.

We think they were both engaged in a common employment. They were doing work in common, for the common object or purpose of managing the traffic of the railway. The illustration put during the argument, of the painter being employed in painting the turn-table, is apt. The master would not in that case, I think, be liable. We approve of the language of Mr. Justice Blackburn, in delivering his judgment in the Court below, where he says, "There are many cases where the immediate object on which the one servant is employed is very dissimilar from that on which the other is employed, and yet the risk of injury from the negligence of the one is so much a natural and necessary consequence of the employment which the other accepts, that it must be included in the risks which are to be considered in his wages. I think that whenever the employment is such as necessarily to bring the person accepting it into contact with the traffic of the line, risk of injury from carelessness of those managing that traffic is one of the risks necessarily and naturally incident to such an employment and within the rule." The cases upon this subject are very numerous, and have been closely examined. The present case is within the rule exempting the master from liability.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am only desirous to add, that it appears to me that if we were to decide this case in favour of the plaintiff, we should open the gates to a flood of litigation. In every large manufactory, where a number of workmen are employed in different departments of the same business, we should have it split up into any number of objects, although they all had the one common purpose. Thus, in one manufactory the making of screws would be called one object and the doing woodwork another, and so on; and then a person employed in a superior department would be said to have nothing to do with the porter in the same establishment.

Patent—Infringement—Novelty.

PATENT.—Letters patent were granted to W. for an alleged invention of fishes and fish-joints, for connecting the ends of rails used on railways. The fishes were made of iron, with a groove on the outer surface, for the purpose of preventing the square heads of the bolts passing through them and the rail from turning round, and also for the purpose of procuring greater strength with an equal weight of metal than could have been obtained from a fish of the same thickness throughout. Before these letters patent had been granted, grooved iron plates with bolts let into the grooves, had been used for the purpose of fastening timbers placed vertically upon one another, or placed horizontally side by side. In one case of a bridge, a channelled plate with bolts had been used for the purpose of fishing a scarf-joint where the ends of two timbers met together:—Held, affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, that there was no novelty in the patent, and therefore that it was bad; that the supposed invention had been in use previously to the date of the patent, not only in the case of the bridge but for other purposes, and that a patent could not be upheld for the mere application of a well-known mechanical contrivance to a purpose which was analogous to the manner or to the purpose in or to which it had been hitherto notoriously used or applied.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiffs in the action, against the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (2 Best & S. 222; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 198), reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench (2 Ibid. 194; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 193), and ordering that a verdict should be entered for the defendants.

The action was brought for the infringement of letters patent granted to Charles Wild, deceased, on the 16th of March, 1853, for an invention intituled "Improvements in Fishes and Fish-joints for connecting the Rails of Railways."

The declaration alleged that Charles Wild was the true and first inventor of a certain new manufacture, that is to say, improvement in fishes and fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways; that letters patent had been granted to him, and that the defendants had infringed the same.

The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, that Charles Wild was not the true and first inventor; thirdly, that he did not cause a specification to be filed particularly describing and ascertaining his invention; fourthly, that the supposed invention was not at the time of granting the alleged letters patent new as to the public use and exercise thereof; fifthly, that the said alleged letters patent were not for the sole working or making of any manner of manufacture within the realm, according to the true intent and meaning of the statutes in such case made and provided.

Issues were joined.

Charles Wild, by his specification, after describing the nature of his invention and the manner in which the same was to be performed, claimed as the invention intended to be secured by his patent, first, the constructing fishes for connecting the rails of railways, with a groove adapted for receiving the heads of the bolts or rivets employed for securing such fishes, and the application of such fishes for connecting the rails of railways in manner therein described; secondly, the constructing fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways by means of fishes applied to the joints of divided or split rails, in manner therein described; thirdly, the constructing fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways, with fishes secured by three or more bolts and nuts or rivets, of which the central bolt or bolts, or rivet or rivets is or are of greater diameter than the extreme ones, as therein described; fourthly, the constructing fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways with grooved fishes fitted to the sides of the rails, and secured to them by bolts and nuts or rivets, and having projecting wings secured to and resting upon the sleepers or bearers, so as to support the rails by their sides and upper flanges, in manner therein described; fifthly, the constructing fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways with rails and fishes having the touching surfaces of one or both of them planed, as therein described.

The case came on to be tried, by a special jury, before Cockburn, C.J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1859. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendants to move to set it aside, and enter one for them instead thereof.

In Hilary Term, 1860, a rule was obtained, pursuant to the leave reserved, on the ground that there was no novelty in the invention, and also for misdirection by the learned Judge.

This rule was discharged by the Court of Queen's Bench on the 8th of May, 1860 (2 Ibid. 194; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 193).

The defendants below (the respondents in this appeal) appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, against the judgment discharging the rule.

The case upon that appeal was, so far as is material, as follows: The plaintiffs are the executors of the will of the late Charles Wild. The action is for an infringement by the defendants of a patent granted to the said Charles Wild.

Upon the trial, at Westminster, before Cockburn, C.J., and a special jury, the following facts and circumstances were proved or admitted:

By letters patent, dated the 16th of March, 1853, the sole privilege was granted to Charles Wild, his executors, administrators and assigns, of making, using, exercising and vending within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, an invention for "Improvements in fishes and fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways," for the term of fourteen years from the said 16th of March, upon the usual conditions.

In pursuance of the condition of the said letters patent, a specification was afterwards duly filed by the said Charles Wild, in the Great Seal Patent Office.

It was and is admitted by the defendants, that if the patent of the said Charles Wild be sustained, the invention patented was useful, and that the defendants had infringed the patent.

It was proved that before the date of the letters patent, the rails of the railways had been commonly and publicly connected by fishes and fish-joints, pieces of iron being attached to each side of the rail at the joints by means of bolts and nuts, as mentioned by the said Charles Wild at the commencement of his provisional specification. In some cases flat fishes had been used, which were placed one on each side of the rail, and were attached by means of round bolts passing through round holes in the fishes, and having round or cup-shaped heads and nuts. When this mode of construction was adopted, it was necessary that the heads of the bolts should be held by a spanner or some other separate instrument, while the nuts were being screwed on and off. In other cases the fishes were flat, but the holes in one of the pair of fishes were square instead of being round, and the bolts were made with square necks under the head, so as to fit the square holes. And in other cases, one of the pair of fishes was cast with square recesses sunk about a quarter of an inch below the surface, and the bolts were made with square heads so as to fit into these recesses. The object of having the bolts with square necks fitting into square holes, and in having the bolts with square heads fitting into recesses, was to prevent the bolts from turning round when the nuts were being screwed on or off, and this object was effectually accomplished by each of these contrivances. But until the time of the patent of the said Charles Wild, fishes for connecting the rails of railways had never been made with a groove or recess in their outer or lateral surfaces so as to receive the square heads of the bolts and at the same time to render the fish lighter for equal strength or stronger for an equal weight of metal than a fish made of equal thickness throughout.

It was also proved that before the date of the letters patent, in the construction of several timber bridges of and over one or two lines of railway, constructed under the superintendence of the late Mr. Brunel, beams of timber had been laid horizontally one above the other, and fastened or bolted together with bolts and nuts; that horizontal bars or plates of iron were placed beneath and parallel to and in contact with the horizontal beams, and were also fastened or bolted by the same bolts and nuts, and that each of these bars or plates of iron was constructed with a groove in its under surface, which received the square or hexagonal heads of the bolts. It further appeared that this mode of construction was adopted in order to effect, and did effect the double purpose of strength, and of preventing the heads of these bolts from turning round. But in these bridges there were not joints to be fished by the bars or plates of iron, nor were there corresponding bars or plates of iron, nor were there corresponding bars or plates of iron above the horizontal beams; there was, therefore, no fishing in the proper sense of the word.

Upon this evidence relating to bridges the defendants contended that the use of grooved iron, as above-mentioned for the double purpose of preventing the heads of the bolts from turning round, and of giving increased strength, having existed publicly prior to the date of the letters patent, the invention of the said Charles Wild being only an application of the same contrivance as that above mentioned to fishing iron rails of railways, was not the subject of a patent. The Lord Chief Justice ruled that notwithstanding this evidence the said invention was or might be the subject of a patent, but he reserved leave to the defendants on the foregoing evidence to move the Court of Queen's Bench to enter a verdict for them if the Court should be of opinion upon such evidence that the said invention was not the subject of a patent.

The defendants further proved that in the year 1847 a certain timber bridge known as the "Hackney Bridge," had been constructed by the late Isambard Kingdom Brunel, for carrying the South Devon Railway over the Teign Canal. The span of this bridge was too great to be conveniently crossed by any single beam, and the bridge was constructed so as to have upon each side two horizontal longitudinal beams of timber, the ends of which met and were joined together in the middle of the bridge by scarf joints. Beneath these beams were placed transverse planks, which extended from side to side of the bridge, and constituted the flooring or roadway of the bridge, and immediately beneath the ends of the transverse planks were longitudinal bars of grooved iron, one upon each side of the bridge, running parallel to and under the longitudinal beams along the whole length of the bridge with the grooves or channels downwards. Bolts with square heads, as shewn by the models, passed through the grooved iron bars, transverse planking and the longitudinal beams; that is to say, from the lower to the upper side of the bridge, the square heads of the bolts resting in the grooves of the iron bars, and being prevented, or intended to be prevented from turning round within the grooves, and the nuts were screwed on to the upper ends of the bolts. The grooved iron was carried under each of the scarf-joints in the same manner as under the other portions of the beams; and above and immediately over each scarf-joint, extending for a distance of about 18 inches beyond each end of the joint, and resting immediately upon the longitudinal beam, was a horizontal flat plate of iron 13 feet in length, through which the bolts above described also passed at that portion of the bridge.

The bars of iron along the underside of the bridge were so constructed and used with a groove for the double purpose of receiving the square heads of the bolts and preventing them from turning round, and of rendering the bars of iron lighter for equal strength, or stronger for equal weight of metal, and the bars as so constructed effectually accomplished this double purpose.

In answer to questions put to them by the Lord Chief Justice, the jury found:

First, that the channel irons upon the railway bridges, independently of the single instance of the Hackney bridge, were used before the plaintiff's patent for the double purpose of obtaining increased strength and preventing the bolt-heads from turning round, but that they were not used for the purpose of fishing.

Secondly, that the fastening of the scarf-joint of the longitudinal beam at the Hackney bridge was a fishing of that joint, but that the use of the channel iron as one of the plates of the fish arose from its being already there for the purpose of fastening the beam and the iron together, and was not adopted by Mr. Brunel with reference to or in contemplation of the special advantages in fishing contemplated by the plaintiff's patent.

Upon that finding the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs, reserving leave to move upon the point stated in the former part of this case.

The appeal was argued in the Exchequer Chamber (2 Best & S. 222; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 198), and that Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench (2 Ibid. 194; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 193).

Hence the present appeal.

Grove and Hindmarch (Webster with them), for the appellants, the plaintiffs in the action.—This is a new invention. As regards the two modes of application of the fishes, one is entirely distinct from the other. In the case of the Hackney bridge there was a vertical pressure upon the flat part of the channelled iron, the flooring of the bridge and the longitudinal beams resting on it; but the action of the "fishes" upon the joints of the rails is a lateral action, the object being to support the ends of the rails, and to cause the wheels to run on an even surface, without deflection. The object of the patentee is sufficiently specified in his specification. It is not necessary for a patentee to specify the scientific principles upon which his patent is founded. The defendants say that this is no new invention, because it has been already applied to the bottoms of bridges; but the subject-matter of most modern patents is the application of known things to new purposes. The channelled iron used in the Hackney bridge has no principle in common with the invention of Mr. Wild, except that the bolts are prevented from turning round. The acquiring increased strength with the same weight of metal is not shewn in the application of the channelled iron to the bridge. In order to shew that this is not a new invention, it must be made out that the use of the channelled iron in the bridge would necessarily suggest the application of the same contrivance to a railway joint. Smith v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (2 El. & B. 69) is in point. There the plaintiff's specification for improvements in wheels described the invention as consisting of a mode of forming a wheel of one solid piece of wrought iron by means of welding pieces of wrought iron together, so as to form the rim, spoke and nave into one compact mass. The defendants used a wheel made by welding pieces of wrought iron together, so as to form a single compact piece of wrought iron. The mode of forming the nave was the same as that in the specification; the mode of forming the rim was different. The Court decided that, it appearing that the mode of forming the nave was a material, new, and useful part of the invention, the use of it by the defendants was an infringement of the patent, although in the specification, after describing the whole structure, the invention was stated to consist in the circumstance of the centre boss or nave arms and rim of the wheel being wholly composed of wrought iron welded into one solid mass, "in manner hereinbefore described." Then comes the question which arises upon the construction of the statute 21 Jac. 1. c. 3. s. 6, commonly called the Statute of Monopolies, which enacts, that letters patent may be granted for the sole working or making of any manner of new manufactures to the true and first inventor of such manufactures, "which others at the time of making such letters patent and grants shall not use." It cannot be said that this was an invention which others used. Here two objects are sought: increased strength with an equal weight of metal, and the prevention of the nuts turning when the fish is being screwed on to the rails. The use of it by Mr. Brunel and others was a mere accident in the case of the Hackney bridge. The use of the iron for the scarf-joint there arose in consequence of its being originally there. The case finds that where the channelled iron had been used in the bridges before the date of the letters patent there were no corresponding bars and plates of iron above the horizontal beams; there was, therefore, no fishing, in the proper sense of the word.

Secondly, there was no misdirection. The construction of the specification is a question for the Court—Seed v. Higgins (8 El. & B. 755; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 148, 411), and if the construction put upon it by the Court be wrong the proper mode of redress is by a bill of exceptions—Neilson v. Harford (8 Mee. & W. 806, per Parke, B.; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 20). In Russell v. Cowley (1 Cr. M. & R. 864) a patent claimed the invention of manufacturing tubes by drawing them through fixed holes or dies, but the specification was silent as to the maundrils. The Court held, that taking the whole specification together they would infer that the maundril was not to be used, and therefore it was a good patent. The scarf-joint in the bridge is a joint of a totally different character to the joints of rails.

P. Collock and Horace Lloyd (Bovill with them), for the respondents.—The simple question is, whether Wild, in his patent, did more than make an application of a mechanical expedient to a cognate object without involving thereby any new invention. If there be a mere shifting from one subject to another that is not the object of a patent; and that is a question for the jury, which they have found against the plaintiffs. It is a fact found in the case, that fishing was known before Wild's patent, and this was known to Wild himself. If you manufacture a known article by a new process, so that it becomes much cheaper and more economical, you entirely alter the character of a mercantile product. There is nothing of that sort here. Different people had used different means of preventing the bolts from turning round heretofore. This patent is not for "fishing" rails for the first time, but for getting increased strength and for the square holes into which the nuts are worked: how far is this an improvement upon the old knowledge? The material part of the novelty seems to consist in rendering the fish lighter for equal strength or stronger for an equal weight of metal than a fish made of equal thickness throughout. The judgment of Willes, J. in the Court below, puts this supposed novelty on the proper footing (2 Best & S. 222; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 198). In Boulton v. Bull (2 H. Bl. 463), Eyre, C.J. says, "The substance of the invention is a discovery that the condensing the steam out of the cylinder, the protecting the cylinder from the external air, and keeping it hot to the degree of steam heat, will lessen the consumption of steam. This is no abstract principle; it is in its very nature clothed with practical application; it points out what is to be done in order to lessen the consumption of steam." Hall v. Jarvis (Webster's Patent Cases, 100) is distinguishable from this case. There the process for which the patent had been obtained had never been used by any persons before. That is not the case here. There may be a valid patent for a new combination of materials previously in use for the same purpose, or for a new method of applying such materials, but the specification must clearly express that it is in respect of such new combination or application (Ibid. 229). The observations of Dallas, C.J., in the judgment given in the case of Hill v. Thompson are in point (Ibid. 246). Kay v. Marshall (5 Bing. N.C. 492; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 261) is strongly in favour of the respondents. In Brook v. Aston (8 El. & B. 478; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 145), Lord Campbell, says, "There may be a patent for the application of an old process to a new purpose, but then there must be some invention in the manner in which the old process is applied." And further on he says, "There is not in this case any new process nor any discovery or invention, but merely the application of a known process by known means to another substance." The Patent Bottle Envelope Company v. Seymer (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 164; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 22) decided that the application of a known tool to work previously untried materials, or to produce new forms, is not the subject of a patent. Horton v. Mabon (12 Ibid. 437; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 255), is to the same effect. Patteson, J. says, in Steiner v. Heald (6 Exch. Rep. 607; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 413), "There is here no new contrivance, for the process used under the plaintiff's patent with the spent madder is the same as that previously used with fresh madder." The case of Booth v. Kennard (1 Hurl. & N. 527; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 23) is distinguishable. That was a patent for the dispensing with an intermediate process in the manufacture of gas, and was held to be valid, here there is no difference between the article as manufactured for use in the Hackney bridge, and that applied to the joints of rails.

As to the misdirection. Upon the finding of the jury that the fishes had been previously used, the Chief Justice should have directed a verdict for the respondents. The finding precludes the appellants from saying that the use of them in the Hackney bridge was an accidental use.

[The LORD CHANCELLOR.—A mechanical contrivance, when applied to a bridge, may meet and prevent a particular evil; the same thing, when applied to rails, may remedy another and different evil. Is not that a new application of the same invention?]

In Hunter v. Mower (6 Ad. & E. 735; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 183) a patentee claimed in general terms the application of a principle to produce a mechanical effect, and it was proved that another person had previously applied the same principle to produce the same effect, but with different machinery; in consequence, it was held that the claim could not be supported. They also referred to Lock v. Hogue (Webster's Patent Cases, 208), The Queen v. Cutler (Macrory's Patent Cases, 133; s. c. 3 Car. & K. 215), Crane v. Price (4 Man. & G. 580; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 81), Newton v. Vaucher (6 Exch. Rep. 859; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 305), Higgs v. Godwin (El. B. & El. 629; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 421), Brunton v. Hawkes (4 B. & Ald. 541), Ormson v. Clark (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 435; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 291), Carpenter v. Smith (9 Mee. & W. 300; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 213), and Tetley v. Easton (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 739; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 269).

Grove, in reply.—The question of patent or no patent must depend upon the amount of knowledge upon the subject when it is proposed to be patented. The term fishing was known before and applied to several objects, as for splicing a mast. But yet a new combination and application may be the subject of a patent, and that, even supposing Wild to be aware of its use in the Hackney bridge. Neither is there any need for a new trial, as in Seed v. Higgins (8 Mee. & W. 806, per Parke, B.; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 20) the models are before the House, upon which your Lordships can exercise the same judgment as a jury.

The Lord Chancellor put the following question to the Judges—Whether the verdict ought to be entered for the plaintiffs or the defendants; and if not, whether there ought to be a new trial?

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords—By your Lordships' permission I will now deliver the joint opinion of Mr. Justice Shee and myself. We answer your Lordships' question by saying, that, in our opinion, there ought not to be a new trial, but that the verdict in this case ought to be entered for the plaintiffs.

This answer involves in it a statement that in our opinion the judgment in this case in the Exchequer Chamber was wrong, and should be reversed; but if we rightly understand the judgment delivered in that case, we do not differ from the Judges who concurred in that judgment, nor from the majority of the Judges who heard the argument at your Lordships' bar, on any question of law, but only on the effect of the facts and evidence stated in the case.

The Statute of Monopolies (21 Jac. 1. c. 3. s. 6) excepts from the abolition of monopolies patents for "the sole working or making of any manner of new manufactures within this realm to the true and first inventor and inventors of such manufactures, which others at the time of making such letters patent and grant shall not use."

In order to bring the subject-matter of a patent within this exception there must be invention so applied as to produce a practical result. And we quite agree with the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that a mere application of an old contrivance in the old way to an analogous subject, without any novelty or invention, in the mode of applying such old contrivance to the new purpose, is not a valid subject-matter of a patent. There are many decisions to that effect, which were referred to at your Lordships' bar; and, if the matter were now for the first time to be decided on the construction of the statute, without reference to the cases, we should think, on principle, that such should be the conclusion of the Court. But then, in every case, arises a question of fact, whether the contrivance before in use was so similar to that which the patentee claims that there is no invention in the differences, if any, between the old contrivance and that for which the patentee claims a monopoly; and if there be none, there arises a further question of fact, viz. Whether the purpose to which the contrivance was before applied and the new purpose are so analogous or cognate that there is no discovery or invention in the new application; whether, in short, it is a mere application or not? For if there is invention or discovery producing a practical benefit, as in the case of Crane v. Price (4 Man. & G. 580; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 81), it is the valid subject of a patent. And we think it always must be a question of degree; a question of, more or less, whether the analogy or cognateness of the purposes is so close as to prevent there being an invention in the application. Mr. Grove, in his very able argument, contended, we believe correctly enough, that if there was any real invention, though a slight one, producing a practical beneficial result, the patent was good. But the question still remains, was there such an amount of cognateness in the purposes that there was no real invention or discovery?

In the present case the point was reserved at the trial on certain agreed facts and findings of the jury, and on the evidence of the models and the specifications. So far as the facts are admitted or found, the Court are bound by them, but on the models and on the specification must draw its own conclusion; and it is here that the difference in opinion between the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber and the majority of the Judges who heard the arguments at your Lordships' bar, and ourselves, arises. We differ, not as lawyers, but as mechanics and engineers. We need not say that on such a subject we express our opinion with diffidence, knowing that it will be liable to be criticized by those much more competent to form a judgment on such a point than ourselves; but still we are bound to express the opinion which, after hearing the very able arguments at your Lordships' bar, we have formed on the engineering and mechanical points.

The patent taken out is for "An improvement in fishes and fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways," and we understand this to be the effect of the evidence.

The rails meet butt-end to butt-end, and as the engine passes along the rails its weight has a tendency to depress the rail on which it rests below the rail to which it is approaching, on which the engine does not yet rest; and, unless this tendency is counteracted, the end of the rail to which the engine approaches being more elevated than that on which the wheel of the engine rests, there will be a jolt when the wheel passes over the joint. The mode of counteracting this tendency is by attaching to the sides of the rails plates called "fishes," by means of bolts and nuts. The plates are at the sides of the joint and in the hollow of the double-headed rail, and so long as the fishes are held in that position the one rail cannot be depressed below the other, except in so far as the fish bends. The main strain, therefore, which the fish has to bear, is a strain tending to the flexure of the fish in the vertical plane, which is also the plane of the fish or plate attached to the side of the rails, the forces which tend to push the fish off from the rails being comparatively slight, and being counteracted by the bolts and nuts.

Now the fish which was in use at the time of the plaintiff's patent was a solid plate of equal thickness throughout, and as a strain in the plane of a plate, and tending to produce flexure in that plane, is principally borne by the upper and under parts of such a plate, there was a considerable part of the iron in the centre of the plate which was not brought into play in resisting such a strain.

The plaintiff's invention, as we understand it, consisted in the thought that the superfluous material might be removed, thus producing a groove which he takes advantage of, for the purpose of using it to hold the heads of the bolts, and also producing economy of material, without diminution of strength. These advantages are distinctly pointed out in the specification. The essence of the invention lay in the thought that, inasmuch as the fish was intended to resist a strain in its own plane, the metal in the centre of the fish, which was comparatively inert for the purpose of resisting such a strain, might with advantage be partially removed. The patentee does not in his specification state that the heavy train was to run along the tops of the rails, and that the fish was placed with its plane vertical to resist the vertical strain so produced, nor that the reason why the groove might be made, producing economy of material without diminution of strength, was because the plate was so placed, and that such was the strain it had to resist; but we think that all this might be supplied, and was supplied by evidence.

And on the case before your Lordships we think we are to consider this discovery as producing an improved article, and as being useful, and also new, unless in so far as it was anticipated by the mode in which Mr. Brunel strengthened his bridges, more particularly by the mode in which he fastened the scarf joint in the Hackney Bridge.

Now, here again, we are obliged to form our own opinion as to the facts from the models, and so doing, it seems to us that what was done by Mr. Brunel did not at all anticipate the plaintiff's discovery. He used a channelled iron for the purpose of strengthening the beams of a bridge, and in the case of the Hackney bridge, for the purpose of strengthening a scarf-joint; but the iron was placed horizontally, for the purpose of resisting vertical pressure. The channelled iron would have been a bad form for resisting a pressure such as is borne by the fish-uniting rails. The two wings would, under such a pressure, we apprehend, collapse together, and the centre snap. But it was a good form for the purpose of resisting a flexure transverse to the plane of the iron for which it was used; and what Mr. Brunel did in no way anticipated the plaintiff's idea, founded on the uselessness of the centre part of a plate placed vertically for the purpose of resisting vertical pressure, and used for the purpose of counteracting a tendency to flexure in the plane of the plate. In truth, in the plates and channelled iron used by Mr. Brunel in his bridges the grooves and channels were not formed by removing useless or inert material, but on, as we apprehend, a totally different principle. He in effect added rims or wings to strengthen the flat plate against transverse flexure; he did not make a groove by removing the part of a plate used to resist flexure in its own plane.

This is a view of the effect of the facts and evidence quite opposed to that taken by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, as expressed in their judgment at page 229 of the report in 2 Best & Smith, and at page 199 of the report in the 31 Law Journal Reports.

We are of opinion that from the manner in which the point is reserved, the Court below, and your Lordships now on appeal, must decide the question of fact. And if your Lordships take the view which we have submitted, the point on which it is said there was misdirection becomes immaterial, and the verdict ought to be entered for the plaintiffs, whether that direction was correct or not.

CHANNELL, B.—To your Lordships' question, "Whether the verdict ought to be entered for the plaintiffs or the defendants," for my Brothers Keating and Pigott, and for myself, with your Lordships' permission, I answer that in our opinion the verdict ought to be entered for the defendants.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs as executors of Charles Wild, for the infringement by the defendants of letters patent granted to Charles Wild in the year 1853, for an invention intitled "Improvement in fishes and fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways."

The defendants, by their pleas, denied the novelty of the invention, and that it was a good subject-matter of a patent. The case was tried before the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench and a special jury, and the verdict was found for the plaintiffs, subject to leave reserved to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them. A rule nisi was obtained on this leave, and also on the ground of misdirection, but was afterwards discharged. The defendants appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber against the judgment of the Queen's Bench. The Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed the judgment, and ordered "that the verdict be entered for the defendants upon the pleas denying the novelty of the invention, and that it was the subject-matter of a patent."

By the specification, the patentee (after having particularly described the nature of the invention, and the use of it) says, "I claim as the invention the constructing fishes for connecting the rails of railways with a groove adapted for receiving the heads of the bolts or rivets employed for securing such fishes, and the application of such fishes for connecting the rails of railways in manner hereinbefore described." The advantages of the groove he states to be two, namely, that it serves to receive the square heads of the bolts, and to prevent their turning round when they are being screwed in; and, further, that it renders the fish lighter for equal strength, or stronger for an equal weight of metal, than a fish "if made of equal thickness throughout."

Now such being the nature of the invention as claimed, it is necessary, in order to determine its novelty or validity as the subject-matter of a patent, to refer to the evidence and findings of the jury, in order to see what was the state of knowledge and practice on the subject at the period of its date.

The case states, that before the patent the rails of railways were commonly connected by fishes and fish-joints, pieces of iron being attached to each side of the rail, at the joints, by bolts and nuts; that in one pair of fishes the holes were square, and the bolts made with square necks to fit the square holes; that the object of the square holes and bolts was to prevent the bolts from turning round when the nuts were being screwed on, and this object it effectually accomplished; that before the date of the patent, in the construction of several timber bridges, beams of timber had been laid horizontally one above the other, and bolted together with bolts and nuts; that horizontal bars or plates of iron were placed beneath and parallel to and in contact with the beams, and were bolted by the same bolts and nuts; that each of these bars was constructed with a groove in its under surface which received the square heads of the bolts; and, further, that this mode of construction was adopted in order to effect, and did effect, the double purpose of strength and of preventing the heads of these bolts from turning round. But that in these bridges there were no joints to be fished, and that, consequently, there was no fishing in the proper sense of the word. The defendants further proved that the Hackney bridge had been constructed by Mr. Brunel in 1847 in the way stated in the case.

Upon the evidence at the trial the finding was, "That channel irons on the railway bridges (independently of the Hackney bridge) were used, before the patent, for the double purpose of obtaining increased strength, and preventing the bolt heads from turning round, but that they were not used for the purpose of fishing."

The result, therefore, as to previous knowledge, and as to the nature of the patented invention, is, that the use of iron plates for fishes ungrooved was known; that for strengthening timbers in bridges, and bolting them together, the use of iron plates grooved was known; that the special advantages, when so applied, of securing the bolt-heads, and of affording equal strength with less material, were also known.

Then upon this knowledge it is that the patentee claims the application of the groove to the railway fish, and the advantages he propounds are, that it receives the bolt-head, and by means of it is afforded equal strength with less material; or, in other words, the same advantages as are derivable when applied to the iron plates used in the bridges.

It therefore comes (apart from the Hackney bridge) to the question, whether the patentee has, by using the groove in the fish, invented a new manufacture, or has merely transferred a well-known thing to an analogous subject. Now, in our opinion, the law is correctly laid down in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, to the effect that "a mere application of an old contrivance, in the old way, to an analogous subject, without any novelty in the mode of applying such old contrivances to the new purpose, does not make a valid subject-matter of a patent."

Therefore the point for consideration is thus reduced to this: Whether the fishing of rails meeting butt-end to butt-end with iron plates bolted together, and the strengthening of solid timbers by iron plates also bolted to the timbers as above stated, are analogous subjects.

It seems to us, upon the fullest consideration we can give to it (though being a question of mere mechanics we desire to express our opinion with diffidence), that they are analogous. It may be convenient, in considering the matter, to take the advantages of the groove separately. Now the subject of the plates or bars, when applied to both the above subjects, is to afford to them additional support, and thereby to enable the solid bodies, whether iron or wood, to bear pressure. This is effected by the bolted iron plates in both cases, and the advantage of the groove is to render both sets of plates stronger for an equal weight of metal.

The fact, however, seems to be, that a grooved iron plate, when used as a binding support, is as strong at least as the same plate would be if ungrooved, and this discovery was made before the patent, and was given to the world, and, in the language of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, "though not immediately applied, it was immediately applicable to all forms of pieces of iron used for holding together other materials."

But it was argued at the bar of your Lordships' House that there was invention at all events in this,—that whereas the grooved iron as used in the bridges had been applied for the purpose of binding together pieces of material laid upon one another horizontally, the grooved iron in fishing the rails was applied laterally, binding together the material, and that its great merit consisted in its performing the novel function of resisting the vertical pressure to which it was exposed, and did so by means of a plate equally strong, but rendered lighter than that previously in use by the removal of that portion of the plate which was useless in resisting such pressure.

We do not find that any allusion to such an invention as that now suggested was made either at Nisi Prius, or in any of the judgments in the Court of Queen's Bench supporting, or in that of the Exchequer Chamber invalidating, the patent right; nor do we think, looking to the terms of the specification, that Wild ever intended to claim or did claim any such. He certainly does state in his specification that the groove renders the fish lighter for equal strength, or stronger for equal weight, but that, as to grooved iron, was previously well known, and is a very different thing from claiming the invention as now put forward. If he had intended to claim the discovery that, by the removal of a certain quantity of material from a particular part of the solid plate, in the shape of a groove, the power of resistance to vertical pressure would not be diminished, he would surely have described the sort of groove that would produce that effect with the greatest certainty. If it be true that a groove of a certain width and depth will produce the effect, it cannot be equally true of grooves of all dimensions.

There is nothing, as we think, stated in the specification to indicate that a resistance to vertical pressure was contemplated, and increasing the diameter of the bolts at the point where the strain is said to be the greatest, would seem to point to something different from assisting the fish in resisting vertical pressure.

On looking to the drawing we can see that the groove is well adapted for the purpose to which the specification states it is to be applied, namely, preventing the bolt-head from turning; but we can find nothing in it to shew us that it at all contemplates a peculiar resistance when placed laterally, as contradistinguished from that which it has when it is placed vertically, against the solid substance which it is designed to strengthen. So in the evidence there is much with reference to the claim to prevent, by means of a groove, the bolt-head from turning, but we cannot discover any finding of any fact bearing upon the resistance to vertical pressure.

What appears to us to shew that no such claim was contemplated by the patentee is this,—that if the power of resisting vertical pressure produced or effected by the groove were a merit in the fishes it would be equally applicable to both; not to one more than the other; yet the patentee himself suggests that the inside fish need not be grooved.

Then, as regards the second advantage of the groove in receiving the bolt-head, it seems impossible to say, after its use for the identical purpose in the bridges, whenever it became necessary to fit an iron plate to another material by screws and nuts, that the analogy for that purpose, at all events, is not clear and obvious. It is in this respect only a bare transference.

So that in our opinion, whether the proposed advantages are regarded in detail, or as a whole, there is no invention or novelty to support a patent; and upon the latter view we crave leave to refer your Lordships to the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, with which we entirely agree.

This being the result at which we have arrived on the first branch of your Lordships' question, we have only to add, that, in our opinion, there ought to be no new trial.

As far as we may be allowed to do so, consistently with the forms of your Lordships' House, we desire to state that, since the questions were proposed by your Lordships to Her Majesty's Judges, some of us have seen Sir Edward Vaughan Williams, who was in attendance on your Lordships during the whole of the argument, and we are authorized to state that he sees no reason for changing the opinion he formed when sitting in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, to whose judgment he was a party, and in which he fully concurs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, in this case, in consequence of the difference of opinion between the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and in some degree by reason of the nicety of the subject, which requires some examination, I shall beg leave to trouble your Lordships with a few explanatory observations as the reasons upon which my judgment is founded.

You will recollect that in this case the verdict was entered for the plaintiffs upon an action for the infringement of his patent, and a rule was afterwards obtained to set aside that verdict and to enter the verdict for the defendants, which rule was discharged by the Court of Queen's Bench. The matter was then carried, under the Common Law Procedure Act, to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and in the Court of Exchequer Chamber the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was reversed.

The patent of Mr. Wild was taken out by him for the application of fish-joints, of a particular construction, to the rails of a railway. The denomination of the patent is "improvements in fishes and fish-joints for connecting the rails of railways." A fish, which is obviously a vulgar abbreviation of the French word afficher, is something annexed externally to a joint or severance either in pieces of timber or in pieces of iron. A familiar application of the word is well known to sailors when they speak of fishing a broken mast, namely, annexing the severed pieces by the aid of lateral bands applied externally. But the application of fish-joints to railways was very well known antecedently to Mr. Wild's patent, and Mr. Wild's patent accordingly is for an improvement in the shape or character of the fish.

Now, it is very material to observe that the plaintiff describes the fish, as used by him, to be a piece of iron of the shape of a parallelogram, with a groove or recess in the outer surface, and the groove is described by him as intended to receive the square heads of the bolts, which pass through the fish and through the body of the tram or rail, and which are fastened on the other side by a nut turning upon a screw, and serving, of course, to fasten the bolt. The bolt has a square head on the one side, and on the other a nut running up a screw, and keeping the bolt firm in its place. Now, of course, it was a desirable thing that the head of the bolt should fit into the recess of the fish, that is to say, in the fish-plate, in order to preserve the bolt from being affected by the flange of the wheel of the railway carriage as it ran over the tram. The recess, therefore, is here described by the plaintiff as serving "to receive the square heads of the bolts and prevent them from turning round, when the nuts," which would be on the other side of the rail, "are being screwed on or off." He describes the fish as consisting of two lateral plates, one on the one side of the rail and the other on the other; and he says that the one on the one side may be made without a groove, that is to say, that the lateral plate, where the head of the bolt is affixed, may be the only plate which is grooved or recessed. He then goes on to use this particular passage, which alone has given rise to any difficulty in my mind, namely,—“The groove renders the fish lighter for equal strength, or stronger for an equal weight of metal,” a passage which requires some explanation. The plaintiff, undoubtedly, was aware that as the lateral plate forming the fish is applied perpendicularly to the side of the rail, it would have to endure vertical pressure only. Mechanics and engineers are well aware that when a plate receives a vertical pressure, the impulse, the force of the pressure, is sustained by the upper rim of the plate and the lower rim of the plate, where it rests on the foundation, and that little or no strain is felt by the central portion of the plate. Accordingly, the plaintiff, being aware of that, observes, that his peculiar fish might be constructed in such a manner as to save a considerable portion of metal by having the groove only in the centre of the plate, I mean in the centre of the plate as it is placed horizontally. But it is material to notice that in the description of the plaintiff's invention, and in his claim, he does not advert at all to this peculiarity of a grooved plate, namely, the peculiar result that if it be grooved, the metal may be saved without injury to the efficiency or strength of the plate; and when he sums up his claim, as constituting his invention, it will be found to consist of a very detailed statement of various advantages resulting from the peculiar form and the configuration which he gives to the fish, but no part of the claim will be found to advert to, or to rest upon the fact that the recess or hollow made in the fish-plate for the reception of the square head of the bolt, is effected by a groove in the plate itself, and that that groove may be made with great advantage in the economy of metal, and without any prejudice in respect of the plate.

At the trial the novelty of this invention was impeached, on the ground that channelled iron, which, altogether corresponded with the grooved fish plate, had been in use for a considerable period anterior to the patent, and several examples were furnished to illustrate that, but, in particular one example in the construction of a railway bridge by the late Mr. Brunel, in which channelled iron was used to a very great extent for the purpose of acting as a support to the beams, which were placed transversely, and in which there were scarf-joints. In that case, the square heads of the bolts which bolted on the iron that served as a support or fish were received in the hollow produced by the channel, and fitted the channel in order to effect the same object as is here described by the plaintiff, namely, the preventing of the head of the bolt from being turned when the nut was unscrewed.

I particularly wish to point out to your Lordships the difference between a grooved plate and the channelled iron. The centre of the plate of the channelled iron is not cut away at all—it has the same thickness throughout—but it is constructed with two flanges, one at either end joining the plate at right angles, and producing, therefore, this configuration of the plate, that there is a lateral plate forming the base, having on either side a flange, at right angles to the plane of the plate. The difference, therefore, between the grooved fish-plate and the channelled iron consists in this,—that the centre of the plate of the grooved fish is cut away by the groove, and part of the metal is taken away, so that the plate is not of a uniform thickness throughout, but in the channelled iron the plate is of a uniform thickness throughout, and instead of a groove formed by hollowing out a recess in the plate the same object is effected by two flanges, one on either side of the plate which forms the bottom (I am speaking in familiar language) of the channelled iron.

Now, unquestionably this is a difference, and it would have raised in my judgment a material question whether, if the plaintiff had pointed out and had rested upon this difference of configuration as constituting his invention, it would have been possible to set up the anterior use of the channelled iron as depriving him of all claim to that invention, because the true mode of trying the question of course would be to reverse the order of time of the two productions, and to inquire, whether, if any one had now introduced the channelled iron, it would or would not have been an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. If tried by that criterion, the conclusion should be, that the channelled iron was an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, then of necessity it would follow that as the channelled iron was in use, and was in public and notorious use preceding the plaintiff's patent, the plaintiff's patent could not be lawfully considered as a new invention.

The learned Judges differed on this point. Two learned Judges, Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Shee, have, in a very learned argument, pointed out the difference between the mechanical effects produced by the use of the grooved fish-plate, placed so as to resist vertical pressure in the one case, and the mechanical effect which would be produced upon the channelled iron placed so as to resist transverse pressure in the other case. But I do not think that that of itself would constitute a material difference. The patent is taken out for a fish of a particular configuration; the patent is not taken out for a saving of metal in the construction of the fish-joint, but the patent is limited entirely to the introduction and use of fishes of a particular shape and configuration. Then the question is simply this,—whether the channelled iron, which undoubtedly was a fish, and one of the objects of which channel was to receive the square heads of the bolts and to prevent their turning, is not, in truth, substantially the same thing as a grooved plate with a recess hollowed out in its own plane, instead of a hollow being effected by flanges placed on either side of the plate. Regarding the patent, as limited to a claim for fishes of a particular configuration, I cannot for a moment doubt that the channelled iron having the same object, and being capable of the same application, substantially involves the fish-plate made with a grooved hollow, in the manner which I have attempted to describe.

Then the question is, whether there can be any invention of the plaintiff in having taken that thing, which was a fish for a bridge, and having applied it as a fish to a railway. Upon that I think the law is well and rightly settled, for there would be no end to the interferences with trade and with the liberty of any mechanical contrivance being adopted, if every slight difference in the application of a well-known thing were held to constitute a patent. There is the familiar contrivance of the button, and the button-hole, taken from the waistcoat or the coat, which may be applied in some particular mechanical combination in which it has not been hitherto applied; but it would be an idle thing if it were possible to take a well-known mechanical contrivance, and by applying it to a subject to which it has not hitherto been applied to constitute that application the subject of a patent to be granted as for a new invention. No sounder or more wholesome doctrine, I think, was ever established than that which was established by the decisions which are referred to in the opinions of the four learned Judges who concur in the second opinion delivered to your Lordships, namely, that you cannot have a patent for a well-known mechanical contrivance merely because it is applied in a manner or to a purpose which is analogous to the manner or to the purpose in or to which it has been hitherto notoriously used. The channelled iron was applied in a manner which was notorious, and the application of it to a vertical fish would be no more than the application of a well-known contrivance to a purpose exactly analogous or corresponding to the purpose to which it had been previously applied.

Therefore, with some anxiety upon this subject, and feeling that the intricacy of the matter must render it impossible to convey one's ideas in words, unless one perpetually referred to drawings or models, I think that upon the whole I must advise your Lordships and move your Lordships to confirm the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, that there was no novelty in the patent; and that, therefore, there was a misdirection on the part of the Lord Chief Justice. The consequence will be, that I shall move your Lordships to affirm the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, in this case I concur with the opinions of Barons Channell and Pigott, and Mr. Justice Keating, assented to, as we understand, by Sir Edward Vaughan Williams. Their reasons are so fully and so clearly given, that I need hardly do more than say that I adopt their reasoning.

The case finds that before the date of the letters patent it had been usual to fasten and bolt together, with bolts and nuts, beams of timber laid horizontally one over another, and traversing railway bridges, and that under these beams horizontal plates or bars of iron were placed parallel to and in contact with the beams, and were fastened by the same bolts and nuts which fastened the beams. These bars were all constructed with a groove on their under surface, which received the square heads of the bolts, this mode of construction having, as the case finds, been adopted for the double purpose of preventing the bolt-heads from turning round, and also of giving strength to the beams. It was also found by the case, that before the date of the letters patent the rails of railways had been usually connected by iron fishes, applied and fastened precisely as those mentioned in the specification, though not grooved. I cannot think that the adoption of the groove in the plates used for fishing railway joints, as it had been previously used in the beams of bridges, is an invention capable of sustaining a patent. It is the mere application of an old contrivance in the old way to an analogous subject, without novelty in the application. I say without novelty, for I cannot think that the mere fact of the application being made laterally in the case of the rails, instead of under the surface of the beams, as in the case of the bridges, can be treated as a novelty; nor indeed do I find in the specification any claim of novelty on such a ground. This would have been the conclusion at which I should have arrived, even if there had not been the case of the Hackney bridge. In that bridge the span was too great to be traversed by a single beam, and there were, therefore, two beams, one on each side, joined in the middle by scarf-joints, and under the beams were transverse planks traversing the whole width of the bridge. Along and under the ends of these planks, on each side of the bridge, a long bar of grooved iron was placed under the connected beams, which passed from one end of the bridge to the other. Bolts, with square heads, passed through these grooved iron bars, and through both the planking and the beams, all along the bridge; and the case finds expressly that the groove was used for the double purpose of preventing the square heads of the bolts from turning round, and of making the bars lighter for equal strength of metal or stronger for equal weight. This seems to me to have been the use of grooved iron for the very same purpose as that for which it was claimed by the patent. On these grounds I think that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—My Lords, the questions in this case have been most fully discussed and considered in the Court of Queen's Bench and in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in which the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was reversed, and in your Lordships' House, by the Judges who have given their advice. Every argument which can possibly elucidate the questions in the cause has been brought forward and fully presented to us on both sides. Five Judges have given their opinion that the patent is good, that it was, at the time of its being granted, new as to the public use and exercise thereof; and eight Judges have given their opinion that there was not so much novelty in it as to entitle it to the privilege of a patent. After considering these arguments, especially that of the Judges of the Exchequer Chamber, delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, and that delivered in this House by Mr. Baron Channell, I have satisfied myself that the alleged discovery of the plaintiff had no such novelty in it as to entitle it to a patent.

His plan was to attach to the sides of the railway, under the joints of the railway plates, or fishes of iron grooved, which clearly means channelled from end to end, without flanges, so as to be adapted for receiving the heads of the bolts, which are prevented from turning round when the nuts are screwed on. A similar process had been used long before, in the case of pieces of timber lying horizontally on one another, and each constructed with grooves, which received the square heads of the bolts, and prevented the heads of the bolts from turning. I agree entirely that the application of this principle laterally, which had before been applied horizontally, the application to the sides of a railway of the same principle, which had long been in practice for securing the sides of pieces of timber lying on each other, to the sides of timber placed in contact with them, is not such a novelty of invention as to be a sufficient warrant for a patent. It is so clearly connected with the former practice as not to have the merit of a new discovery.

On this ground, therefore, I entirely agree with the majority of the learned Judges in the view they have taken, and so clearly explained in this case. It is unnecessary to give any opinion on the question whether the patent was not void on the ground that a similar mode of using grooved pieces of wood, occurred before the patent in the construction of the Hackney bridge; but I am much disposed to approve the opinion of Mr. Justice Willes on that subject, contained in his judgment.

Judgment affirmed; and appeal dismissed with costs.

Carriers by Railway—Carriers' Act—Journey by Land and Water—Liability for Goods placed on the Seat of a Railway Carriage.

CARRIERS.—A railway company issuing a ticket for the conveyance of a passenger partly by land and partly by water are entitled to the benefit of the Carriers' Act, in respect of so much of the journey as is performed by land.

The plaintiff arrived at the railway station of the defendants, carrying a chronometer in his hand wrapped up in a handkerchief. This chronometer he gave to one of the porters, who in the presence of the plaintiff placed it on the seat of one of the carriages. Both the porter and the plaintiff immediately after this left the platform together, the porter to attend to other duties and the plaintiff to look after the rest of his luggage. After ten or fifteen minutes, the plaintiff returned and found that the chronometer was gone:—Semble, that the chronometer, at the time of its loss, was in the charge of the company as carriers, so that but for the Carriers' Act they would have been liable.

This action, by the consent of the parties, and an order of Mellor, J., had been referred to one of the Masters of the Court, with power to raise points of law on the face of his award for the opinion of the Court. Upon the death of the Master, the cause, by an order of Crompton, J., was referred upon similar terms to an arbitrator, by whom a CASE, to the following effect, was stated for the opinion of the Court.

At the time of the transaction in question, the defendants were common carriers of passengers, with their luggage, between Jersey and London, the portion of the journey between London and Southampton being performed by them as common carriers by land, and the residue of the journey as common carriers by sea. The defendants were in the habit of allowing passengers between London and Jersey to pay one entire sum for a return ticket, entitling a passenger to be carried, together with his ordinary luggage, from London to Jersey, viâ Southampton, and back, without further payment, the passenger being at liberty to stop, with his luggage, at Southampton, either going or returning, for such period as he pleased, provided that the whole journey out and home did not exceed one calendar month. The plaintiff having taken and paid the defendants for such a return ticket in London, and having been carried from London to Jersey, became a passenger for the return journey from Jersey to London, with his ordinary luggage, including the chronometer in question.

The plaintiff had not the chronometer with him on his outward journey from London to Jersey, but had it with him at the time when he commenced his return journey from Jersey to London. The luggage of the plaintiff, exclusive of the chronometer, was, on the return journey, stowed away by the defendants apart from him; but when he became a passenger at Jersey, and during the whole of the voyage from Jersey to Southampton he kept the chronometer tied up in a handkerchief.

On the arrival of the plaintiff at the pier or wharf at Southampton, he left his luggage to be conveyed by the defendants to the railway station at Southampton, and from thence to London by railway; but he carried the chronometer in his hand tied up in the handkerchief, walking through the streets of Southampton to the railway station, a distance of nearly half a mile. On arriving at the railway station he went, with the chronometer in his hand, up to one of the railway carriages going to London, and gave the chronometer to a porter of the defendants, who then, in the presence of the plaintiff, placed it on the seat of one of the carriages. Both the porter and the plaintiff immediately after this left the platform together, the porter to attend to other duties, and the plaintiff to look after the rest of his luggage, which had not arrived from the custom-house. The plaintiff remained absent for some ten or fifteen minutes. When he returned the chronometer could not be found, and has since been lost.

The plaintiff did not at any time declare the value and nature of the chronometer, the value of which, in fact, exceeded 10*l*. The defendants did everything to entitle them to the protection of the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68, supposing that statute to apply to the case.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether, upon the facts above stated, the plaintiff was, in point of law, entitled to recover in respect of the loss of the chronometer; it being agreed by the parties that the sum of 5*l*. paid into court by the defendants in respect of the other causes of action in the declaration had been accepted by the plaintiff in full satisfaction thereof.

If the Court should decide in the affirmative, the arbitrator awarded to the plaintiff the sum of 25*l*. over and above the 5*l*. paid into court, and directed that the defendants should bear and pay the costs of the reference and of the award. If the Court should decide in the negative, the arbitrator awarded in favour of the defendants, and directed the plaintiff to bear and pay the costs of the reference and of the award. The arbitrator also certified that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court. The declaration was to be considered part of the award, and to be referred to by either party in the argument of the case.

J. Brown, for the plaintiff.—The defendants will rely on the Carriers' Act.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—How do you shew negligence on the part of the company? The chronometer is placed in the carriage by the desire of the plaintiff. Was it not then in his custody?]

It was not. The case states that the plaintiff left the carriage with the porter. The chronometer was therefore placed in the carriage with the knowledge of the company, and their porter acquiesced in the departure of the plaintiff. In Chitty and Temple on Carriers, 285, it is said, "The luggage of a passenger by railway, though never delivered to any servant of the company, but placed by the passenger under the seat of the carriage in which he is riding during the journey, is, nevertheless, in point of law, in the custody of the company, so as to render them responsible for its loss. So, if a man travel in a stage-coach, and take his portmanteau with him, and during the journey he keep his eye upon it, yet if it is lost, the carrier is not absolved from his responsibility; the care of the luggage by its owner amounting merely to this,—that it is much more to his interest to preserve his property than that he should be put to the inconvenience of losing it, and the trouble of suing the carrier to recover its value." And the cases of The Great Northern Railway Company v. Shepherd (8 Exch. Rep. 30; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 286) and Richards v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (7 Com. B. Rep. 839; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 251) are cited in support of these positions. Then, it will be said that, assuming that there was negligence, the company have still a defence under the Carriers' Act. But that act applies solely to a journey by land, and not to a compound journey by land and water.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Why should not the journey be divided into portions, each subject to different regulations?]

In The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand (13 W. R. 1049), where a passenger took a ticket for the passage from Southampton to Alexandria, and from Suez to the Mauritius, it was held that the case must be decided according to the common law, and that it was not within the Carriers' Act.

[MELLOR, J.—In that case there was no carriage by land in England.]

In Branley v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 63; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 286) the railway company, with steamboat powers, made what was alleged to be an overcharge on parcels carried from Boulogne to London. It was there held, that the railway acts did not apply to sea transit. In Pianciani v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. 226) the question was raised whether a passage from the Waterloo Station to Jersey, via Southampton, could be divided, so as to make a different contract for that portion of the journey which was by water from that which was to be performed by land. It did not, however, become necessary to pronounce any decision; and the dicta of the Judges during the argument of the case cannot be taken as an authority. It is submitted that it would be unreasonable to divide the responsibility of the company; otherwise a passenger, in the few minutes between his disembarkation and entry into a train must hurry away to insure his luggage. A chronometer is not a "time-piece" within the meaning of the act. The arbitrator must be taken to have found that the company accepted the chronometer to be carried as personal luggage—The Belfast and Ballymena Railway Company v. Key (9 H.L. Cas. 556).

C. W. Wood (Mangles with him), for the defendants, was not called upon to argue.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment. When the case was first opened, I thought that the facts were such as to lead to a necessary inference that the plaintiff had taken possession of this chronometer, withdrawing it from the custody of the company, and keeping it under his own personal control. But I now think that I had taken too strong a view of the facts; for all that appears is that the porter placed the chronometer in the carriage in which a particular seat was to be appropriated for the use of the plaintiff. I am very far from saying that there may not be cases, where a company is bound by its contract to convey goods safely, in which the conduct of the passenger in taking the goods into his own personal custody and charge may, to some extent, release the company from its obligation. But I think that the evidence must be strong to make out such a case; and it is not because an article is, by common consent, placed in a carriage along with a passenger that the company is released. If it were otherwise, it would follow that no one would be able to take any luggage into a carriage along with him, without risk of losing it. I cannot therefore by inference come to a conclusion which would relieve the company from the obligation of keeping a general superintendence over articles placed in their carriages so as to prevent thieves from purloining them. I think, therefore, that a case must be proved, leading irresistably to the conclusion that the passenger takes possession of his articles before we say that carriers are not liable for the loss of them. If, then, the case depended on the question whether the company were liable upon these facts, I should say that the plaintiff ought to recover.

But the defendants have set up the Carriers' Act. Now, it was not disputed that the article in question was one which came within the provisions of that act; but it was said that its provisions were not applicable to this case, because the contract here was to carry, not only by land, but also by water; and it was argued that the contract was not divisible, and was not within the terms of the Carriers' Act. I think that the argument fails both on authority and principle—on authority, because of the case in the Common Pleas, Pianciani v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. 226), where the Court expressed a strong opinion that the contract was divisible, and so far as the carriage by land was concerned the act was a protection to the company, a decision in which I for one entirely concur; and upon principle, because it would be matter of serious inconvenience, where a company is established for the purpose of carrying goods by land and obtains powers for opening a traffic by water, that such privileges should prevent it from providing accommodation for an entire journey without the necessity of separate contracts, as would be the case if the company were deprived of the protection which the Carriers' Act affords. I think, therefore, that the company have a good defence to this action.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the circumstances stated in the case, as found by the arbitrator, fall short of shewing that the plaintiff had taken his chronometer out of the care and custody of the company. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that some cases might occur which persons might so take charge of in articles as to relieve the company from the care of them. In the present case the finding of the arbitrator does not disclose any such circumstances. The only other question is, are the company relieved from liability by reason of the terms of the Carriers' Act? Mr. Brown's contention is, that this was a compound contract which would be performed partly on land and partly on water, and that the Carriers' Act is confined to cases where the contract was to carry by land. In contracts by carriers, the statute gives protection by land, and therefore, so far as this is a contract to carry by land, there is a liability for which the company must answer, except so far as they are shielded by the Carriers' Act. I think that there can be no doubt that this is a case to which the statute does apply.

SHEE, J. concurred.

LUSH, J.—The first question is whether the chronometer was delivered to and accepted by the company. The case states that the plaintiff, on his arrival at the station, took the chronometer in his hand and gave it to the porter, who, in his presence, put it in the carriage. The porter was there for the purpose of receiving luggage. The company might have said, We won't carry goods in our carriages. But they did not say so. We know that it is every-day practice to carry carpet-bags into a railway carriage, with the consent of the company, and to make it a place of deposit. And there is no fact to shew that the plaintiff who was entitled to have his property carried by the defendants with the ordinary liability of carriers, ever took it out of their custody. That the chronometer was one of the articles enumerated in the Carriers' Act I have no doubt, because it mentions time-pieces above the value of 10l. It was contended that, because the contract is entire, partly by land and partly by water, that it is out of the protection of the act—that is, because the company is obliged to make a special contract for that part of the journey which is by sea, it is therefore obliged to make another for the residue of it, which is by land. This is reasoning in which I cannot bring myself to concur. As for the inconvenience suggested by Mr. Brown in insuring goods after arrival from a sea-voyage, it is not necessary to decide the point; but it may be necessary for the company, in order to bring themselves within the act, to have a table of their increased rates and charges put up in every office where goods are received. There is, however, no such difficulty here, as it is expressly found that the defendants did everything to entitle themselves to the protection of the act.

Judgment for the defendants.¹

(1) With regard to the opinion expressed by the Court upon the question as to the custody of the chronometer, it will be observed that the company were not heard upon this point, as it became unnecessary to call upon them to argue at all.

D.).Costs—County Court Acts—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4.—Concurrent Jurisdiction—"Dwells"—Place of Business of Joint-Stock Company.COUNTY COURT.—A joint-stock company dwells, within the meaning of the County Court Acts (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4), where the substantial business of the company and its negotiations are carried on, and not necessarily in the locality where its property is situated and its immediate objects carried out.A promenade pier company, whose objects were the erection and maintenance of a pier and the reception of tolls thereon at Aberystwith, but whose registered offices were at Westminster, where the substantial business of the company and their negotiations were carried on, was held to "dwell" at Westminster, and not at Aberystwith, within the meaning of those acts.

This was a motion for a rule to set aside an order of Martin, B., made at chambers, in vacation, by which it was ordered that the plaintiffs should recover their costs, and that the same should be referred to the Master for taxation.

It appeared from the affidavits that this action was brought to recover the sum of 14l. 14s. in respect of calls and an allotment deposit on shares in the above company. Judgment was signed against the defendant, for want of a plea. The defendant was a publican and livery-stable keeper at Aberystwith, within the jurisdiction of the county court of Cardiganshire. The object of the company was stated to be described, in the papers at the Joint-Stock Company's Registration Office, to be the erection of a promenade and landing pier at Aberystwith; and the registered office of the company was there stated to be at No. 4, Victoria Street, Westminster. The company had, before the action, erected a promenade pier at Aberystwith, and had begun to receive tolls from passengers thereon; but the plaintiffs' affidavit stated that all the business of the company was transacted at the offices of the company in Westminster.

Underhill, in support of the motion.—The order was made under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128. and the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4. The question is, whether the company "dwelt" more than twenty miles from the defendant, and that depends on the question whether they are to be taken to dwell at Aberystwith, where the pier was erected upon which the tolls were taken, which produced the dividends for the shareholders, and in respect of the repairs whereof the money of the company must be expended, or at Victoria Street, Westminster, where the registered office of the company is situated.

[MELLOR, J.—The business of the company is carried on where the directors transact the ordinary business of the company. COCKBURN, C.J.—If a man wished to get an annual ticket, would he go for it to London or Aberystwith?]

The Keynsham Blue Lias Lime Company (Limited) v. Baker (2 Hurl. & C. 729; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 41) is on all fours with this case. In that case the place of manufacture and sale was within twenty miles of where the defendant dwelt, and the registered office of the company was in London, more than twenty miles distant; and the Court held that the company dwelt at the place of manufacture and sale, and not at the registered office of the company.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There the material was manufactured, and sold and delivered, all at their place of business in the country. MELLOR, J.—The reception of the tolls of the pier is not the carrying on of the business of the plaintiffs' company. COCKBURN, C.J.—You have not stated in your affidavit that the company had any office at Aberystwith.]

The case of railway companies which, it has been held, dwell and carry on their business where the principal station is situated, not at the intermediate stations, stands on a peculiar ground, and is distinguishable—Brown v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 318; s. c. 4 Best & S. 326), Shiels v. the Great Northern Railway Company (30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 331). He also referred to Taylor v. the Crowland Gas Company (11 Exch. Rep. 1; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 233).

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think there should be no rule. The section of the act we are now considering has already received judicial exposition in point. In the cases of railway and coal companies, they have been deemed to carry on their business where their principal offices were situated. Mr. Underhill's reasoning, if it could prevail, might be applied to railways, and to contracts entered into at the intermediate stations; and if a dispute arose upon such contracts, it might be said, in accordance with such reasoning, that the railway company dwell or carry on business at every one of their intermediate stations; but it has been held that a railway company does not carry on business at any place other than its principal office at which its business is managed. So it cannot be said here that the Aberystwith Promenade Pier Company dwell on the pier, but it must be taken that they dwell at the office of the company at Westminster. The affidavit of the plaintiffs states that the only office is in Westminster, and the affidavit on the other side only says that in the belief of the deponent they had no other business than maintaining and keeping in repair the pier, and receiving the tolls in respect thereof at Aberystwith. I think that the company dwell where its representatives are to be found.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. To raise the question as to what constitutes the principal place of business, the affidavits ought to have gone further. There might be cases where only the declaration of dividends or such formal matters might be done at the registered office, and then it might be a different matter; but where the substantial business of the company is done, and its negotiations entered into, there, I think, the company dwells.

SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

THE QUEEN v. THE DARLINGTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.*

Local Board of Health—Interference with Water-Right—Local Government Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 73.—Mandamus—Compensation—Action—Injunction.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—The local board of health constructed a sewer along

* Decided in the Sittings after Easter Term, coram Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Channell, B., Keating, J. and Smith, J.

the bank of a river, with trap-doors in it, communicating with the river. When the river was full and water abundant, the board, by means of the trap-doors, drew water off from the river and let it into the sewer, for the purpose of flushing it. The place where the trap-doors were placed was at a part of the river above that on which a mill, occupied by the prosecutor, was situated. On one occasion, the board made a hole in the bottom of the river, and so let the stream run into the sewer for nearly two days continuously, during that time abstracting the water of the river in such quantities that the prosecutor's mill ceased working for want of water:—Held, that the acts of the board were in excess of the powers given them by statute; that they had injuriously affected the river; and that the prosecutor might have brought an action for the wrong, and also, in such action, obtained an injunction against the continuance of it; that he was therefore an individual entitled by law to prevent or be relieved against the injuriously affecting the river, within the meaning of statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 73; and, consequently, that he could not sustain a mandamus against the board to summon a jury to assess him compensation.

Error was brought, in this case, to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in favour of the defendants, on a mandamus.

The pleadings and facts are set out at great length in the report below (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 305).

The mandamus was to the Darlington Local Board of Health, commanding them to make compensation to the prosecutor, Thomas Taylor, for the damage sustained by him by the exercise of the powers of the Public Health Act, 1848, in making certain drains and sewers, and thereby diminishing the water of a stream to which he was entitled for the working of a mill.

The return, in substance, denied that the defendants had affected the stream in their exercise of the powers of the act; and alleged that if they had affected it at all, it was by acting in excess of those powers, and that so a cause of action had accrued to the complainant.

A case was stated which shewed that the prosecutor was a miller, occupying a mill on the banks of the river Skerne, and as riparian proprietor was entitled to the use of the waters of the Skerne for the working of his mill. The defendants, the local board of health of the town of Darlington, constructed a sewer along the banks of the Skerne, with trap-doors for admitting the water of the river into the sewer. During the construction of part of the sewer, certain water oozed from the river into the sewer and was lost to the prosecutor's mill. Previous to making the sewer the surface water from the town of Darlington was carried by artificial drains into the Skerne above the plaintiff's mill.

These drains had been turned into the sewer, and so the surface water was lost to the prosecutor's mill; all water entering the sewer being carried below the prosecutor's mill.

On the 18th of June, 1850, by the direction of a servant of the defendants, a hole was made in the sewer and the water of the river let into it to flush it. The hole remained open till the 20th of June. During the time it was open the water of the Skerne ran into it in large quantities, and was lost to the prosecutor, and the working of his mill was stopped.

The trap-doors were usually kept closed. They were, however, occasionally opened for the purpose of flushing the sewer, when there was a flush of water in the river.

The prosecutor claimed compensation under four heads—First, for damages sustained by the defendants having carried off the water by the hole in the sewer on the 18th and 19th of June for forty-six hours. Secondly, for water drawn off from the Skerne by the sewer being so near the river. Thirdly, for the trap-doors being made, and water being allowed to flow through them from the river into the sewer. Fourthly, for the defendants having drained off into the sewer the rain and refuse water of the town of Darlington, which used to run into the river.

T. Jones (Henderson with him), for the prosecutor.—The prosecutor has a right to a mandamus. The local board of health have constructed a sewer so as to admit of the river there being diverted into the sewer and carried past the prosecutor's mill. By reason of the abstraction, the water for forty-six hours went into the sewer, and the prosecutor's mill was prevented working. Without relying on the claim for loss of water by percolation during the construction of the sewer, or for the carrying off the surface water of the town from the river into the sewer, it is clear that the prosecutor is entitled to compensation for the abstraction of the water from the river by means of the hole and trap-doors. The only question is, whether the compensation is to be by action or under the act. The statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. ss. 43, 44, 45, gives the local board of health very ample powers in respect of sewers. Section 144. directs full compensation to be made for damage by reason of the exercise of the power of the act, and section 145. (now repealed) prohibits the interference of the board with any watercourse without consent in writing of the party interested in the water. The repealing section of the Local Government Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 68, gives new limitations, and is addressed to interference with works of a public character, and prohibits it unless there be a consent in writing. The 3rd branch of the section is not an absolute prohibition, but applies only to those cases where public trustees could but for the act obtain relief in the Court of Chancery. Section 73. says, "Nothing in this act or any act incorporated therewith shall be construed to authorize any local board to injuriously affect any reservoir, river or stream, or the feeders of any reservoir, river or stream, or the supply, quality or fall of water contained in any reservoir, river, stream, or feeders of any reservoir, river or stream, in cases where any company or individuals would, if this act had not passed, have been entitled by law to prevent or be relieved against the injuriously affecting such reservoir, river, stream, feeders, supply, quality or fall of water, unless such board shall have first obtained the consent in writing of such company or individuals so entitled as aforesaid." The question therefore is, whether a suit in equity would, if the act had not passed, have lain on the part of the prosecutor to prevent the board affecting the river in the above-mentioned manner. Section 69, as to compensation, illustrates the meaning to be put on the words in section 68, "prevent or be relieved by law," and shews that all other cases not provided for are put on the same level as those in which the parties have an equitable remedy. Section 74. contains a similar proviso as regards individuals. Having limited the board from interfering in any case in which a party is entitled in equity to prevent or be relieved, the statute permits a party injured either to go into equity or have an arbitration. The prosecutor was not bound to have brought an action, but is entitled to a mandamus for compensation. A Court of equity could not interfere with the trap-doors, even though the prosecutor might occasionally suffer a little damage. The statute allows the board to do that, making compensation. In Isenberg v. the East India House Estate Company (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 392) Westbury, L.C. held that no mandatory injunction ought to be granted to prevent a company in London building a house so as to interfere with the access of light and air to a neighbouring house, because the injury was one that might be amply compensated for by money, and Chancery could now assess the compensation under the new powers of Sir Hugh Cairns's Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27. Adams on Equity, 217, 218, shews that a mandatory injunction is one which virtually compels the defendant to undo his previous work.

[ERLE, C.J.—In Isenberg v. the East India House Estate Company (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 392) the Lord Chancellor gave relief. He suspended the order and took the mode of building under his care, and assessed damages, though he refused the mandatory injunction.]

The Earl of Ripon v. Hobart (3 Myl. & K. 169) and Beardmore v. Tredwell (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 892) shew that equity always considers the balance of convenience in determining whether an injunction should be granted. There can here be no question that it is far more convenient that the prosecutor should be liable to injury occasionally, and receive compensation, rather than the whole town of Darlington should be liable to flooding by the trap-doors being entirely closed. The Attorney General v. the Sheffield Gas Consumers' Company (22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 811) shews that an injunction will not lie for trivial or temporary injuries. According to the judgment below, the Local Government Act became a nullity, for the local board must always be liable to an action whenever they touch the property of others, since there is always a party who can file a bill in equity. The true construction of section 73. is whether the damage is such as, according to the doctrine of the Court of Chancery, equity would not relieve against. The local board can do what it pleases with the property of individuals, making compensation under the act.

Rew (Kemplay with him), for the defendants, the local board, was not called upon to argue.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. The prosecutor in this mandamus moved for the mandamus to the defendants to issue their warrant to summon a jury, so that he might obtain compensation for damages sustained by him by reason of something done by the defendants in the exercise of their powers under the Public Health Act. It is familiar law that a mandamus cannot be sustained if the act complained of is actionable, and is not authorized by the statute under which the defendant acts.

The prosecutor has given four heads of damage, in respect of which he makes a claim. With regard to the claim for taking away the surface water, and for abstraction of the water from the river by percolation into the sewer, it was admitted during the argument that these could not be maintained as a ground of compensation. The third ground was, that the local board had dug a hole from the bottom of the river Skerne into the new sewer which they had constructed, and so turned a very large portion of the water of the Skerne into the sewer for the purpose of flushing the sewer.

The other ground is very similar; that for placing trap-doors, by means of which the local board have the power of turning the water of the Skerne into the sewer at their pleasure. The case finds that the defendants used the trap-doors only when there was an abundance of water in the river. But the prosecutor has to guard his rights, and has a ground of complaint, and the keeping of trap-doors would be a ground of action, if there were no statute applicable to the case.

Now, are the defendants authorized to do these acts? They are not authorized by the Public Health Act, 1848, and the question turns on section 73. of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 97.—[His Lordship then read the section.]—It is clear that the defendants had not obtained the prosecutor's consent in writing, and that they have injuriously affected the stream. The act does not authorize what they have done, if any individual, supposing that the statute had not been passed, would have been entitled by law to prevent or be relieved against it. So the question comes to this: had the prosecutor a title by law to prevent or to be relieved against these acts? Opening the hole in the bottom of the river, and the damage caused by the use of the trap-doors, would be an injurious affecting the stream, and wrongs for which the prosecutor could have brought an action, and in the action have applied for an injunction. He was a person entitled by law to prevent and be relieved against such injuriously affecting the stream, if he could have obtained an injunction.

I take the word "law" to be used, in its widest sense, as including all the tribunals for protecting the rights of property. The wisdom of the legislature has given to Courts of equity, by Sir Hugh Cairns's Act, the power of assessing damages. The law has also given power to a Court of common law to grant an injunction. I think that the prosecutor, Mr. Taylor, was entitled to prevent and be relieved, if he could obtain an injunction in either Court. I do not confine it to the cases where relief could be obtained in equity, for I am not certain of the rules which would govern in that Court. The question of the degree of the injury would make a difference. In my opinion, this injurious affecting of the river by the defendants, by their act, was not authorized, because the prosecutor was entitled by law to prevent and be relieved from it. This is clearly the same train of ideas which prevailed in the Court below. We affirm the judgment, on the grounds expressed now and by the Judges in the Court below.

The other Judges concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

Copyhold—Grants of Manor Waste by Lord with Assent of Homage—Extinction by Enfranchisement of Reservations in favour of Copyhold Tenants Strangers to the Grant—4 & 5 Vict. c. 35. s. 40, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51. s. 8, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94. s. 10.

COPYHOLD.—By the custom of a manor the lord, with the assent of the homage, could make copyhold grants of part of the manor waste. The lord granted a portion of the waste to C, reserving the trees, and subject to a restriction against building on any part of the ground. In the grant was a power of entry for the lord, the trustees of a charity, and the copyhold tenants of the land adjoining, for the purpose of pulling down houses thereafter erected on the soil granted, and also a power of entry for the lord and the trustees for the purpose of cutting down trees or shrubs obstructing the prospect from the charity estate. The interest of C. vested by purchase in B., who gave notice to the lord, under the Copyhold Enfranchisement Acts, of his desire to have the land enfranchised:—Held, that the award of enfranchisement put an end to the restrictions above mentioned, and that the land must be valued as having been discharged from them.

This was a case stated under the Copyhold Acts, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 40. and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51. s. 8.

The appellant is William Hughes Brabant, a tenant of the manor of Hampstead, and the respondent is Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, lord of the manor. According to the custom of the manor of Hampstead, in the county of Middlesex, the lord of the manor may, with the consent of the homage, make grants of parcels of the waste land of the manor to customary tenants of the manor.

On the 27th of May, 1820, Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, Bart., the then lord of the manor, at a special court that day holden for the manor, with the consent of the homage, granted to George Collings, a customary tenant of the manor, a parcel of the waste lands of the manor, upon the following conditions, contained in the grant; namely, that a good footpath, 4 feet wide, should be made on the south-west side of the piece of ground so granted, and that the piece of ground should be inclosed, and at all times thereafter should be kept inclosed, with an open fence or paling, not exceeding 5 feet from the level of the roads, on the several sides of the piece of ground. That any hedge or shrubs planted next to the fence should not be suffered to grow above this height. That no erection or building should at any time thereafter be erected on the piece of ground or any part thereof.

By the grant there was reserved to the lord, his heirs and assigns, the several trees then standing on the piece of ground, with liberty for him, his heirs and assigns, at any time to enter upon the ground to cut, fell, take down and remove the same for his and their own use; and there was also thereby reserved to the lord and to the trustees of the Wells Charity estate, within the manor, for the time being, and also to the customary tenants, for the time being, of the copyhold messuages or tenements on the north-west side of the piece of ground, then belonging to Viscount Clifden, and his and their stewards and agents, full liberty and authority at any time after any building or erection which might thereafter be erected or set up on the piece of ground contrary to the condition aforesaid should be so erected, to enter upon the ground to pull down and remove any such erection or building at their pleasure, without any interruption by George Collings, his heirs and assigns; and there was also reserved by the grant, to the lord and to the trustees and to his and their stewards and agents, like liberty and authority thereafter in case any trees or shrubs should be planted upon the piece of ground which might obstruct or diminish the prospect from any part of the charity estate in a north-east direction towards and over Hampstead Heath, to enter upon the ground and to cut or fell and remove any such trees or shrubs at his and their pleasure, without any interruption by George Collings, his heirs and assigns, and free from all claim and demand by or from him or them in consequence of the exercise of the reservations, liberties and authorities thereinbefore reserved.

A copy of the grant accompanied and was to be referred to as part of the case.

The interest of George Collings under the grant in the piece of ground vested, in July, 1864, in William Hughes Brabant, who then became the purchaser of it, and was duly admitted as tenant to the lord of the same.

The conditions and restrictions contained in the grant of 1820 have not hitherto been broken or infringed, and the parties in whose favour those conditions and restrictions are created by the grant still have the same interests in their continuing in force which they had at the time of the grant. Viscount Clifden and the trustees of the Wells Charity estate have no rights, either legal or equitable, as against the lord of the manor, beyond the conditions or restrictions contained in the grant to George Collings, and their respective rights (if any) thereunder, and there is no other deed or obligation between them other than the grant to George Collings.

In September, 1864, Mr. Brabant, under the provisions of the Copyhold Enfranchisements Acts, gave notice in writing to the lord of the manor of his desire to enfranchise the piece of ground and premises, and two valuers were duly appointed to assess the consideration to be paid to the lord for such enfranchisement. In the course of the valuation a question arose whether, upon the enfranchisement of the piece of ground, the conditions and restrictions contained in the grant against building and planting on the ground would continue to be in force; the valuer for the lord contending that they would not continue to be in force, and the valuer for Mr. Brabant contending that they would so continue.

At the request in writing of the parties, made within due time, the question was referred to the Copyhold Commissioners, who, on the 13th of February, 1865, made their decision in writing, whereby,—after reciting the grant of 1820 to George Collings, and that it was material to the valuation of the gross sum of money to be paid for the enfranchisement of the said copyhold tenement, whether the conditions mentioned in the grant would so far continue in force after an award of enfranchisement, as to prevent the owner for the time being of the freehold land from building, planting and fencing upon such land as he might have done, if no such conditions had been contained in the grant so as to entitle any persons to enter upon such lands, when so become a freehold tenement, and to pull down and remove any erections or buildings erected thereon contrary to the conditions in the grant contained, and that the continuance or non-continuance in force of such conditions of such enfranchisement, was a question of law material to the valuation,—decided that the conditions and restrictions against building and planting, contained in the grant, would not continue to operate after the enfranchisement of the land.

Mr. Brabant being dissatisfied with such decision, on the 14th of February, 1865, requested the Commissioners, in writing, to state a case for the opinion of one of the superior Courts, according to the provisions of the Copyhold Act, 1852, and in pursuance of such request this case has accordingly been stated.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether or not the restrictions against building and planting, contained in the said grant of 1820, will continue in force after the enfranchisement of the piece of land.

Mellish (R. E. Turner with him), for the appellant.—The conditions and restrictions contained in the grant may continue binding as against subsequent purchasers. At common law these conditions would not run with the land, but would be regarded merely as covenants in gross. But in equity if a man acquires land upon condition that he will treat it in a peculiar way, the Court will enforce the agreement as against purchasers with notice. The homage gave their consent to the grant only upon condition that the land should not be built upon. The enfranchisement can make no difference. If the homage might have removed buildings before, they can now.

[LUSH, J.—The tenants only assent or dissent; nothing passes from them.]

Two leading cases upon this subject are, Tulk v. Mozhay (2 Phill. 774; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 83) and Piggott v. Stratton (Johns. 341; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 1). In Tulk v. Mozhay (2 Phill. 774; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 83) the purchaser of a garden in Leicester Square covenanted to keep it in order as a public garden, and it afterwards came by mesne conveyances to the defendant, whose purchase deed contained no similar covenant, though he had notice of the original covenant by the vendee. In Piggott v. Stratton (Johns. 341; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 1), the defendant, who was lessee of land, subject to a covenant not to build within a certain interval, made an underlease of part of it to the plaintiff, telling him that he was prevented by the head lease from building so as to break the sea view. It was held, that the defendant in the former case, was bound by the covenant, and in the latter case by the representation, though he afterwards surrendered the original lease and obtained another.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Do these cases shew that the agreement will be enforced on the part of every person in whose favour it was made? If the lord of the manor takes compensation on the understanding that the conditions are done away with, could he be allowed in equity to insist upon them?]

Scriven on Copyholds, 4th edit. p. 17, shews, that where there is a custom to make fresh copyhold grants with the consent of the homage, this consent is material in determining the validity by the custom.

C. Pollock, for the respondent.—The case of Tulk v. Mozhay (2 Phill. 774; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 83) only shews that the vendor may assert conditions as trustee on behalf of those to whom he has sold property which would be affected by a breach of these conditions. In this case the power of entry for the trustees and the co-tenants is nothing more than a gratuitous reservation to a stranger, for the assent of the homage is only a matter of form. The Commissioners have awarded compensation on the principle that the appellant will obtain a freehold estate without restrictions, and this is the effect of enfranchisement. The Copyhold Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51, takes no notice of the rights of the homage. In Watkins on Copyholds, 4th edit. vol. 1. p. 450, it is stated that the enfranchising lord cannot reserve to himself any services on the enfranchisement, since the copyhold tenure is absolutely at an end.

Mellish, in reply.—It is true that a mere gratuitous contract cannot be enforced as against the copyholder after enfranchisement. Here, however, it is clear that the other tenants wanted some security that the land would not be built upon, apart from the will of the lord.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be in favour of the respondent, on the ground that Mr. Brabant, the appellant, holds the land without being restrained, by virtue of the reservations and conditions in the grant, from applying the soil to such purposes as he may find most beneficial to him. The land was originally part of the waste of the manor. By the custom of the manor (as appears from the case) the lord, with the consent and concurrence of the homage, can convert land, part of the waste, into copyhold tenements. It appears that this was done in favour of a person named Collings, from whom the appellant derives title. But the grant was made subject to restrictions in favour of the trustees of the Wells Charity and the customary tenants of Viscount Clifden; one of which was, that the land should not be built upon. This restriction was gratuitous, so far as respects the trustees and the tenants in whose favour it was made. None of them could enforce it, either against the copyhold tenant on the one hand, or the lord of the manor on the other. There is nothing to shew that the homage insisted on this restriction, or intended it for the general benefit of the copyholders. I think that it must be taken to have been made for the particular benefit of the grantor. But even if this restriction be taken to have been made for the benefit of the copyholders themselves, I do not think that they would have any locus standi to enforce it. The homage have a right to withhold their assent; but when it is once given and a grant made, their interest ceases. The land is no longer waste, and the homage have nothing more to do with it. It is for the lord alone to enforce the rights reserved to them; and his obligation to do so may be binding in honour, but is not binding at law. The waste having been converted into copyhold tenements, the lord of the manor and the copyhold tenant, by the late Copyhold Act, may either of them compulsorily enfranchise the land without the concurrence of the homage. Now, the valuer can only look at the real value of the land; and as the lord, who alone has a legal interest in a continuance of the conditions, is estopped by his release from insisting upon them, I think that he is entitled to have the valuation made upon the understanding that they are removed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not the case of a person who has been induced to alter his condition upon the faith of a representation in the nature of a promise. I think, therefore, that the cases in equity which have been cited have no application, and that the homage, having resigned their commonable privileges over a portion of the waste by assenting to a separate grant of it, have no rights against the lord, or any person claiming under him.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the restrictions in the grant, though made in favour, not only of the lord, but of two other classes of persons, could be enforced by the lord alone. I think, too, that the power of the lord to enfranchise remained intact, and that in exercising it he did not require the concurrence of the homage. The award of enfranchisement under the Copyhold Acts, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51. and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94, expressly frees the land from all incidents of copyhold tenure; and the decisions which have been cited from the Equity Reports, shewing that a person who buys an estate with notice of conditions affecting it is bound by them, do not apply to a case where the person who has imposed conditions is himself desirous of being released from them.

LUSH, J.—I am also of opinion that the decision of the Commissioners is correct. Mr. Brabant has a copyhold tenement clogged with conditions and restrictions against planting and building on the land. He is desirous of having the land enfranchised, and when that is done the question will be, what estate has he in his property? If he has an estate in fee simple discharged from the conditions which were formerly imposed upon it, he ought to pay to the lord a fair equivalent for what he has acquired. The question, therefore, which we have to decide is, whether the freehold remains clogged with these restrictions and conditions, or whether it is discharged from them. Now, by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94. s. 10, the award of the Commissioners is to have the same force as a deed of enfranchisement under the provisions of the former acts. By these provisions, what was copyhold land becomes an estate of freehold tenure, subject to a charge only, if it is agreed that the compensation shall be secured to the parties entitled in that manner. I take it therefore to be perfectly clear that as soon as the enfranchisement is complete, the tenant will have the land free from all molestation by any persons claiming under the lord. Then, it is said that these conditions and restrictions must be taken to have been required by the homage as a security, and as the consideration for their assent to the grant. By the custom of the manor, the homage may give their assent to grants of part of the waste, to be held by copy of court-roll. But excepting what arises from their assent to these grants, they have no interest in them. There is an express power of entry in favour of two classes of persons besides the lord; but the case states that they have no rights over the subject of the grant. It follows that the enfranchisement which takes from the lord the right to enforce these restrictions puts an end to them altogether. I think, therefore, that the appellant must pay a consideration equal to the value which he is to receive.

Judgment for the respondent.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, (8 Vict. c. 18. ss. 18, 21, 22, 49, 63, 68.)—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, (8 Vict. c. 20. ss. 6, 16, 86.)—Compensation—Injury to Premises adjoining Railway by Vibration, Noise and Smoke.

Premises adjoining a railway, but untouched by it, were injured by vibration, noise and smoke, caused by the running of trains on the railroad, after it had been completed. The premises sustained no structural injury:—Held, that the owner was not entitled to compensation from the company by virtue of the provisions of either the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act or the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.

This was an action to recover the sum of 272*l.*, balance of a sum of 1,141*l.* for which last sum the plaintiff, Mary, then Mary Piper, had obtained judgment at a sheriff's inquisition held August 13th, 1864. By consent of the parties, and an order of the late Mr. Justice Crompton, a case to the following effect was stated for the opinion of the Court, without pleadings.

After stating the title of the plaintiff Mary (as executrix and devisee in fee of her late husband R. M. Piper) to a messuage, outbuildings, garden, and lands at Shepherd's Bush, Middlesex, known as Cumberland House, it proceeded—

By the Hammersmith and City Railway Act, 1861, the defendants were incorporated and empowered to make and maintain a railway and works as therein mentioned, and to enter upon, take and use certain lands for the purposes of that act.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, are incorporated with and form part of the special act.

The defendants proceeded to construct and execute the railway and works under and in accordance with the provisions of the special act, and the acts incorporated therewith. The railway in its course crosses the Uxbridge Road, nearly at right angles, and at and near this point it is constructed upon a viaduct of brick arches, and at a height of about 19 feet above the level of the ground. This part of the railway was completed in August, 1863, and the railway was opened for public traffic in June, 1864. The railway is worked by the Great Western Company, as lessees of the defendants, as a passenger railway only, and in the usual and ordinary way. Cumberland House is situated in the immediate neighbourhood of the railway near the spot where the railway crosses the Uxbridge Road. No part of Cumberland House, and no lands or hereditaments whatsoever of Robert Monkhouse Piper, or of the plaintiff Mary, were ever entered upon or taken or used by the defendants permanently or temporarily. The railway and works were commenced in the lifetime of Robert Monkhouse Piper, and he was then residing there with his wife and family, and after his death the plaintiff Mary, then his widow, continued to reside there with her family. On the 19th of July, 1864, a notice was served on the defendants by the plaintiff Mary, claiming, both as trustee and executrix, compensation from the company for (amongst other things) damage and injury done, and which would thereafter be occasioned to her property by the working and use of the railway, and consequential thereon.

The defendants, after the receipt of this notice, duly issued their warrant to the sheriff of Middlesex to summon a special jury under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The warrant stated that the company did not recognize the plaintiff's claim, and that the warrant was issued under protest. After due notice given, the plaintiff Mary and the defendants appeared on the 13th of August, 1864, before the sheriff and a special jury, duly summoned and sworn, when the claim of the plaintiff was duly inquired into. Upon the inquiry, the claimant, by her counsel, claimed compensation in respect of the following matters: 1. For the obstruction of light and air and way. 2. For damage to the garden by lime-dust and smoke in the course of construction of the railway in the lifetime of Robert Monkhouse Piper. 3. That the working of the railway and the running of trains over it after it had been constructed and opened for traffic, had occasioned, and always would occasion, vibration, noise and smoke; and that the premises, by reason of their being subjected to such vibration, noise and smoke from passing trains were, and always would be affected and further depreciated in value.

Evidence was given on behalf of the claimant in support of each of these three heads of claim. As to the third head of claim, it did not appear that any structural injury was or would be caused to Cumberland House, or any of the outbuildings, by the construction of the railway. But it appeared, and was admitted, for the purposes of the case, that by reason of the working of the railway after it had been opened for traffic the house and buildings were and would be subjected to vibration, noise and smoke from passing trains, and were and always would be affected and depreciated and lessened in value thereby. The defendants, by their counsel, objected to any evidence being given or received of any depreciation in value occasioned by these causes, and such evidence was admitted under protest.

The defendants, by their counsel, then objected that the plaintiff, Mary, was not entitled to any compensation under the third head of claim; but finally, and in order that the question might be conveniently raised and determined, it was agreed that the jury should assess the amount of compensation under each of the said several heads of claim separately, and the jury accordingly assessed the amount of compensation to be paid to the plaintiff Mary under the several heads of claim as follows:

For obstruction of light, air and doorway	836
For damage to garden in the lifetime of Robert Monkhouse Piper	23
For vibration from the use of the railway after construction as before mentioned	272

For which several sums they gave their verdict; and the sheriff gave judgment that the several sums be paid by the defendants, and such verdict and judgment were afterwards duly recorded.

The case then stated the marriage of the plaintiff Mary with the plaintiff Horatio Brand, and the payment into the Bank of what was due under the first two heads of claim.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the said plaintiff Mary was entitled to have compensation made to her by the defendants in respect of the matters falling under the third head of claim. If the question were answered in the affirmative, judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs, as the Court should direct, either for the sum of 272*l.*, with interest thereon at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, from the 13th of August, 1864, until judgment, or that a peremptory writ of mandamus should issue commanding the defendants to pay the sum of 272*l.*, with interest thereon as aforesaid, into the Bank in the name and with the privity of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery in England, to be placed to the account there of such Accountant General, ex parte the Hammersmith and City Railway Company, in the matter of the Hammersmith and City Railway Act, 1861, pursuant to the acts for the time being in force for regulating monies paid into the court, and in either case, with costs of suit. If the question were answered in the negative, judgment was to be entered for the defendants, with costs of suit.

The Hammersmith and City Railway Act, 1861, to be referred to, and to form part of this case.

Hawkins (Dixon with him), for the plaintiffs.—Upon the facts stated in the case the plaintiffs are entitled to compensation. It is stated that the defendants have leased their line to the Great Western Company; but this circumstance will hardly be relied upon as a matter of defence. It is acknowledged that the premises in question have been injured by vibration, noise and smoke, and that their value is lessened. The same principles must apply to the case as if the house had been shaken to its foundations. The acts of parliament granting compulsory powers must be construed in favour of private individuals, and strictly against the company. These acts were not intended to deprive any one of the value of his property. If a private individual were to construct a railroad, and to injure his neighbours as the plaintiffs have been injured, he would be liable to an action. The legislature has converted this right of action into a right to compensation.

[LUSH, J.—If a farmer frightened the horses of his neighbour with a thrashing machine, that would be a cause of action like the present one?]

Yes.

[LUSH, J.—Therefore a person whose horses were frightened by a railway train would have a right to compensation?]

Where the public suffer alike the rule does not apply.

[LUSH, J.—I believe that actions against railway companies for setting fire to stacks have always been grounded on negligence?]

Yes; but this is like the case of Bradley v. Gill (1 Lutw. 69), where an action was held to lie against a smith for setting up a forge adjoining the land of the plaintiff and frightening his horse. But by the express words of the Railway Acts the claim of the plaintiffs can be upheld. The right to compensation is not regulated by section 68. of the Lands Clauses Act, which merely specifies the mode of assessing compensation. Material provisions are to be found in section 6. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, which provides, "That in the exercise of the power given by the special act to construct the railway and to take lands for that purpose, the company are to make to the owners and occupiers of lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the land and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by the general and by the special act, or any acts incorporated therewith, vested in the company."

[MELLOR, J.—The compensation is given to persons injuriously affected by the construction of the railway.]

The word "construction" must mean construction of the works for the purposes to which they are to be applied, and having regard to the manner in which they are to be used. By section 16. of the same act power is given, for the purpose of constructing the railway, to execute certain specified works, among which are bridges and viaducts, with a general power to do all other acts necessary for using the railway, doing as little damage as can be, and making full satisfaction to all parties interested for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers.

[MELLOR, J.—These powers refer only to the construction of works, and the power to do acts necessary for using the railway must mean necessary for enabling the railway to be used.]

Sections 86. and 87. explain what are the acts necessary for using the railway. By the first of these sections, the company take powers to employ locomotive engines and carriages and waggons, to be drawn and propelled thereby, and to carry passengers and goods upon the railway. By the second, running powers may be granted to other companies. Damage like that sustained by the plaintiffs is provided for by different sections of the Railway Acts. By the Lands Clauses Act, section 49, compensation is awarded for the severance of lands taken by the company from other lands, or otherwise injuriously affecting such lands by the exercise of the compulsory powers. In section 18. the notice to treat is required to express the willingness of the company to make compensation to all parties for the damage that may be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works. By section 63, in estimating the compensation for damage from severance, regard is to be had to the damage from injuriously affecting other lands.

[LUSH, J.—It can hardly be said that damage caused by the use of the railway is damage caused by the execution of the works.]

In Chamberlain's case (2 Best & S. 605; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 173) the house of the claimant had sustained no structural damage, but he recovered compensation; and the effect of this case is not altered by the recent decisions in Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 430; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C. P. 313) and Ricketts v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (5 Best & S. 156; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. (Ex. Ch.) 257). The case In re Penny v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (7 El. & B. 660; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 225) is no authority against the plaintiffs. Lord Campbell, indeed, says, at page 672 of his judgment, that the claimant, in his opinion, would be entitled to compensation for injury from vibration during the construction of the railway, but not afterwards. This, however, was a dictum unnecessary for the decision of the case; and in Glover v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 912; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 376) his Lordship held that where a railway crossed a private road so that the train was not seen till a few seconds before crossing, this was a ground for compensation, although it seems clearly to be an inconvenience arising from the use of the railway.

[MELLOR, J.—There the putting up gates so as to obstruct the road was the principal injury.]

There are several cases where claims in respect of damage, such as that in the present instance, have been entertained. In The New River Company v. Johnson (2 E. & E. 435; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 93) compensation was refused, because no action would have lain for the abstraction of the underground water. In The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Bradley (6 Rail. Cas. 551) injury to a cellar from vibration was held to be damage within the 68th section of the act. In Croft v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (3 Best & S. 436; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 113) a tunnel had been carried under premises of the plaintiff, and compensation was awarded him for all damage sustained by reason of the construction of the tunnel. Years afterwards the premises sustained injuries owing to the tunnel; and it was held, that the prospective damage must be taken to have been considered by the arbitrator, and that no further compensation could be recovered.—See also Read v. the Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Company (1 H. & C. 826; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 167) and Lee v. Milner (2 Mee. & W. 824; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 205). The latest case touching upon the question is In re the Stockport, Timperley and Altringham Railway Company (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 251), where Crompton, J. held that the damage to a cotton-mill, owing to the increased risk of fire by reason of the proximity of the railway, might be taken into account in assessing compensation. It is true that the company had taken part of the land of the claimant; but after severance, and before the damage takes place, the claimant is in the position of a separate owner.

[LUSH, J.—The owner is exposed to greater risk by reason of the severance, and ought to receive compensation for consequential damage.]

Karslake (H. Lloyd with him), for the company.—The case makes it plain that no land or easement belonging to the plaintiffs has been touched or interfered with by the company. The company has not been guilty of negligence; no damage has been sustained by the construction of the works, and no injury has been caused unless by the working of the railway.

[MELLOR, J.—In all the cases cited by Mr. Hawkins something had been done in the progress of the works.]

In The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvie (2 Macq. H.L. Cas. 229) a railway crossed a high road on a level near the claimant's house. It was held, that the inconvenience was personal, and gave no right to compensation. In the judgment (p. 235) Lord Cranworth, after stating that an injury to give a right to compensation must be actionable, says: "I am far from admitting that there would be a right to compensation in some cases, where, if the act of parliament had not passed, there might have been, not only an indictment, but an action. In Glover v. the South Staffordshire Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 912; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 376) a private road was blocked up by the construction of the works. The case of In re the Stockport, Timperley and Altringham Railway Company (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 251) is an authority against the plaintiffs instead of being one in their favour. Crompton, J., in his judgment, while noticing Broadbent v. the Imperial Gas Company (7 De Gex, M. & G. 436; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 276) lays stress upon the fact that in the case before him a portion of the claimant's land had been taken. If any one were to construct a railway without parliamentary powers, he might be sued according to the extent of the injury which he inflicted. But a railway, by act of parliament, is supposed to confer a benefit upon the public; and if it does not touch landed property, it is not bound to give compensation. The injury in question is just as personal as that of the owner of horses frightened by passing trains. The preamble of the Lands Clauses Act shews that its operation is limited to the acquisition of lands. It is true that by section 63. there is a special provision granting compensation for injuriously affecting lands; but that is where there is a severance. Section 68. supposes that the person is entitled. It is contended that the general power to do acts necessary for using the railway includes the power in section 86; but the former section applies only to the construction of works. There is no clause giving compensation to those injured by the working of the railway. He cited Mumford v. the Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Company (1 Hurl. & N. 34; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 265).

Dixon, in reply.—The payment of compensation is a purchase of the right to do injury for all future time. The distinction which is relied upon in the case of In re the Stockport, Timperley and Altringham Railway (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q. B. 251) is not disputed. It is admitted, that where land is not taken by the company the liability to damage from fire is not a ground for compensation, as it would not be a cause of action. But here there is a cause of action by the common law, for where an act otherwise lawful actually causes damage to another person, it is the subject of an action on the case, and the person possessing this right of action has a claim to compensation; though his rights are not equal to those of a person whose lands are taken, and who may recover for any sort of consequential damage against the trespasser. In section 18. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, arrangements are directed for the compensation to all parties for damage by reason of the execution of the works. But in section 22. the compensation is stated to be in respect of lands injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, although in section 21. the words are, "damage by reason of the execution of the works," shewing that the words "undertaking" and "works" are regarded as identical. In section 63, where damage like that in question is provided for, the words are "otherwise injuriously affecting such lands by the exercise of the powers of the statute and special act." These words, "execution of the works," must mean "the carrying out of the whole scheme." All that is relied upon in the case of Broadbent v. the Imperial Gas Company (7 De Gex. M. & G. 436; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 276) is extra-judicial.

MELLOR, J.—In this case our judgment must be in favour of the company. The case has been extremely well argued on both sides. Mr. Dixon has put before us many considerations well worthy of attention, but he has failed to convince me that the distinction on which he rests is a sound one. The compensation claimed by the plaintiffs was assessed for damage incurred after the construction of the railway, and which was not the result of negligence. I quite agree to the proposition, that if a company exercise its powers negligently so as to cause injury, this would be the subject of an action at common law. But the difficulty of the plaintiffs is to shew that by the terms of the different railway acts compensation is provided for inconvenience, such as that which their land has sustained, and that it is not damnum absque injuriâ. Now we can understand many reasons why the legislature should have intended that the use of the railway should not subject the company to claims from a multitude of persons. It would be almost impossible to construct a railway near a large town without causing some slight injury to many of its inhabitants, and the legislature may have thought that so important an undertaking ought not to be sacrificed to their convenience. I do not deny that hardship may sometimes arise, but as I cannot find any provisions in the special act, or in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, giving compensation to persons whose land is injured in the manner complained of, I must conclude that for the consequences of the use of the railway without negligence there is no remedy. Now, what is the object of the two acts, the Railways Clauses Act and the Lands Clauses Act? They give an authority to companies to take and use lands, making compensation to the owners and occupiers for the value of the lands taken or used, and for the damage caused by severing these lands from the rest of their property, or otherwise injuriously affecting it. The difference between the case of those who have to surrender part of their land and those whose property is not actually entered upon, may account for indulgence being shewn to claims by the former class of persons. It is not necessary, however, to discuss the question, as the case may be readily distinguished from In re the Stockport, Timperley and Altringham Railway (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 251), decided by my late Brother Crompton. He proceeded on a distinction which is well known. Where any one living near a railroad is injured not merely by the construction of its cuttings, tunnels, level crossings, or embankments, but has part of his land separated from the rest into the bargain, he may well say, "The company are about to take part of my land and to use it so as to prejudice the rest of my property. If I am compelled to yield to their demands, I ought to receive compensation for any mischief that may thereby be caused to me." Such a claim might be thought reasonable by the legislature when that of persons differently situated might be rejected. Therefore, after looking carefully at the different clauses of the two acts, I cannot but think that they apply only to injury from the execution of the works of the railway, and not to that which is produced by the use of it; a construction maintained by Lord Campbell in the case of Penny v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (7 El. & B. 660; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 225). I admit that there are words at the end of Lord Campbell's dictum which satisfactorily shew that his opinion was not decisive, but it seems that he thought that there was a real distinction between damage by the construction of the railway, and damage by the exercise of the powers to run locomotive engines. I think this distinction sound. Whether the words "execution of the works" or "exercise of the powers" are used, seems to me to make no difference. It is worthy of observation that it is only upon failure to comply with a notice to treat as to compensation to be made for the execution of the works, that the machinery for settling the compensation provided by the Lands Clauses Act, comes into operation. In the result, I am convinced that injury arising from the running of locomotives can only be the subject of an action for damages; and I cannot help adding, that the facts of this case, when compared with the evidence required in similar actions against railways, shew that the plaintiffs have no remedy at common law. The legislature, in passing over claims such as that of the plaintiffs, seems to me to have done no more than the interests of the public require.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question which we have to decide is, whether the owner of a house and buildings adjacent to a railway, which are and are likely to be subjected to vibration, noise and smoke from passing trains, and thereby depreciated in value, is entitled to compensation. The railway acts give compensation to two classes of persons: first, to persons interested in lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway; secondly, to persons interested in lands which are injuriously affected by the construction of the railway. With the first of these classes we have nothing to do. It is not for us to inquire whether damages like those which are now claimed could be recovered by the owner or occupier of land any part of which had been taken or used by the company. This is only the case of a person whose land has been injuriously affected. The title of the plaintiffs to compensation must depend entirely upon the language of the acts of parliament. The right to compensation of a man whose land is injuriously affected is subject to two limitations: he must have sustained damage which would have been a cause of action before the special act, and the damage must have been occasioned by the execution of the works to which this act relates. As to the nature of the injury which must be the ground of an action, there are two cases bearing on it. In Chamberlain's case (2 Best & S. 605; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 173), where the high road on which the plaintiff's houses abutted, was blocked up by the railway and the value of the houses was diminished, it was held that he was entitled to compensation. In Ricketts v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (5 Best & S. 156; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. (Ex. Ch.) 257), where a bridge was for some time substituted for a footway in front of the plaintiff's shop, and fewer customers resorted to it than before, the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the injury was not actionable, and gave no right to compensation. But supposing the land to be injuriously affected, is it injured by the execution of the works? Now, "the execution of the works," in the ordinary sense, means nothing more than the construction of the railway, and if these words, which are directed to be used in the notice to treat by section 18. of the Lands Clauses Act, were all that the plaintiffs had to rely upon, their argument would have fallen to the ground. But their counsel had recourse to the Railways Clauses Act, which shewed, it was said, that compensation ought to be awarded for damages sustained after the execution of the works. Now, the 6th section of this act begins in this way: "And with respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith, be it enacted as follows." Here there is nothing at all concerning the use of the railway. It then goes on to direct that the company shall make "to the owners and occupiers of, and all other persons interested in any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by the special act or any act incorporated therewith, vested in the company." Therefore, in one clause the legislature uses the words "construction of the railway," as synonymous with "exercise of the powers of the act." I think that the only class of persons to which this section applies are those who are described in section 68. of the Lands Clauses Act, as parties "entitled to compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works," that is, by the construction of the railway. Now, the damage in question is effected by the working of the line, and is in no respect connected with the construction of the railway. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs have made out no claim to compensation.

Judgment for the defendants.

Inspection of Documents—Action on Policy of Insurance—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. s. 6.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 50.

DISCOVERY. MARINE INSURANCE.—The practice which formerly existed of allowing, in an action on a policy of insurance, inspection of documents in any way relating to the subject of the policy, is not affected by the acts 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. s. 6. and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 50.

Therefore, in an action against an underwriter for his proportion of the amount insured, the Court granted to the defendant an inspection of letters passing between the captain and the plaintiffs before and after the loss, and relating to the ship, voyage and loss, and also of log-books, surveys, protests and other documents relating to the loss, upon an affidavit that these papers were material and necessary to the defence.

Rule calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why the defendant should not be at liberty to inspect and have copies of all the letters and documents mentioned in the affidavit of Charles Robert Rayner, one of the plaintiffs.

The action was brought against the defendant, as a member of two mutual marine insurance companies, to recover his proportion of the insurance payable upon an alleged total loss of a ship, called the Henrietta.

On the 27th of June, 1865, the defendant's attorney made an affidavit in support of a summons for a discovery, in which he stated that he believed that the captain of the ship, before she sailed on the voyage during which the alleged loss took place, during the voyage, and after the alleged loss, wrote and sent several letters to the plaintiff in relation to the ship, voyage and alleged loss; that the plaintiffs had in their possession log-books, surveys, protests and other documents relating to the ship, voyage and alleged loss; that he was advised and believed that it was material for the defence to the action, and to enable him to prepare the same, that he should have all letters and other documents relating to the matters in question produced; that he believed that the letters and other documents were in the possession of the plaintiffs or their attorneys.

On the 7th of July, 1865, Blackburn, J. made an order for the plaintiffs to answer on affidavit, stating what documents were in their possession or power relating to the matters in dispute, or what they knew as to their custody, and whether they objected (and if so, on what grounds) to the production of such as were in their possession or power.

On the 1st of November, 1865, the plaintiff, Charles Robert Rayner, made an affidavit, in which he admitted that the plaintiffs had from time to time, both before and after the loss of the ship Henrietta, received letters from the captain of the ship, which letters were then in the plaintiffs' possession, and of various dates, beginning the 24th of December, 1863, and extending to the 14th of October, 1865; and that the plaintiffs had in their possession a log-book, surveys, a protest and other documents relating to the ship and her loss; that the documents and certain of the letters were specified in a schedule to the affidavit, and the plaintiffs did not object to the production of these; that, with regard to the captain's letters which were not scheduled, the plaintiffs objected to their production, for the two following reasons: namely, first, the captain's letters which were scheduled, and the log-book, protest, surveys and other scheduled documents narrated the history, in minute detail, of the loss of the ship, and set out the nature and extent of her damage, and the particulars of the plaintiffs' course of action fully; secondly, the captain's other letters related to questions of freight and expenses, to disputes about wages and matters of account, to the captain's evidence, and to other matters of a private and confidential nature, into which the defendant had no right to inquire.

On the 8th of November a summons, in the terms of the rule, was heard before Lush, J., who referred the matter to the full Court.

In support of the rule the clerk of the attorney of the defendant made an affidavit, stating what proceedings had been taken, and that he believed it was material to the defendant's defence to the action to have inspection and copies of the letters mentioned in the affidavit of the plaintiffs.

Kemplay shewed cause.—The defendant is not entitled to the inspection which he asks for. In order to entitle a party to an action to a discovery, he must prove that he has a case, and that the documents are material and relevant to that case—Wigram on Discovery, 2nd edit. pp. 46, 261. Here the defendant has made out no affirmative case; and, indeed, there is nothing for him to prove, as all the issues are on the plaintiffs. An applicant is bound to inform the Court of the purpose for which a discovery is sought. How otherwise can the Court judge whether it is material? Cardale v. Watkins (5 Madd. 18), Guppy v. Few (Wigram on Discovery, 12).

Hannen, in support of the rule.—This is an action against an underwriter, and in such an action it was the practice even before the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. to order an inspection of letters and papers relating to the policy. A common form of such an order is in use at Judges' chambers. An underwriter at a distance is called upon to pay the amount of a constructive total loss, knowing nothing of the circumstances under which it is said to have taken place.

[LUSH, J.—Can you say that you are entitled to know all that is known by the assured at the time of the loss? You may be entitled to know all that is in their knowledge at the time of the policy.]

It is of special importance that the insurers should know the circumstances of the loss.

[J. Brown, amicus Curie, stated it was the practice to grant such orders even without an affidavit.]

In The Chartered Bank of India v. Rich (2 Best & S. 73; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 300), where the affidavit was in the same form as in this case, the inspection was refused on the ground that the Court, looking at all the circumstances, could not see that the discovery was material to the case of the party applying. In Thompson v. Robson (2 Hurl. & N. 412; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 367) the application was refused because the affidavit did not shew that the documents existed, or would be evidence in the cause. In Coleman v. Truman (3 Ibid. 371; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 5) the Court thought that communications between one of the parties and their agent before and after the matters in dispute were not privileged. The old rule as to allowing inspection in actions on policies is mentioned in Tidd's Practice, 9th ed. p. 591.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to the inspection for which he applies. The peculiar nature of the contract of insurance was, no doubt, the cause of an exception which has prevailed in the practice as to inspection of documents. The underwriter is so much at the mercy of the assured with regard to the circumstances under which a ship is abandoned, that he ought, as far as possible, to have all documents relating to the abandonment within his reach. These considerations appear to have led to the introduction of the old practice, and I think that they ought to guide us in the present case. I at first thought it doubtful whether the affidavit in support of the rule ought not to have disclosed the materials upon which the order for discovery of documents was made. But the affidavit specifies certain letters and documents, and states that it is material to the defendant's defence to the action to have inspection and copies of them. They may clearly be useful in enabling the underwriter to see whether it will be worth his while to defend the action or pay the amount claimed.

I think that whether it be demanded under the former practice or the Common Law Procedure Act, the inspection is material to the issue raised.

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Rule absolute.

Public Health Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 89).—Retrospective Rate for Charges within Six Months—Mandamus to enforce making of Rate.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. The 89th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. (the Public Health Act), enacts, that rates may be made "prospectively in order to raise money for the payment of future charges and expenses, or retrospectively in order to raise money for the payment of charges and expenses which may have been incurred at any time within six months before the making of the rate": Held, that inasmuch as a judgment properly obtained is a charge within this section—(see The Queen v. the Rotherham Local Board)—a mandamus lies to a local board of health to make a rate in aid of a judgment within six months after the judgment was obtained, though the action in which it was obtained was commenced more than six months after the claim accrued, if the delay in bringing the action is excused, and shewn not to have been an undue delay.

The plaintiff entered into contracts with the defendants, a local board of health, for the execution of works for the board, to be paid for out of money to be collected from those on whom the works were chargeable under the Public Health Act. The contracts were duly performed by the plaintiff, but the notices given by the defendants to the owners who were so chargeable were informal, and many of those who were liable refused to pay the sums assessed upon them. It became known to the plaintiff that the notices were defective, in February, 1860, and he then made a demand on the defendants; they were in hopes of being able to collect the money, notwithstanding the resistance to the notices, and 800l. was in fact collected and paid over to the plaintiff, the last payment being in November, 1860, leaving a balance of more than 3,000l. then due to the plaintiff. He commenced an action against the defendants early in the following December, and judgment was obtained by the plaintiff in that action. Within six months after he had obtained that judgment, the plaintiff commenced an action claiming a writ of mandamus, commanding the defendants to levy a rate to satisfy such judgment:—Held, that the delay in commencing the original action was excused and shewn not to be an undue delay, and a peremptory writ of mandamus to make and levy a rate, accordingly, was awarded.

This was an action claiming a writ of mandamus commenced on the 8th of July, 1862, in which, by consent of the parties, and by order of the Court of Queen's Bench, the following SPECIAL CASE, without pleadings, was stated for the opinion of the Court:

1. On the 10th of December, 1860, the plaintiffs commenced an action in the Court of Queen's Bench against the defendant, as clerk to the local board of health of Moss Side, for breaches of certain implied contracts, whereby the plaintiffs were prevented from recovering the sum of 3,310*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, the balance of four several sums mentioned respectively in four several contracts, as the price of certain works intended to be executed by the local board, under the provisions of the 69th section of the Public Health Act, 1848, and by the said contracts agreed to be done by the plaintiffs.

2. The first of the said contracts was dated the 10th of February, 1858, to be performed within six months, for the sum of 2,367*l.*; the second, the 7th of July, 1858, to be performed within five months, for the sum of 2,376*l.* 10*s.*; the third and fourth, the 17th of November, 1858, to be performed within four months, for the sums of 1,228*l.* and 1,122*l.* respectively. Under the first contract there were extra works to the extent of 38*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*; and under the second contract to the extent of 141*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*; and under the third contract to the extent of 34*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*; thus making the total claim of the plaintiffs under the contracts 7,308*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*

3. Each contract contained a provision stating that the contractors were to be paid for work done when and as the money was collected from the owners of the adjacent property.

4. Under the first and second of the said contracts the plaintiffs have been paid the sum of 1,994*l.* and 2,004*l.* respectively, being the whole of the monies recovered by the local board from the owners of the adjacent property in respect of the works included in those contracts; but under the third and fourth of the said contracts the plaintiffs have not been paid anything, the local board not having received anything from the owners of the adjacent property in respect of the work included in those two contracts.

5. The last payment made by the board to the plaintiffs was made on the 2nd of November, 1860, in respect of the contract dated the 10th of February, 1858.

6. After the parties had pleaded to issue in the action which was so commenced on the 10th of December, 1860, they agreed to state the facts in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, and that special case, with the pleadings and contracts in the former action, is annexed to the present case in the form of an appendix (See Worthington v. Sudlow, 31 Law. J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 131), and may be referred to as part thereof; and the facts stated in that case are admitted to be true.

7. The special case was argued in Easter Term, 1862, and the Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs (See Worthington v. Sudlow, 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 131); and on the 8th of May, 1862, the plaintiffs signed and entered up their judgment for the sum of 3,467*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, being the said sum of 3,310*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, and the plaintiffs' costs of suit.

8. After that day, and before the commencement of the present action, the plaintiffs having ascertained that the local board had no funds in their hands for the satisfying of the judgment debt, demanded that a general district rate should be levied by the board to satisfy the said sum of 3,467*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and it is admitted that if the local board are by law liable to levy such a rate, that demand was a valid demand, and that a reasonable time for complying with it elapsed before the commencement of the present action; also, that the plaintiffs are personally interested in the subject of the present action to the entire amount of the said judgment debt.

9. It is admitted that, as regards the first two contracts, such general district rate, if made and levied, would have to be made and levied, amongst others, upon and in respect of those properties the owners of which had before the commencement of the former action paid all such portions of the said several sums mentioned in such two contracts as had been assessed upon, and demanded of them, as such owners, and paid by the board to the plaintiffs. It is also admitted, that the several streets, in respect of which the works in the said contracts were performed, have not yet been declared highways.

10. The works mentioned in the four several contracts, including the extras, were all completed within the stipulated times, all the works and all the extras having been completed on the 17th of March, 1859.

11. The proportions payable by the owners of the property adjacent to the works comprised in the first three contracts were settled and apportioned by the surveyor of the board; and notices of the amount so settled and apportioned as due from such owners respectively were given to them as to the first two contracts, in the year 1858, and as to the third contract on or before the 21st of April, 1859, and no notice to dispute the same was at any time given by any such owners. Immediately upon the expiration of three months from the times of the notices of apportionment the amounts so settled and apportioned were demanded.

12. The proportions payable by the owners of the property adjacent to the works comprised in the fourth contract for 1,122*l.*, were settled and apportioned by the surveyor of the board, and notices of the amounts so settled and apportioned as due from such owners respectively were given to them some time between the 3rd and 16th of November, 1859, and no notice to dispute the same was at any time given by any of such owners; and immediately upon the expiration of three months from the time of the notices of apportionment, payment of the amounts so settled and apportioned was demanded and refused.

13. The local board having failed to obtain payment from some of the owners of their shares of the expenses comprised in the first contract, were advised to endeavour to obtain them from the occupiers, and accordingly on the 19th of January, 1859, they declared such expenses to be private improvement expenses, and levied a rate upon the respective occupiers, and, among others, upon a Mr. Thomas Naden, who occupied property belonging to a Mr. Lawton, for 15*l.* 13*s.* 5½*d.*, to be paid within a period of five years. Mr. Naden did not pay any portion of this rate, and the local board therefore summoned him to appear before the Justices of Lancashire, on the 29th of March, 1860. Mr. Naden then appeared, and the summons was then dismissed. The local board served notice of appeal against such dismissal on the 13th of April, 1860; but such appeal was not prosecuted. No other proceedings were taken against Mr. Naden, nor were any taken against any other person upon whom the said rate had been assessed.

14. The local board took proceedings against Mr. Thomas Willis, to recover from him, as an owner, the sum of 41*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, being his apportioned share of the expenses comprised in the third contract, and summoned him before the Justices on the 13th of October, 1859, when such summons was dismissed. One or two other summonses against owners were pending at the time when the one against Mr. Thomas Willis was heard; but in consequence of the result, they were not prosecuted.

15. The local board failed on the several proceedings hereinbefore mentioned, on the ground that the notices given by the board under the 69th section of the Public Health Act, in respect of the works included in the said contracts respectively, were bad, and such notices were in fact decided by the Justices to be bad, more than six calendar months before the said action of the 10th of December, 1860, was commenced. The notices to owners in respect to all the four contracts were identical with those given by the board to Lawton, the owner of the property occupied by Naden, and to Mr. Willis. And one of the streets in which the plaintiffs had by the said contracts agreed to execute the said works, and in respect whereof notices had been served by the board on the owners of property in such street, was called Whalley Road, and one of the last-mentioned notices had been held to be bad by the Court of Quarter Sessions sitting at Salford, on the authority of a case of Parkinson v. the Corporation of Blackburn, which had been recently decided in the Court of Queen's Bench. This case is reported in volume 33 of the Law Times, p. 119.

16. In the month of February, 1860, the plaintiffs' attornies wrote to the then clerk of the said board a letter, of which the following is a copy.

“ Clarence Buildings, Manchester,
“ 1st February, 1860.

“ Dear Sir,—Messrs. W. & J. Worthington, of this city, contractors, have been advising with us respecting their claims for paving, sewerage, &c., various streets, &c., in the district of Moss Side. The accounts, as we are informed, amount to upwards of 4,000*l.*, and as this large sum has been owing for some time, Messrs. Worthington are naturally desirous to have a definite arrangement made for the payment, the more especially as they understand that serious differences exist between the board and the landowners, and that the owners of property in Whalley Road (one of the streets, &c., paved by them) have been declared by a judicial decision exempt from any liability to pay for the paving, &c., of that street, on the ground that the notices to pave, &c., which it was the duty of the board to give to the owners, were defective and bad.

“ As your board meets on Thursday next, our clients instruct us to require, in the course of the present week, definite replies to the following questions: 1st. When and how Messrs. Worthington will be paid for paving, &c., Whalley Road and any other streets the owners of which have been judicially exempted from liability to pay their accounts to the board? 2nd. Whether any other accounts claimed by the board from the owners of the land fronting the streets paved by Messrs. Worthington have been judicially declared irrecoverable through the neglect of the board to give the requisite notices, or for any other reason; and if so, what were the amounts of such accounts, from whom and in respect of what streets were they claimed? 3rd. Whether all the notices given by the board in respect of the other streets paved by Messrs. Worthington are similar to the notices given in respect of Whalley Road, and liable to be objected to by the owners on the same grounds, and whether the board will seek to compel the owners to pay their accounts? 4th. When and how Messrs. Worthington will be paid their accounts for paving streets other than Whalley Road?—Yours truly, “ Rowley & Son.

“ John Thompson, Esq.,

“ Clerk to The Moss Side Local Board of Health.”

This letter was laid before a meeting of the said board on the 2nd of February, 1860, when it was ordered that the clerk should see Messrs. Rowley & Son in reference to the letter, and communicate the result of the interview to the next meeting. At the next meeting of the board, held on the 9th of February, 1860, the clerk having said that he had seen Messrs. Rowley & Son and obtained a short delay in their commencing proceedings, it was ordered that the clerk should see Messrs. Rowley & Son again, and endeavour to obtain a more satisfactory arrangement with them.

17. The then clerk to the board informed Messrs. Rowley & Son at that interview that all the notices were similar to the notices given in respect of Whalley Road, and must be taken to be objected to by the owners on the same grounds.

18. Until a few weeks previously to the commencement of the said action of the 10th of December, 1860, the local board were in expectation of collecting the monies from the landowners notwithstanding the badness of the notices: and this was stated to the plaintiffs' attorneys by the present defendant, and to the plaintiffs by several members of the local board.

19. The Court were to have power to draw any inference of fact necessary for the decision of the present action, or for enabling them to give judgment therein.

20. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain the present action and to have a general district rate levied by the local board for the payment to the plaintiffs of the said sum of 3,467*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, or any and what part thereof.

21. If the Court should answer the said question in the affirmative, the plaintiffs are to be entitled to judgment according to the 70th and 71st sections of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

22. If the Court should answer the said question in the negative, judgment is to be entered for the defendant according to the same sections.

The case was argued, in Easter Term, May 5, 1865.

Mellish (Crompton Hutton with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that the present case fell within The Queen v. the Rotherham Local Board of Health (8 El. & B. 906; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 156), and not within Burland v. the Kingston-upon-Hull Local Board of Health (3 Best & S. 271; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 17).

T. Jones (R. G. Williams with him), for the defendants, contended that if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, the policy of section 89. of the Public Health Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 62. would be defeated; and he referred to the Local Government Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 5.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court¹ was now (Nov. 20) delivered by—

MELLOR, J.—This is a case in which the plaintiffs claim a writ of mandamus to be directed to the Local Board of Health of Moss Side, to make and levy a district rate for the payment of a judgment obtained by the plaintiffs against the local board.

The plaintiffs had entered into four contracts with the local board for the execution of works for the board. By these contracts the plaintiffs were to be paid out of the monies collected from those on whom the expenses of the works were chargeable under the Public Health Act. The contracts were duly performed by the plaintiffs. It unfortunately happened that the notices given by the local board to the owners were informal,² and, consequently, that they could not be enforced against such as resisted them. Some time elapsed before it was known that any objection would be made by any one, and some further time necessarily elapsed before it was ascertained that the objections were valid; but, at all events, as early as February, 1860, it was known to the plaintiffs that the notices were defective; and in that month their solicitor applied to the local board. The writ on which the judgment sought to be enforced was obtained did not issue until the 10th of December, 1860, more than six months after the plaintiffs were aware of the facts constituting their cause of action. The reasons of this delay are stated in the case.

It appears that the local board were still in the expectation of being able to collect the money, notwithstanding the badness of the notices, and that they did, in fact, obtain 800*l.*, which was paid over to the plaintiffs, the last payment being as late as in November, and only a few weeks before the writ on which the judgment was obtained issued.

Power is reserved in the case to draw inferences of fact; and we draw the inference that, under such circumstances, there was no improper delay or laches on the part of the plaintiffs, nor any blame imputable to them or their advisers. Still, it is undeniable that a period of more than six months elapsed, during which the plaintiffs might practically have commenced their action, and did not.

The plaintiffs recovered judgment in this Court for upwards of 3,000*l.* The present writ was issued within six months after the judgment, and everything subsequent to the judgment is admitted to have been right. The one point, therefore, which we have to decide is whether the delay, in fact, of more than six months in commencing the original action is a bar to the plaintiffs' claim for a mandamus to make the rate, though that delay is shewn to be excused by the circumstances, so as not to be improper or to amount to laches.

There are only two cases decided which in any way bear upon the subject. In The Queen v. the Rotherham Local Board (8 El. & B. 906; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 156) the action was commenced in July, 1856, being within six months after the cause of action accrued. Judgment was signed in that month under a Judge's order, by which execution was stayed till the 27th of December, 1856, being more than six months after the cause of action had accrued.

A writ of mandamus was obtained on the 10th of June, 1857, more than six months after the judgment was signed, but within six months after it was enforceable. The decision of the Court was that the judgment was a fresh charge on the day when the judgment was enforceable, and that the postponement of the execution by arrangement with the local board was not objectionable. This latter part of the decision, that a delay by arrangement with the local board is not fatal to the plaintiff's claim, affords an argument in favour of the present plaintiff's contention, that a delay rendered reasonable by the circumstances is not necessarily fatal, though certainly it falls short of a positive decision in their favour.

In Burland v. the Hull Local Board of Health (3 Best & S. 271; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 17) the plaintiffs had a cause of action against the local board for money had and received, which had accrued in 1856; the action, in which judgment was signed by default, had been commenced in 1862, very nearly six years after the cause of action had accrued, and there was nothing whatever to explain or excuse this very long delay. This Court, under such circumstances, gave judgment against the plaintiffs' claim for a mandamus. Our late Brother Wightman used language that seems to indicate an opinion that it was essential that the action should be commenced within six months after the accruing of the cause of action. This is in favour of the defendants, though it was not the point in the case. The other three members of the Court do not intimate any such opinion. The Lord Chief Justice, in his judgment, said, "I protest against the doctrine that in order to get the benefit of any judgment, no matter what, the jurisdiction of this Court is to be invoked to give subsidiary aid by mandamus." And in substance the other two Judges said the same. And all that was necessary for the decision of the case, and all that can be considered as really decided by it, was, that a plaintiff could not claim as of right a mandamus to enforce a judgment where there was great and unexcused delay in commencing the original action.

We are therefore called upon to decide this point for the first time, unassisted, but at the same time unfettered, by authority. The legislature, in the Public Health Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 89, has enacted that rates may be made "prospectively in order to raise money for the payment of future charges and expenses, or retrospectively in order to raise money for the payment of charges and expenses which may have been incurred at any time within six months before the making of the rate." This language shews that they were alive to the desirability that the charges which were to be defrayed by a fluctuating body of ratepayers should be levied promptly; but the attention of the legislature does not seem to have been drawn to the probability that it might not always be possible to ascertain and enforce a claim against the board within six months after the claim has accrued.

The Rotheram case (8 El. & B. 906; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 156) decides that a judgment, when properly obtained, is a charge within the meaning of this section; and when that is decided, the case is within the literal words of the section. We feel that there is great difficulty in the case; but, on the whole, we think we best effectuate the intention of the legislature, and at the same time further the ends of justice, by holding that a rate may be ordered in aid of a judgment, within six months after that judgment was obtained, though the action on which the judgment was obtained was commenced more than six months after the claim accrued, if the delay is excused, and shewn not to have been undue. We do not mean to throw any doubt on the decision in Burland v. the Local Board of Hull (3 Best & S. 271; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 17), that where there has been undue delay the mandamus should not go. In the present case, we think the delay is explained and justified, and we therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs.

Peremptory writ of mandamus awarded.

Nuisance—Actionable Injury—Injury to Property—Personal Discomfort—User of Property—“Suitable” or “Convenient” Locality.

NUISANCE.—In actions brought for nuisance, a difference is to be marked between an action brought for a nuisance on the ground that the alleged nuisance produces material injury to property, and an action brought for a nuisance on the ground that the alleged nuisance is productive of sensible personal discomfort. In certain cases a submission is required from persons living in society to that amount of discomfort which may be necessary for the legitimate and free exercise of the trade of their neighbours, which would not be required to circumstances the immediate result of which is sensible injury to the value of property.

Therefore, where T. became the proprietor of an estate, and shortly afterwards other persons commenced smelting operations, which caused noxious vapours, whereby material injury was done to the trees and shrubs of T., it was held (affirming the judgment of the Courts of Exchequer Chamber and Queen's Bench) that, in an action brought by T. in respect of the injury caused by such vapours, the learned Judge had rightly directed the jury to find for the plaintiff if they were satisfied that real sensible injury had been done to the enjoyment of his property, or the value of it, by reason of the noxious vapours which had been sent forth from the defendants' works; and had also rightly directed the jury that the place where any works were carried on so as to occasion an actionable injury to another was not, in the meaning of the law, a convenient place.

This was a proceeding in appeal from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (4 Best & S. 616), sitting in error from the Court of Queen's Bench (Ibid. 608), confirming the judgment given in that Court refusing a rule to shew cause why the verdict found for the plaintiff below should not be set aside and a new trial had between the parties.

The parties are here described as in the proceedings in the Queen's Bench.

In May, 1863, an action was brought in the Court of Queen's Bench by the plaintiff, Mr. Tipping, against the defendants. The declaration in the action alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of a certain messuage, dwelling-house and premises, with gardens, parks and lands adjoining; and was also entitled to the reversion of certain lands and premises near to the said dwelling-house in the possession of his tenants; that the defendants erected, used, and continued to use certain smelting-works upon land near to the said dwelling-house and lands of the plaintiff, and caused large quantities of noxious gases, vapours and other noxious matter to issue from the said works and diffuse themselves over the land and premises of the plaintiff, whereby the hedges, trees, shrubs, fruit and herbage were greatly injured, the cattle were rendered unhealthy, and the plaintiff was prevented from having so beneficial a use of the said land and premises as he would otherwise have enjoyed; and also the reversionary lands and premises were depreciated in value.

The defendants pleaded not guilty.

The plaintiff joined issue on the plea, and the cause was tried, before Mellor, J., at Liverpool, in August, 1863.

It was clearly proved at the trial that the vapours exhaling from the works of the defendants caused great injury to the trees and shrubs on the property of the plaintiff.

The learned Judge, in summing up the evidence, directed the jury as follows: "This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the Saint Helens Smelting Company, for what he says is an actionable injury, which has been occasioned by their works to the property which he purchased, and of which he is the owner, and in some sense the occupier."—[After some observations, in regard to damages, the learned Judge proceeded]—A man has, no doubt, a right to exercise certain rights, and to act upon his own property. He has certain rights of property, and within the limits of those rights he may do any act which is not unlawful. When I say unlawful, I mean any act which is not wrong: he may erect a lime-kiln, if it is in a convenient place; but the meaning of the word "convenient" I shall venture to interpret to you as being that it must be plain that he will not do an actionable injury to another, because a man may not use his own property so as to injure his neighbour. When he sends on the property of his neighbour noxious smells, or smoke, or vapours, then he is not doing an act on his own property only, but he is doing an act on his neighbour's property also, because every man by common law has a right to the pure air, and to have no noxious smells sent on his land, unless by a period of time a man has, by what is called a prescriptive right, obtained the power of throwing a burthen upon his neighbour's property. If a man for twenty-one years or more has carried on in a particular district a work which is noxious to his neighbours, and has for a period of time sent noxious smells and impure air over the neighbourhood, and that has been submitted to for twenty years, he gets in time what is called a prescriptive right to do what he has done. But here you have no prescriptive right at all; there is nothing of that sort in the case. You are to consider this as if done quite recently, within a very few years indeed; therefore you are not embarrassed by any considerations of that sort. Now, that being the case, I tell you that if a man by an act—either by the erection of a lime-kiln, or brick-kiln, or copper works, or any works of that description—sends over his neighbour's land that which is noxious and hurtful to an extent which sensibly diminishes the comfort and value of the property, and the comfort of existence on the property, that is an actionable injury. That is what I tell you is the law, gentlemen. But when you are coming to the question of facts, there is no doubt you must take into consideration a variety of circumstances. In considering whether or not a man's property has been sensibly injured by the actions of another person on his own land, of course you will consider the place, the circumstances, and the whole nature of the thing. It would not be sufficient merely to say that noxious vapours have come on the man's property, but you must consider to what degree and to what extent they have come, and whether they have come from the premises of the defendants. Now with respect to that, I do not think I can lay it down in better words than I find expressed in a note to a very admirable book, edited by a gentleman, now dead, who was an eminent lawyer, and whose loss is a loss to be deplored. He says, on the question of fact: "Whether a nuisance has been caused by the defendants at all, the nature of the locality, the work, and every other fact in the case, must be taken into consideration;" and so Chief Justice Erle said, in a case which has been handed up to me: 'The time, the locality, and so on, are all circumstances to be taken into consideration upon the question of fact whether an actionable injury has been occasioned by a man to his neighbour or not.' Now, gentlemen, you must apply your common sense to the question on the one side and the other. The defendants say, If you do not mind you will stop the progress of works of this description. I agree that that is so, because, no doubt, in the county of Lancaster, above all other counties, where great works have been created and carried on, and are the means of developing the national wealth, you must not stand on extreme rights and allow a person to say, I will bring an action against you for this and that, and so on. Business could not go on if that were so. Everything must be looked at from a reasonable point of view; therefore the law does not regard trifling and small inconveniences, but only regards sensible inconveniences, injuries which sensibly diminish the comfort, enjoyment or value of the property which is affected. Therefore, you see, there are two questions here, and, no doubt, they are questions of some difficulty. At the same time, when you come to a review of all the facts, it will be for you to say whether or not the plaintiff has not affirmatively satisfied you that, whether to the extent suggested by his witnesses or not, or whether to some lesser extent only, there has not been sent out, clearly distinguishable as from the defendants' works, noxious vapours which have affected the trees and shrubs. If they have sensibly affected the trees and shrubs, and if they come from the defendants' works, they do tend to diminish the real comfort and enjoyment of the estate, because if a man has got a fine estate and gardens and plantations, and they are got up with care, and noxious vapours are sent from neighbouring works on these trees and shrubs, so as to cause them to decay and crumble up, and if it can be traced to be the result of noxious vapours from neighbouring works, it is perfectly clear that it is an actionable injury, because it does affect the enjoyment and comfort of a place which a man with care, and the application of his wealth, has created for his own enjoyment. Now, the defendants' case really consists in this: that the district of Saint Helens seems to be, as one of the witnesses said, without a living tree, and that the hedges are universally blackened and destroyed. In point of fact, no one who rides about in this county, and the manufacturing parts of it, and other counties, can fail to observe that in the neighbourhood of such large towns, where smoky chimneys exist, even although there may not be alkali or copper works, the effect on vegetation and trees and shrubs is very clear, marked and distinct; you cannot shut your eyes to that fact. It was said by a gentleman, who was called by the defendants, to have been very much the character of the district for many years past. Mr. Brett, on the other hand, says 'It is all very well to say so. No doubt, there were manufactories carried on in this neighbourhood; but I have called witnesses to shew that these works were works in operation before the plaintiffs came there; and that up to a period contemporaneous with the beginning of the defendants' works, which was in 1861, when they began under the old company, being afterwards continued in the autumn of 1862 by the new company.' He says, 'I will shew you that up to that time these trees were in good condition and healthy, notwithstanding the works continued in operation. I say that they were not such as you would find in Cheshire or in some of the southern districts of England; but they were in good condition.'—[And after further comments on the evidence, the learned Judge proceeded]—But, gentlemen, looking fairly at the evidence on both sides, taking those considerations into view which I have alluded to, I ask you, has the plaintiff satisfied you that the effect of the noxious vapours to a sensible extent can be traced to have come from the defendants' works to his property, and so to have injured it? Applying the rule of law which I have laid down, you will be good enough to consider whether you think that has been made out to your satisfaction; because this is a case in which the burthen of the proof rests on the plaintiff, inasmuch as he seeks to recover from the defendants damages which, he says, have been occasioned to his estate. But if you are satisfied of that, you must find your verdict for the plaintiff, with such damages as you think you can reasonably assign—you must grope your way in the best way you can. Sometimes you are told the noxious vapour is mixed; sometimes it is not mixed; sometimes it comes from one works, sometimes from another, although probably in a less degree, because it appears that the farther it travels the less condensed it is, and the less likely to do mischief. Therefore, the nearer the works are, if it comes in the direction of the plaintiff's property, the more likely the vapour is to do mischief, because it is more likely to be concentrated; but the longer it travels through the atmosphere the more it becomes weakened or reduced by the addition of the water in the atmosphere. Consider all these circumstances, and apply your own experience to the evidence which has been given, and then say, has the plaintiff satisfied you that a real, sensible injury has been done to the enjoyment of his property, or the value of it, by reason of the noxious vapours which have been sent forth from time to time from the defendants' works. If that is made out to your satisfaction, you will find for the plaintiff; and if it is not made out to your satisfaction, you will find a verdict for the defendants.

The jury intimated that they found for the plaintiff. Damages, 861*l.* 18*s.* 4½*d.*

The learned Judge then put the following questions to them:

MELLOR, J.—Was the enjoyment of the plaintiff's property sensibly diminished?—The Foreman: We think so.

MELLOR, J.—Do you consider the business there carried on to be an ordinary business for smelting copper?—The Foreman: We consider it an ordinary business, and conducted in a proper manner—in as good a manner as possible.

MELLOR, J.—And do you consider, supposing that made any difference, that it was carried on in a proper place?—The Foreman: Well, no, we do not.

In November, 1863, the defendants moved for a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted on the following grounds: 1. That the learned Judge misdirected the jury in directing them that an actionable injury was one producing sensible discomfort, without, at the same time, directing them as to the evidence respecting the purchase of the property by the plaintiff, the existence of the work at the time of the purchase, the character of the locality, the requirements of the public as to a necessary and ordinary trade conducted in a suitable manner, and other surrounding circumstances. 2. That the learned Judge should have directed the jury as to the character of the locality. 3. That having reference to the character of the locality and the trade, the learned Judge should have directed the jury, as matter of law, that the same was carried on in a proper place. 4. That there was no sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury that the damage was done exclusively by the works of the defendants. 5. That the learned Judge should have directed the jury to take into consideration the improved nature of the property by reason of the works complained of. 6. That the learned Judge should have directed the jury that the works having been established at the time the plaintiff purchased the property, an action for nuisance was not maintainable, if the works were carried on in a proper manner and without wilful negligence.

The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment, refusing to grant the rule; the following judgment being delivered by—

COCKBURN, C.J.—In my opinion there should be no rule. The direction of my Brother Mellor to the jury cannot be found fault with, in my opinion, when looked at by the light of the decision of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of Bamford v. Turnley (3 Best & S. 62, 66; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 286), that decision overruling the decision of the Common Pleas, and establishing that it is not right to put to the jury, where a case of nuisance has been made out, whether the place is a proper and convenient one for the carrying on a work of that nature, or whether the carrying on of such work or manufacture was a reasonable use by the defendant of his own property. If that question be excluded with reference to the circumstances relating to the relative positions of the plaintiff and defendants as private individuals, it seems to me utterly inconsistent with sound reasoning to say that such a question or questions can be considered with reference to the interests of the public. I own that it is quite new to me to learn that, without compensation on the part of the public, a private individual is precluded from complaining and obtaining redress for a private injury on the score of the benefits which may accrue to the public from the injury he thus sustains. I do own that it seems to me to be getting out of the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber and the law as established by that decision. Upon that decision I desire at present to pronounce no opinion. I am bound by it, and must act upon it; but I cannot help taking this opportunity of saying that, if where A. sustains a nuisance by the act of B. you are precluded from submitting to the jury the consideration of the grounds on which B. might allege this was a reasonable use and a proper and convenient place on his property for the purpose of the manufactory complained of, but that you can take that matter, and all the surrounding circumstances into consideration, if you add to the case of B. that of C, D, E. and F, and saying that, taking the interests of all those parties combined, B. has an answer to the action of A. in respect of the nuisance A. sustains at his hands, that seems to me to be altogether an untenable doctrine and an illogical mode of establishing it; and I take this opportunity of dissenting altogether, so far as I am concerned, from the doctrine as laid down. For the present purpose it is only necessary for me to say that, according to the decision of Bamford v. Turnley (3 Best & S. 62, 66; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 286), the summing up of my learned Brother was perfectly right, with, perhaps, this observation,—that, if anything, it would have been the other side that would have had reason to complain. However, there can be no doubt that the question is one of very great importance, and if the defendants feel disposed, considering the position of these parties, and the interests involved, to take it to the highest tribunal, we ought to assist them in so doing; and therefore, although we grant no rule, and we are bound by that decision, yet we shall willingly give leave to take the case up to the Court above.

Against this judgment the defendants appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, when the following points were stated for argument on behalf of the plaintiff and defendants respectively.

The defendants' points—1. That sensible discomfort from the carrying on of a necessary trade in a reasonable manner and in a suitable locality is not an actionable injury. 2. That the learned Judge misdirected the jury as to what constituted an actionable injury. 3. That the learned Judge ought to have directed the jury as to the character of the locality, the circumstances of the purchase, and the improved value of the property, by reason of the works, as material for their consideration; as to whether the injury was or was not actionable, and as to the amount of the damages. 4. That the suitability of the locality is matter of law, as to which the learned Judge should have directed the jury. 5. That the learned Judge should have directed the jury that there was no sufficient evidence of the damage being due to the works of the defendants exclusively; or upon which the damage due to the works of the defendants could be ascertained. 6. That the plaintiff was not entitled to sustain the action, or to recover substantial damages for the necessary consequence of a trade established and carried on, with his knowledge, before and at the time of the acquiring the property alleged to be depreciated in value.

The plaintiff's points—That the finding of the jury is conclusive in his favour; and that no person has a right, to the damage of his neighbour, to carry on in an improper place any noxious trade, however conducted that trade may be. And, moreover, that no person is allowed by law to inflict damage on his neighbour or his estate in the absence of prescription, grant or right so to do.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber confirmed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench; the judgments being as follows:

ERLE, C.J.—We think that the judgment ought to be affirmed, and that there is no misdirection.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I have only to reiterate what has fallen from me in the course of the argument—my opinion has not been always that which it is now. I am compelled to say that which I now pronounce to be the law, not entertaining that opinion. I think that, acting upon what has been decided in this Court, my Brother Mellor's direction is not open to a bill of exceptions, and is not open to question in this Court.

Hence the present appeal.

The following learned Judges were present during the hearing of the appeal, viz., Blackburn, J., Shee, J., Willes, J., Keating, J., Martin, B. and Pigott, B.

The Attorney General and Webster, for the appellants, pursued the same line of argument as that defined in the points for argument in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and referred to Hole v. Barlow (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 207), Bamford v. Turnley (3 Best & S. 62, 66; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 286), Cavey v. Lidbetter (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 470; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104), The Wanstead Local Board of Health v. Hill (Ibid. 479; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 135), The Stockport Waterworks Company v. Potter (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 9), and Com. Dig., tit. 'Action upon the Case for a Nuisance' (C.).

Mellish, Milward and Brett, for the respondent, were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, as your Lordships, as well as myself, have listened carefully to the argument on the part of the appellants, and are perfectly satisfied with the decision of the Court below, and you are of opinion that, subject to what we may hear from the learned Judges, the direction is right, I would submit to your Lordships that these questions should be put to the learned Judges; but at the same time the learned Judges will be good enough to understand that if they desire further argument of the case, the respondent's counsel must be heard. Unless the learned Judges express their desire for further argument, your Lordships will, I think, concur with me that the questions ought to be as follows:

Whether the directions given by the learned Judge at Nisi Prius to the jury were correct, or whether a new trial ought to be granted in this case.

The learned Judges will intimate to your Lordships whether they desire to hear further argument on the part of the respondent's counsel, or whether they are prepared to answer the questions put to them by your Lordships.

The learned Judges having intimated that they did not desire any further argument of the case, the Lord Chancellor put the questions as suggested.

MARTIN, B.—My Lords, in answer to the questions proposed by your Lordships to the Judges, I have to state their unanimous opinion that the directions given by the learned Judge to the jury are correct, and that a new trial ought not to be granted. As far as the experience of all of us goes, the directions are such as we have given in these cases for the last twenty years.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I think your Lordships will be satisfied with the answer we have received from the learned Judges to the question put by the House.

In matters of this description it appears to me that it is a very desirable thing to mark the difference between an action brought for a nuisance upon the ground that the alleged nuisance produces material injury to the property, and an action brought for a nuisance on the ground that the thing alleged to be a nuisance is productive of sensible personal discomfort.

With regard to the latter, namely, the personal inconvenience and interference with one's enjoyment, one's quiet, one's personal freedom, anything that discomposes or injuriously affects the senses or the nerves, whether that may or may not be denominated a nuisance, must, undoubtedly, depend greatly on the circumstance where the thing complained of actually occurs. If a man lives in a town, of necessity he should subject himself to the consequences of those operations of trade which may be carried on in his immediate locality, which are actually necessary for trade and commerce; also for the enjoyment of property, and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town and of the public at large. If a man lives in a street where there are numerous shops, and a shop is opened next door to him which is carried on in a fair and reasonable way, he has no ground for complaint because to himself individually there may arise much discomfort from the trade carried on in that shop; but when an occupation is carried on by one person in the neighbourhood of another, and the result of that trade or occupation or business is a material injury, then, unquestionably, arises a very different consideration, and I think that in a case of that description the submission which is required from persons living in society to that amount of discomfort which may be necessary for the legitimate and free exercise of the trade of their neighbours would not apply to circumstances the immediate result of which is sensible injury to the value of the property.

Now, in the present case, it appears that the plaintiff purchased a very valuable estate, which lies within a mile and a half from large smelting-works. What the occupation of these copper-smelting premises were anterior to the year 1860 does not clearly appear. The plaintiff became the proprietor of an estate of great value in the month of June, 1860. In the month of September, 1860, very extensive smelting operations began on the property of the present appellants, the works at Saint Helens. Of the effect of the vapours exhaled from these works upon the plaintiff's property, and the injury done to the trees and shrubs there is abundance of evidence. The action has been brought for that. The jury have found the existence of the injury, and the only ground upon which your Lordships are asked to set aside that verdict and to direct a new trial is this—that the whole neighbourhood where these copper-smelting works were carried on is a neighbourhood more or less devoted to manufacturing purposes, and therefore it is said that, inasmuch as this copper-smelting is carried on in what the appellants contend is a fit place, it may be carried on with impunity, although the result may be the utter destruction, or the very considerable diminution, of the value of the plaintiff's property. I apprehend that that is not the meaning of the word "suitable," or the meaning of the word "convenient," within the law as laid down on the subject. The word "suitable" unquestionably cannot carry with it this consequence, that a trade may be carried on in a particular locality, the consequence of which trade may be injury and destruction to the neighbouring property. Of course, I except the cases where any prescriptive right has been acquired by a lengthened user of the place.

On these grounds, therefore, shortly, without dilating further upon them,—they are sufficiently unfolded by the judgment of the learned Judge in the Court below,—I advise your Lordships to affirm the decision of the Court below, and to refuse this appeal, and refuse it with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, and also in the opinion expressed by the Judges, that this has been considered to be the proper mode of directing a jury, as Mr. Baron Martin said, for at least twenty years. I believe I should have carried it back rather further. I have always understood that the proper question was—and I cannot do better than adopt the language of Mr. Justice Mellor—"it must be plain that persons using a lime-kiln, or other works which emit noxious vapours, may not do an actionable injury to another, and that that place where it is carried on so that it does occasion an actionable injury to another is not, in the meaning of the law, a convenient place."—I always understood that to be so; but, in truth, as was observed in one of the cases by the learned Judges, it is extremely difficult to lay down any actual definition of what constitutes an injury, because in truth, it is always a question of compound facts which must be looked to, to see whether or not the mode of carrying it on did or did not occasion so serious an injury as to interfere with the comforts of life and enjoyment of property.

I perfectly well remember, when I had the honour of being one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, trying a case in the county of Durham, when there was an action for smoke in the town of Shields. It was proved incontestably that smoke did come, and in some degree interfered with a certain person; but I said you must look at it now with a view to the question, not whether abstractedly that quantity of smoke was a nuisance, but whether it was a nuisance to the person living in the town of Shields, because, if it only added, and in an infinitesimal degree, to the quantity of smoke, I thought that the state of the town rendered it altogether impossible to call that a nuisance. There is nothing of that sort in the present case. It seems to me that the distinction in matter of fact was most correctly pointed out by Mr. Justice Mellor, and I do not think he could possibly have stated the law either abstractedly or with reference to the facts, better than he has done in this case.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—My Lords, I entirely agree in opinion with both my noble and learned friends in this case. In these few sentences I think everything is included: "The defendants say, If you do not mind, you will stop the progress of works of this description. I agree that that is so, because, no doubt, in the county of Lancaster, above all other counties, where great works have been created and carried on, and are the means of developing the national wealth, you must not stand on extreme rights and allow a person to say, I will bring an action against you for this and that, and so on. Business could not go on if that were so. Everything must be looked at from a reasonable point of view; therefore the law does not regard trifling and small inconveniences, but only regards sensible inconveniences—injuries which sensibly diminish the comfort, enjoyment or value of the property which is affected." I do not think that the question could have been more correctly laid down by any one to the jury, and I entirely concur in the propriety of dismissing this appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Ship and Shipping—Diversity of Laws—Bottomry—Authority of Master to bind Owner—Abandonment.

CONTRACT. SHIPPING.—The rights of parties under a contract not expressly provided for thereby, but arising incidentally within the sphere of the relation created by it, are to be determined by that general law which the parties intended to govern the transaction, or rather by which they may justly be presumed to have bound themselves.

Primâ facie, the law of the place where a contract is made is that which the parties intended, or ought to be presumed to have adopted, as the footing upon which they dealt, and such law ought to prevail in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention; but a contract of affreightment made between a charterer and owners of the ship, being persons of different nationalities, in a place where both of them were foreigners, to be performed partly there by the ship breaking ground in order to start for the port of loading, a place where both parties would also have been foreigners; partly at the latter port, by taking the cargo on board; and partly on board the ship at sea, subject there to the laws of the country of the ship; and partly by final delivery at the port of discharge, is to be construed by the law of the nation of the ship.

* Coram Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Willes, J., Keating, J. and Pigott, B.

The pleadings are set out in the report of the case in the Court below (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 241).

The facts disclosed by the record are as follows:

The plaintiff below, a British subject at St. Thomas, a Danish West India island, chartered the ship Alivier, belonging to the defendants, who are Frenchmen, for the voyage from St. Marc to Haiti, to Havre, London or Liverpool, at the charterer's option.

The plaintiff must have known that the ship was French. The charter-party was entered into by the master, in pursuance of his general authority as master, and not under any special authority from the owner. The plaintiff shipped a cargo at St. Marc for Liverpool, with which the vessel sailed. On her voyage she sustained damage from a storm, which compelled her to put into Fayal, a Portuguese port, for repair. There the master properly borrowed money upon bottomry of the ship, freight and cargo, and repaired the ship, which proceeded with the cargo, and arrived in safety at Liverpool.

The bondholder proceeded in the Court of Admiralty against ship, freight and cargo. The ship and freight were insufficient to satisfy the bond. The deficiency and costs fell upon the plaintiff as owner of the cargo, and in respect thereof he seeks to be indemnified by the defendants as shipowners.

Crompton Hutton argued for the appellant; and, besides other authorities alluded to in the judgment of the Court, referred to Benson v. Duncan (3 Exch. Rep. 644; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 169) and Pope v. Nickerson (3 Stor. 465).

Hodgson argued for the respondents.—The arguments are, however, so fully referred to in the judgment of the Court that it is unnecessary to set them out here.

WILLES, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court, and, after referring to the facts as above stated, proceeded:—The defendants abandoned the ship and freight, and it must be taken as a fact, because it is alleged, and not denied, that by the law of France they abandoned in such time and in such manner and under such circumstances as are required by the French law; and that according to such law, abandonment (by which we understand a giving up of the ship and freight to the shippers—see Dakin v. Oxley (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 665), absolved them from liability.

This law, if applicable, is one which furnishes an absolute bar to the plaintiff's claim by way of satisfaction or discharge, and affected the validity of the claim, and not merely the mode of proceeding to enforce it. Whether the French law permits abandonment under such exceptional circumstances is a question of fact not before us, and which for the present purpose we must assume to be answered in the affirmative—see, however, Devilleeneuve et Massé, Dictionnaire des Contentieux Commercial, tit. 'Armateur,' sections 23 and 25.

By the English law, a shipowner, under such circumstances, is liable personally, and not merely to the value of the ship and freight; and it is alleged, and not denied, that the Danish, Portuguese, and Haitian laws agree in this respect with our own. The law of Haiti was not, however, relied upon in argument.

Upon these facts, it was insisted for the plaintiff that the decision ought to proceed upon either what was called the general maritime law, as regulating all maritime transactions between persons of different nationalities at sea; the Danish law, as that of the place where the contract was made (lex loci contractus); the Portuguese law, because the bottomry bond, which, in one sense, caused the question to arise, was given in a Portuguese port, and the rule that the place governs the act (locus regit actum) was supposed, therefore, to furnish a solution; or the English law, as being that of the place of the final act of performance by the delivery of the cargo (quasi lex loci solutionis), in either of which alternatives the liability of the defendant was established; and it was argued that the charter-party having been entered into bona fide in the ordinary course of business by the master, within the scope of his ostensible authority to contract for the employment of the vessel which the owner by appointing a master and sending him abroad in command allows him to assume, the right of the charterer could no more be narrowed by a provision of foreign law unknown to him than by secret instructions from the owners, which would clearly be inoperative: a proposition which needs no authority in our law, and for which French authorities will be found in Paillet's edition of the Code de Commerce, art. 216, in the note.

For the defendants it was answered that, by the French law, they are absolved, and that that law, as being that of the ship, governs the case, either because of the character of the transaction itself shewing that the plaintiff impliedly submitted his goods to the operation of the law of the ship, or because the master who entered into the contract, though his doing so was within the scope of the authority which he was allowed by the owner to assume, was disabled by the French law from binding his owners otherwise than with the exception, expressed or implied, of exemption from liability by abandonment, and that of such disability or lack of authority his flag was sufficient notice.

Upon this latter ground the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the defendants, not expressing any opinion upon the former, whereupon the plaintiff brought error, and the case was well argued at the sittings after Trinity Term last, before Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Keating, J., Pigott, B. and myself, when we took time to consider.

In determining a question between contracting parties, recourse must first be had to the language of the contract itself, and force, fraud and mistake apart, the true construction of the language of the contract (lex contractus) is the touchstone of legal right.

It often happens, however, that disputes arise, not as to the terms of the contract, but as to their application to unforeseen questions which arise, incidentally or accidentally, in the course of performance, and which the contract does not answer in terms, yet which are within the sphere of the relation established thereby, and cannot be decided as between strangers. In such cases it is necessary to consider by what general law the parties intended that the transaction should be governed; or rather, to what general law it is just to presume that they have submitted themselves in the matter; a familiar illustration of this will be found in the rule that the lawful usages of a market are as much part of a contract entered into there which does not expressly exclude them as if they were set down at large. The binding force of such usages does not depend so much upon the knowledge of the parties as upon implied acquiescence, for "whoso goes to Rome must do as those at Rome do." So, in the absence of express provision or special usage, the general law itself, in many points of view only a more extended usage, supplies the gaps which the parties have left, and, in doing so, sometimes modifies the construction of general words in the contract. For instance, a common carrier, while, on the one hand, he is bound by stringent rules for the protection of his customers, on the other is allowed certain exemptions from liability, even upon an express contract if it do not exclude such exemptions. Thus, by the common law of England, a person who expressly contracts absolutely to do a thing not naturally impossible, is not excused for non-performance because of being prevented by the act of God or the king's enemies—Paradine v. Jane (Ayleyn, 27); and yet, in consideration of the risks to which common carriers are exposed, such prevention is, in their case, an implied exception. And in the case of ordinary bailees intrusted with the custody of goods, whether by express contract or not, the exceptions of overwhelming force (vis major) and accident without fault (casus fortuitus) are implied. In the case of carriers by sea, these latter expressions, vis major and casus fortuitus, are now, as to British ships stipulated for by the common exception in the charter-party or bill of lading, whilst, in foreign contracts of affreightment, even when made in British ports, such express stipulation is sometimes omitted, as, for instance, in the Spanish charter in Blasco v. Fletcher (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 147; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 284), because, by the law of many countries, such an exemption is implied (see Casaregis, Disc. 23; Código de Comercio, art. 985, Allgemeines Deutsches Handels Gesetzbuch, art. 703). So that, in the case just referred to, if the lex loci contractus were to prevail, the owner of a Spanish vessel, chartered at Liverpool for the Havana, might lose the protection which the owners of an English vessel would, of course, have stipulated for. And this diversity (or conflict) upon a point so important, shews that the present and like questions affect, not only contracts entered into by masters of ships the law of whose country distinguishes between the obligation of a contract by the master as such and that of the owner himself, or his broker, or of the master acting with a plenary authority, but touch all contracts of affreightment entered into in respect of any vessel in a port foreign as to her, whether the master happens to be an owner or not. Hitherto we have viewed the question generally; but, in order to its satisfactory solution as applied to the present case, we must deal with the operative facts that the contract of affreightment was made by persons of different nationalities, in a place where both of them were foreigners, to be performed partly there, by breaking ground in order to start for the port of loading, a place where both parties would also have been foreigners, partly at the latter port by taking the cargo on board, and partly on board a ship at sea, subject there to the laws of their own country, and never out of its jurisdiction as to acts done by those on board, and partly by final delivery in the port of discharge; that the principal subject-matter of the contract was the employment of a foreign ship for a voyage across the high seas; and that the question in dispute arose in consequence of sea damage to the ship and its ordinary results.

In the diversity or conflict of laws, which ought to prevail is a question that has called forth an amazing amount of ingenuity and many differences of opinion. It is, however, generally agreed that the law of the place where the contract is made is, primâ facie, that which the parties intended, or ought to be presumed to have adopted, as the footing upon which they dealt, and that such law ought therefore to prevail in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention, as, for instance, that the contract is to be entirely performed elsewhere, or, that the subject-matter is immovable property situate in another country, and so forth, which latter, though sometimes treated as distinct rules, appear more properly to be classed as exceptions to the more general one, by reason of the circumstances indicating an intention to be bound by a law different from that of the place where the contract is made, which intention is inferred from the subject-matter, and from the surrounding circumstances, so far as they are relevant to construe and determine the character of the contract. The present question does not appear to have ever been decided in this country, and in America it has received opposite decisions equally entitled to respect. We must therefore deal with it as a new question, and endeavour to be guided in its solution by a steady application of the general principle already stated, namely, that the rights of the parties to a contract are to be judged of by that law by which they intended, or rather by which they may justly be presumed to have bound themselves. We must apply this test successively to the various laws which have been suggested as applicable; and first, to the alleged general maritime law. We can understand this term in the sense of the general maritime law as administered in the English Courts, that being in truth nothing more than English law, though dealt out in somewhat different measures in the common law and Chancery Courts, and in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Admiralty. But as to any other general maritime law by which we ought to adjudicate upon the rights of the subject of a country, which by the hypothesis does not recognize its alleged rule, we are not informed what may be its authority, its limits, or its sanction. Passing over the common ground of ethics and the elementary ideas of natural law (jus gentium), such as the rights of prior occupancy and self-preservation, the privileges and exemption of necessity, the common duties of humanity, of more or less perfect obligation, the idea of property, including the obligation of contracts, and those obligations, for the most part conventional, upon which is based the modern system of international law (jus inter gentes), inasmuch as these supply no precise rule for the matter in hand, it would be difficult to maintain that there is as to such questions as the present, depending in a great measure upon national policy and economy, any general, in the sense of universal, law, binding at sea, any more than upon land, nations which either have not assented or have withdrawn their assent thereto. Moreover, we are not satisfied that there is any such general concurrence of mankind that shipowners should be absolutely answerable personally for the acts of the master. Pothier (Sur la Charte-partie, part. i. No. 34), was cited in the affirmative, and Emerigon (Contrat à la grosse, chap. 4, sec. 11) upon the negative side. Pothier, founding his interpretation upon the Civil law, De exercitoria actione (see Valin, Sur l'Ordonnance, livre 2, tit. 8, art. 2), thought that the clause of the celebrated Ordonnance de la Marine, of 1681, livre 2, tit. 8, art. 2, from which art. 216. of the Code de Commerce was taken, applied only to illicit acts of the master, and that upon his contracts the owner was liable, and could not get rid of the liability by abandonment. Emerigon, on the other hand, founding his opinion upon the general rule of maritime law as he understood it, thought that, from liability for all acts of the master, whether licit or illicit, including contracts, the owner could free himself by abandonment. The jurisprudence of the Court of Cassation leaned towards the opinion of Pothier, and that led in 1841 to the modification of art. 216. to its present shape,¹ by which, according to the statement of the learned annotator in Sirey's Code de Commerce Annoté, by Gilbert, note 18, upon art. 216, the opinion of Emerigon is now established in France. To this may be added, that similar though not identical provisions for the protection of the owner are to be found in other codes, for instance, that of Spain (Código de Comercio, art. 621, 622), and Prussia (Allgemeines Deutsches Handels Gesetzbuch, art. 451, 452, 453. and the following). This is sufficient to shew that there is no general uniform rule of maritime law upon the subject; indeed, looking at home, there seems little if any difference in principle between the French law under consideration and our own statutory provisions for limited liability in respect of obligations by reason of collision, which latter have now by express enactment been extended to collisions between British and foreign vessels—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. s. 54; The Amalia (1 Moore's P.C.C. N.S. 471; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Pr. M. & A. 191). In truth, any general, much more any universal maritime law, binding upon all nations using the highway of the sea in time of peace, except when limited as administered in some Court, is easier longed for than found. Accordingly, we observe that both the very learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in deciding in the case of the The Hamburg Duranty v. Hart (2 Moore's P.C.C. N.S. 289), that the validity of a bottomry bond given in a foreign port was to be determined by the general maritime law, and not by the law of the ship or the port where the bond was given, added to the expression "the general maritime law" this qualification, namely, "as administered in England." That case was cited as an authority, and at first sight it appeared to be one for applying English law to the present case, but upon consideration it appears altogether distinguishable. The alleged agency of the master in that case was founded upon necessity alone, and it was incumbent on the bondholder to establish such necessity by evidence, and in order to do that he was bound (according to the rules prevailing since the case of The Buonaparte (8 Moore's P.C.C. 459) to shew a communication with the owner of the cargo, that being, as the Court held, reasonably practicable, so that the lex fori was undoubtedly supreme upon the question which then arose, it being one of evidence and procedure. Had the decision been intended to go further, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council would probably have considered and compared the case of Cammell v. Sewell (5 Hurl. & N. 728; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 350), and pointed out the distinction in this respect between an hypothecation in case of necessity and a sale in case of necessity, which, according to the decision of the majority of the Court in Cammell v. Sewell (against the opinion of Mr. Justice Byles) depends for its validity upon the law of the place where the sale was made, and not the general maritime law as administered in England, upon which, however, we offer no opinion.

In one other point of view the general maritime law as administered in England, or (to avoid periphrases) the law of England, namely, as to the law of the contemplated place of final performance, or port of discharge, remains to be considered. It is manifest, however, that what was to be done at Liverpool besides that it might, at the charterer's option, have been done at Havre, was but a small portion of the entire service to be rendered, and that the character of the contract cannot be determined thereby. It is true that as to the mode of delivery the usages of Liverpool would govern, as those of Algiers did in Robertson v. Jackson (2 Com. B. Rep. 412; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 28), and as in the mode of taking on board the cargo, the usage of the port of loading would be regarded—see Hudson v. Clementson (18 Ibid. 213; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 234), and the custom set out in the pleadings in Gattorno v. Adams (12 Ibid. N.S. 560), which custom was proved at the trial, at the Guildhall sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1862, and made an end of the case; and in this point of view it seems impossible to exclude the law of England, or even that of Haiti, from relevancy in respect of the manner of performing that portion of the service contracted for, which was to be rendered in their respective territories, because the ship must needs for the time being conform to the usages of the port where she is; and for a like reason, the adjustment of a general average at the port of discharge according to the law prevailing there, is binding upon the shipowner and the merchant, who must be taken to have assented to adjustment being made at the usual and proper place, and, as a consequence, according to the law of that place—Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805). It is unnecessary, however, to discuss this point further, because we have been anticipated and the question set at rest in an instructive judgment of the Judicial Committee, delivered by Lord Justice Turner, since the argument of the present case, in that of The Peninsular and Oriental Company v. Shand (Privy Council, 20th July, 1865; Jurist for the 7th October), where a passenger in an English vessel from Southampton to the Mauritius, where French law prevails, sued the shipowners for the loss of his luggage upon an alleged liability by French law, from which liability the shipowner was exempt by the English law, and the passenger obtained judgment in his favour in the Mauritius Court, which judgment was reversed upon appeal by the Judicial Committee, their Lordships holding that the law of England governed the case. Next, as to the law of Portugal, the only semblance of authority for resorting to that law, as being the law of the place where the bottomry bond was given, is the case already referred to of Cammell v. Sewell (5 Hurl. & N. 728; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 350), and we consider that the judgment in that case, if applicable at all, as to which we say nothing, could only affect the validity of the bottomry, and not the duties imposed upon the shipowner towards the merchant, by the fact of the bottomry, which duties must be traced to the contract of affreightment and the bailment founded thereupon.

The law of Haiti was not mentioned nor relied upon in argument, and there remain only to be considered the laws of Denmark and of France, between which we must choose. In favour of the law of Denmark there is the cardinal fact that the contract was made within Danish territory; and further, that the first act done towards performance was weighing anchor in a Danish port. For the law of France, on the other hand, many practical considerations may be suggested; and, first, the subject-matter of the contract, the employment of a sea-going vessel for a service, the greater and more onerous part of which was to be rendered on the high seas, where, for all purposes of jurisdiction, criminal or civil, with respect to all persons, things and transactions on board, she was as it were, a floating island over which France had as absolute, and for all purposes of peace as exclusive, a sovereignty as over her dominions by land, and which, even whilst in a foreign port, according to notions of jurisdiction adopted by this country (18 & 19 Vict. c. 91. s. 21, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94. s. 9), and carried to a greater length abroad (Ortolan, Diplomatie de la mer, c. 13, the work of a French naval officer, but of which a jurist might be proud), was never completely removed from French jurisdiction.

Further, it must be remembered, that although bills of lading are ordinarily given at the port of loading, charter-parties are often made elsewhere; and it seems strange and unlikely to have been within the contemplation of the parties that their rights or liabilities in respect of the identical voyage should vary, first, according as the vessel was taken up at the port of lading or not; and, secondly, if she was taken up elsewhere according to the law of the place where the charter-party was made or even ratified. If a Frenchman had chartered the Olivier on the same terms as the plaintiff did, it should seem strange if he could appeal to Danish law against his own countrymen, because of the charter-party being made or ratified in a Danish port, though for service to be rendered elsewhere, by a transient visitor for the most part within French jurisdiction. Moreover, there are many ports which have few or no sea-going vessels of their own, and no fixed maritime jurisprudence, and which yet supply valuable cargoes to the ships of other countries. Take Alexandria for instance, with her mixed population, and her maritime commerce almost in the hands of strangers. Is every vessel that leaves Alexandria with grain, under a charter-party or bill of lading made there, and every passenger vessel leaving Alexandria or Suez, be she English, Austrian, or French, subject to Egyptian law? As to not a few half-savage places in Africa and Asia, with neither sea-going ships nor maritime laws, a similar question may be put,—what is the law in such cases, or is there none except that of the Court within whose jurisdiction the litigation first arises? Again, it may be asked, does a ship which visits many ports in one voyage, whilst she undoubtedly retains the criminal law of her own country, put on a new sort of civil liability at each new country she visits, in respect of cargo there taken on board? An English steamer, for instance, starts at Vigo, Lisbon, and Cadiz. A Portuguese going from Southampton to Vigo would naturally expect to sail subject in all respects to English law, that being the law of the place and the ship; but if the locality of the contract is to govern throughout, an Englishman going from Vigo to Lisbon on the same voyage would be under English law as to crimes, and all obligations connected with the contract of carriage, but under Spanish law as to the contract of carriage, and a Spaniard going from Lisbon to Cadiz during the same voyage would enjoy Portuguese law as to his carriage, and be subject to English law in other respects.

The cases which we have thus put are not extreme nor exceptional: on the contrary, they are such as would ordinarily give rise to the question, which law is to prevail? The inconvenience, and even absurdities, which would follow from adopting the law of the place of contract in preference to that of the vessel, are strong to prove that the latter ought to be resorted to.

No inconvenience comparable to that which would attend an opposite decision has been suggested. The ignorance of French law on the part of the charterer is no more than many Englishmen contracting in England with respect to English matters, might plead as to their own law in case of an unforeseen accident.

Nor can we allow any weight to the argument that this is an impolitic law as tending to interfere with commerce, especially in making merchants cautious how they engage foreign vessels. That is matter for the consideration of foreigners themselves, and nothing short of a violation of natural justice or of our own laws could justify us in holding a foreign law void because of being impolitic. No doubt the French law was intended to encourage shipping, by limiting the liability of shipowners, and in this respect it goes somewhat further than our own, but whether wisely or not is within the competence and for the consideration of the French legislature, and upon which, sitting here, we ought to pronounce no opinion.

Exceptional cases, should they arise, must be dealt with upon their own merits. In laying down a rule of law, regard ought rather to be had to the majority of cases upon which doubt and litigation are more likely to arise, and the general rule, that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, there, as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern, seems to be not only in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, but also most consistent and intelligible, and therefore most convenient to those engaged in commerce.

In order to preclude all misapprehension it may be well to add, that a party who relies upon a right, or an exemption by foreign law, is bound to bring such law properly before the Court, and to establish it in proof. Otherwise, the Court, not being entitled to notice such law without judicial proof, must proceed according to the law of England—(see Brown v. Gray).²

For these reasons we have arrived at the same conclusion as the Court of Queen's Bench, and, without examining the grounds upon which the Court proceeded, we are of opinion that the judgment was right and ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Interrogatories—Discovery in Equity—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125 s. 51.—Appeal from Judge at Chambers—Costs.

DISCOVERY.—The Court allowed the plaintiff, under section 51. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to interrogate the defendant as to allegations in his plea, the interrogatories being on matters in respect of which, according to the practice of the Court of Chancery, discovery would be granted in equity.

Where a rule nisi to rescind an order of a Judge, by way of appeal from the decision of the Judge, is discharged, it is the practice to discharge the rule with costs; but where the point raised was new and abstruse, the Court refused the costs.

(2) Note to Lacon v. Higgins, Dowl. & Ry. N.P. 41.

The above two actions had been commenced against the same defendant in respect of the same cause of action. The plaintiffs in the one action sued as surviving partners of John Parsons, deceased; and the plaintiffs in the other action sued as executors of the same person. Certain interrogatories were sought to be delivered to the defendant, pursuant to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, in each action, which were identical in their terms. Mr. Justice Blackburn, in chambers, had made an order allowing certain of the interrogatories in the action of Hawkins and another v. Carr.

Barnard obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the above order of the learned Judge should not be rescinded.

The plaintiffs declared for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs and the said John Parsons, and for work done and materials provided by the plaintiffs and said John Parsons, since deceased, in his lifetime for the defendant at his request, and for money paid by the plaintiffs and the said John Parsons, since deceased, in his lifetime for the defendant at his request, and for money found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs and the said John Parsons, since deceased, in his lifetime upon accounts stated between them in the lifetime of the said John Parsons, deceased, and also for money found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs as such surviving partners of the said John Parsons, deceased, upon accounts stated between the plaintiffs, as such surviving partners as aforesaid, and the defendant since the death of the said John Parsons. And the plaintiffs claimed 150*l*.

The defendant pleaded as to that alleged claim of the plaintiffs which is alleged to have accrued in the lifetime of the said John Parsons, deceased, that that alleged claim consisted of items of claim which were bona fide disputed by the defendant to be due to the said John Parsons and the plaintiffs, and items of claim of an unliquidated, unascertained and unknown amount, being items of claim to so much as the said John Parsons and the plaintiffs reasonably deserved to have of and from the defendant in respect of the subject-matter of those items, and which said items of claim, unless liquidated, ascertained and assessed in amount by the parties themselves, necessarily were and would be wholly uncertain, unknown and unliquidated in the amount, till liquidated, ascertained and assessed in amount by the verdict of a jury. And the defendant also said, that the said John Parsons in his lifetime had and made a certain other claim for and against the defendant for an unascertained amount due from the defendant to the said John Parsons, which said other claim also consisted of items of claim which were bona fide disputed by the defendant to be due to the said John Parsons; and of items of claim of an unliquidated, unascertained and unknown amount, being items of claim to so much as the said John Parsons reasonably deserved to have of and from the defendant in respect of the subject-matter of those items, and which said items of claim, unless as to their amount liquidated, ascertained and assessed by the plaintiffs themselves, necessarily were and would be as to amount wholly uncertain, unknown and unliquidated till liquidated, ascertained and assessed by the verdict of a jury. And the defendant further said, that thereupon, after the alleged accruing of the claim herein pleaded to, and in the lifetime of the said John Parsons, the defendant and the said John Parsons having notice of the premises, it was agreed by and between the defendant and the said John Parsons, that they should jointly ascertain and determine which of the said disputed items of both the said claims were or were not due, and should jointly liquidate, ascertain and assess the amount of the items of both claims which were of such uncertain, unknown and unliquidated amount as aforesaid, and should jointly ascertain, assess and fix a sum of money as the whole and joint amount due from the defendant upon and in respect of both the said claims, and that the defendant should accept and deliver to the said John Parsons, and the said John Parsons should receive for and on account of that amount, a bill of exchange, bearing date the 9th of October, 1861, drawn by the said John Parsons upon the defendant for the payment by the defendant to the said John Parsons's order, of the said last-mentioned sum two years after the date of the said bill, and that the said John Parsons should accept the performance of the said agreement on the defendant's part in full and joint satisfaction and discharge of the claim to which this plea is pleaded, and of the said other claim of the said John Parsons in respect of any and every sum over and above and beyond the said sum for which the said bill of exchange was to be so accepted, delivered, and received as aforesaid. And the defendant further said, that the said agreement jointly ascertained and determined which of the disputed items of both of the aforesaid claims were or were not due; and did jointly liquidate, ascertain and assess the amount of the items of both claims which were of such uncertain, unknown and unliquidated amounts as aforesaid, and did jointly ascertain and fix 55*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.* as the whole and joint amount due from the defendant in respect of that claim to which this plea is pleaded, and of the said other claim of the said John Parsons; and thereupon, under and in pursuance of the said agreement, the defendant did then accept and deliver to the said John Parsons, and the said John Parsons received of and from the defendant, for and on account of the amount last aforesaid, a bill of exchange, bearing date the 9th of October, 1861, drawn by the said John Parsons upon the defendant for the payment by the defendant to the said John Parsons's order of the said sum of 55*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, two years after the date of the said bill; and the said John Parsons then accepted the defendant's performance of the said agreement in full and joint satisfaction and discharge of the claim to which this plea is pleaded, and of the said other claim of the said John Parsons in respect of any and every sum over and above and beyond the said sum for which the said bill of exchange was so accepted, delivered and received as aforesaid. And the defendant further said, that the said amounts in the declaration first mentioned were stated by and between the defendant and the plaintiffs and the said John Parsons by such ascertaining, assessing and fixing by the defendant and the said John Parsons of the said sum of 55*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.* as aforesaid, and by the drawing, accepting, delivering and receiving of the said bill of exchange as aforesaid, and no such accounts as in the declaration first mentioned were ever stated as therein alleged, save and except as aforesaid. And the defendant further said, that afterwards, and long before the said bill of exchange became due and payable, and while the said John Parsons was the holder of the said bill, it was agreed by and between the defendant and the said John Parsons, that the defendant should pay to the said John Parsons, and the said John Parsons should receive of the defendant, 30*l.*, parcel of the amount of the said bill, and that the defendant should accept and deliver to the said John Parsons, and the said John Parsons should receive for and on account of the residue of the said sum of 55*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, another bill of exchange drawn by the said John Parsons upon the defendant, for the payment, by the defendant, to the said John Parsons's order, of 25*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, the residue of the amount of the said first-mentioned bill, three years after the date of the said other bill, and that the said John Parsons should thereupon exonerate and discharge the defendant from all liability upon the said first-mentioned bill, and should deliver up the same to the defendant; and thereupon, under and in pursuance of the said last-mentioned agreement, the defendant paid to the said John Parsons, and the said John Parsons accepted and received of and from the defendant 30*l.*, parcel of the amount of the said first-mentioned bill, and the defendant accepted and delivered to the said John Parsons, and the said John Parsons received of and from the defendant, for and on account of the residue of the amount of the said first-mentioned bill, another bill of exchange drawn by the said John Parsons upon the defendant, for the payment, by the defendant, to the said John Parsons's order, of 25*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, residue of the said first-mentioned bill, three years after date of the said other bill, and the said John Parsons then exonerated and discharged the defendant from all liability on the said first bill, and delivered it up to the defendant. And the defendant further saith, that the said other bill had not at the time of the commencement of this suit, nor hath it yet become due or payable, nor have the three years from its date yet elapsed.

And for a second plea to the whole declaration, the defendant says, that he never was indebted, as therein alleged.

On the 7th of June, 1865, a summons was served, by the plaintiffs, to submit interrogatories for the defendant's examination; and the application was heard, by Blackburn, J., on the 8th of June, when his Lordship struck out certain of the interrogatories then proposed, and made an order for the defendant to answer the residue.

Against that order the defendant appealed to the Court and obtained the present rule, upon the ground that the interrogatories were unreasonable, and solely related to the defendant's case, and not the plaintiffs', and that the order was a violation of the rule, by which the defendant is only bound to discover all such facts within his knowledge, and to produce all such documents in his possession as are material to the case of the plaintiff.

The interrogatories allowed by the order of the learned Judge were as follows:

5. When, where, and at what place, and at what time and hour of the day, did you and the said John Parsons, if at all, or if ever, meet to ascertain, settle and assess the respective amounts of the claims and demands mentioned in your plea?

7. At the time of the alleged adjustment or settlement of the accounts respectively mentioned by you in your plea, state what particulars or bills of account or books were before you and John Parsons, and whether or not the items of claim mentioned and comprised in the particulars of demand in this action of Hawkins and another, against you, were before you and John Parsons, and the subject of discussion and adjustment; if these items were not, state then what items, claims or accounts were. What was the whole and joint amount allowed by John Parsons, if at all, in your favour upon the two accounts?

8. Was or was not the bill of exchange for the sum of 55*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, mentioned by you in your plea, given and accepted by you upon, for and on another and different account and demand than that mentioned by you in your plea, and if so, on what other account, or in respect of what other demand?

9. Was not that bill accepted by you and handed to John Parsons for money lent and advanced by him to you, and when was this, and what was the amount of the advance and the discount he allowed on such advance, and who procured, purchased, or paid for the stamp on the bill, and what has become of this bill?

10. When and where, and under what circumstances, and for what account and consideration, and why, did you pay, as you have alleged in your plea, the sum of 30*l.* to John Parsons, and deliver to him the bill for 25*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, payable three years after date? State and set forth the particular place and time when you paid such sum and gave such bill, and the reasons and circumstances for paying such sum and giving such bill to John Parsons, and why you paid the 30*l.* during the currency of the first bill, and why so long a period as three years was chosen for the payment of the second bill of exchange.

11. Was not the sum of 30*l.* paid by you, and when, on account of a different transaction than that mentioned by you in the plea? State fully on what account the money was paid by you to John Parsons.

12. Did you ever, and state when, draw, accept, or deliver the bill for 25*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.* to the said John Parsons, as you have alleged in your plea, and, if so, when?

R. A. Fisher (Nov. 9) shewed cause against the above rule.—The interrogatories allowed by the learned Judge are unobjectionable. The rule is, that if a party administer interrogatories to his opponent, to inquire into what is exclusively his opponent's case, they are objectionable; but if they relate to the case so far as it is common to both parties, they are unobjectionable; and such is the case here. Whateley v. Crawford (5 El. & B. 709; s. c. 25 Law J.

Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 163), Moor v. Roberts (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 671; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 246), Bayley v. Griffiths (1 H. & C. 429; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 477), Zychlinski v. Maltby (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 838), Rew v. Hutchins (Ibid. 829). The plaintiffs are in a difficult position by reason of the death of Parsons, and the materials for rebutting the defendant's case are in the possession only of the defendant.

Barnard, in support of the rule.—These interrogatories relate exclusively to the case of the defendant.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—An inquiry as to any fact tending to displace the plaintiffs' case would be pertinent to the case of the plaintiffs.]

It is submitted that what is substantially matter of replication to the plea may be asked about, but not what only goes to a traverse of the defendant's plea.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, J., Shee, J. and Lush J.) was now (Nov. 17) delivered by—

LUSH, J.—This was an action by the surviving partners of a firm to recover from the defendant a sum of money on the common counts, for goods sold and delivered, for work done, for money paid, and on accounts stated. The pleas set up a settlement with the deceased partner. An application was made for leave to deliver interrogatories. When the case was argued we had some doubt whether the interrogatories were within the statute, but we have ascertained that, according to the practice of the Court of Chancery, a discovery of this description would be allowed. In a case of this peculiar nature we are anxious not to abridge the powers which the Courts of law enjoy, and the application for leave to administer these interrogatories must therefore be granted.

Rule discharged.

On the 25th of November,

Fisher asked for a direction as to costs, and that the rules should be respectively discharged with costs, on the ground that they were moved for as an appeal against an order of a Judge, and that in such cases it is the usual, and almost universal, practice to discharge the rule with costs.

COCKBURN, C.J., said that although such was the rule, yet, that as the point discussed was perfectly new, and the interrogatories so very near the boundary line between what interrogatories ought and what ought not to be allowed, the Court refused the costs.

Railway Company—Negligence—Horse—Statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81. s. 7.

CARRIERS.—The plaintiff sent a horse, worth 1,000l., by a groom, to the defendants' railway station, for the purpose of being carried. As the groom was leading it, by the direction of one of the railway porters, to a particular part of the yard, the horse was startled by another horse, and backed, in consequence, on some sharp iron girders, which seriously injured it, so that it was necessary to kill it. No declaration of value had been made, nor any ticket taken out, nor any fare demanded. It was the usual practice at that station to put the horses into the horse-box before taking the ticket. The jury found that the defendants were guilty of negligence in leaving the girders where they were lying:—Held, that the railway company were protected, by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7), from being responsible to the plaintiff for any greater damages in respect of the injury to the horse than 50l.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, reducing the plaintiff's damages from 1,000l. to 50l.

The pleadings are set out fully in the report below (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 233). It will be sufficient now to state that the action was for negligence for placing certain iron girders in the railway station yard, so as to be dangerous to horses, whereby the plaintiff's horse, which had been brought to the station for the purpose of being conveyed by the railway, was injured.

On the trial, the evidence shewed that the plaintiff sent a race-horse, worth 1,000l., under the care of a groom, to the defendants' station, at Worcester, to be carried on the line from Worcester to London.

In order to get the horse to the horse-box in which it was to be carried, it was necessary to pass through the defendants' yard, in which were a quantity of sharp-edged iron girders, which narrowed to the space. The groom took the horse to the yard, and on one of the porters calling out "London horses this way," proceeded to lead him, in the direction pointed out, by the girders. Another horse, which was in front, became terrified and backed upon the plaintiff's horse. This caused the plaintiff's horse to back suddenly against the girders, by which it was so injured that it was necessary to kill it. The groom had not taken any ticket for the horse, nor had he declared the value of the horse to the company or their servants. The usual practice at the Worcester Station was to get the ticket after the horse had been placed in the horse-box. On these facts,

COCKBURN, C.J., directed the jury to find for the plaintiff if they thought that the defendants had been guilty of negligence in leaving the girders in such a position in the yard.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 1,000l.

LUSH (Wood with him), for the appellant, the plaintiff below.—The ruling of the Lord Chief Justice is right. The company are not protected by section 7. of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, which relieves the company from liability in case of an act of neglect or omission in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering of horses. The facts do not shew that the loss occurred in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering the horse. The company did not receive the horse. There was no contract for carriage effected. The horse was still in the possession of its owner. The accident happened before the company's servant had any control over it. It was only on the company's premises, and it was being ridden by the plaintiff's servant. It was not in the company's possession any more than if the horse had not been going to be carried, but the master had merely ridden upon it to see another horse off. The words of the act are meant to limit the liability of the company as carriers only. The jury have found negligence in the company in having a dangerous station, but irrespective of their character of carriers, and no negligence on the part of the plaintiff. It is beside the question whether the horse was going there to be carried or not. If a third person had injured the horse while in the yard, the company at common law would not have been liable.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The porter says, "London horses this way," and the horse goes. Is not that horse in the course of receipt?]

The calling out of the porter had only the same effect as if the company had put up a board outside their station, saying, horses for London were to go to the furthest part of the station. If the porter had taken the horse and had tried to put it into the horse-box, that would have been in the course of receipt. The test is whether the owner has delivered the horse to the company. Suppose at the end of the journey the company had delivered the horse to the groom, and the groom had met with a similar accident as he was riding away, it could not be said that this would be injury in the delivery. The liability of the company as carriers would have ended before the accident. As long as the plaintiff had not delivered the horse to the company he might declare the value. The statute was not intended to protect the company from the consequences of their negligence in leaving dangerous articles lying about in their yard.

Hawkins (H. James with him), for the respondents, the defendants below. —The company are protected from any greater liability than 50*l.* in respect of the injury to the horse. The horse was on the company's premises for the purpose of being carried, and was in the course of receipt, and its value had not been declared when the accident happened. The moment that the horse came on the company's premises for the purpose of being then carried the statute applies to it. The porter directed the horse to be put into the dangerous position. The horse would not have been there except it had been in the course of receipt, having been moved to the place pursuant to the direction of the company's porter for the sole purpose of being placed in the horse-box which was close to it. The porter was in fact marshalling the traffic. The company have a right to have the value declared in order that they may take better care if the horse is very valuable.

Marine Insurance—Policy—Illegal Act of Master—Want of Authority from Owner.

MARINE INSURANCE.—A master of a vessel, though acting within the scope of his ordinary authority as master, who does an act in contravention of the laws of his country without the express authority, knowledge or sanction of his owner, whether with or without a view to the owner's advantage, is guilty of an implied breach of his orders.

Therefore, where a master of a vessel has sailed at a time and on a voyage, within the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. ss. 170-2, with a portion of his cargo stowed on board on deck and without a certificate of clearance, contrary to that statute, and without the knowledge or authority of the owner, though with a view to the benefit of such owner, the illegality of the voyage does not affect the owner so as to prevent his recovering against an insurer for the loss of the cargo on the voyage by the perils insured against on a policy of insurance on freight.

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Byles, J., Keating, J. and Pigott, B.

The declaration of this action was on an ordinary policy of insurance on freight at and from Restigouch to Liverpool, and is set out in the report of the case in the Court below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 63).

The fourth plea, upon which the present argument was based, stated that the said policy of insurance was made, and the cargo—the freight in respect of which was insured as in the declaration alleged—was shipped on board the said ship, after the passing and coming into operation of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, intituled ‘An act to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the customs of the United Kingdom,’ &c.; and that the aforesaid cargo consisted of timber and wood goods; and that Restigouch in the said policy mentioned was and is a British port in North America; and that the said ship, with the said cargo, cleared out and sailed from Restigouch aforesaid after the 1st of September, 1861, and before the 1st of May, 1862, to wit, on the 13th of November, 1861; and that before and at the time of the said ship so sailing as hereinbefore mentioned, the whole of the said cargo was not below deck, but, on the contrary thereof, the master of the said ship, before and at and after the time of the said ship so sailing as aforesaid, placed and permitted, and caused to be placed and to remain and be upon and above the deck of the said ship, part of the said cargo, contrary to the statute in that behalf made and provided; and that at the time of the said ship so sailing as aforesaid the master of the said ship had not obtained from the clearing officer any certificate that the whole of the cargo of the said ship was below deck, contrary to the statute in that behalf made and provided; and that before and at the time of the said ship so sailing as aforesaid, and until and at the time of the alleged loss, the plaintiff was the owner of the said ship, and the said freight so insured as aforesaid was payable to him as such owner in respect of the said cargo.

To this plea there was a demurrer and joinder in demurrer, and a traverse, on which issue was joined.

On the trial, before Shee, J., at Liverpool, it appeared that the vessel sailed on the 13th of November, 1861, with the whole of the cargo that was in freight properly stowed below deck; but that the master took on board a quantity of spars and other articles for his owner to be carried to Liverpool, which were placed on deck. This he did in the exercise of his general authority as master, without any instructions from the plaintiff, his owner, to do so; his object, it would appear, being to save expense to his owner in obtaining the materials necessary for refitting the vessel in Liverpool after the voyage. The jury found that the vessel was not in fact rendered unseaworthy by this deck load; and that the plaintiff was not aware of the conduct of the master till after the policy was made and the ship had sailed.

The learned Judge ruled that the spars, &c. were cargo within the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. s. 171, and he directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant on both pleas, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter the verdict for him.

A rule was obtained accordingly, and the rule and the demurrer were argued together in the Court below, when the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant then alleged error.

Cohen, for the defendant.—It is submitted that the plea is good, and that the plaintiff, the shipowner, cannot recover in this action, because the master of his ship, though without any authority from him, has violated the enactments of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. ss. 170, 171, 172. This voyage was entirely illegal, and the insurance is void—Marshall on Insurance, 4th edit. 135. On the statute 26 Geo. 3. c. 40. s. 1, which required the master to make out and sign a manifest of all goods shipped in British ships beyond sea for Great Britain, with the particulars of the cargo, before the ship cleared out, it was held that every part of the cargo, even that which was used for dunnage or ballast, must be inserted, and the omission of it rendered the voyage illegal—Frean v. Dawson, cited in Marshall on Insurance, 136, 4th edit. A violation of the Navigation Act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 109, by the master, in sailing without having the proper proportion of British seamen required by that act, would render the voyage illegal and the insurance void—Suart v. Powell (1 B. & Ad. 266), Duer on Marine Insurance, 377. The imposition of a penalty does not prevent the voyage being illegal. The case of Cunard v. Hyde (El. B. & El. 670; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 408; in error, 2 El. & El. 1; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 6) is explained on the ground that the master was not the agent of his owner; but it is submitted that he is his agent, and the loading of the cargo is within the scope of his authority. In Bell v. Carstairs (14 East, 374) a distinction was taken between owner and assured of ship and cargo, and a mere assured of cargo. The former could not recover when the latter could—Smith's Mercantile Law, 370, 5th edit. If it is said that no authority can be implied in the master to contravene the act,—see Earle v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126),—it may as well be said that no authority can be implied to do a careless or negligent act. Hobbs v. Hannam (3 Campb. 93) was decided on the ground that the owner was bound by illegal acts of the master, and could not recover on the policy of insurance, though, no doubt, there it was put on the ground that he acted by the express orders of the owner. Next, the ship was not seaworthy. The taking on board timber on the deck and sailing without a certificate of clearance constitutes statutory unseaworthiness, and discharges the insurer. The distinction between the cases which seem to say that the improper act of the master does not bind the owner, is not only that between owners of ships and owners of cargo, but also between cases where the risks of the insurance are increased by his act, and where they are not. If they are, the insurers are discharged—1 Duer, pp. 318, 320, 410. There is an implied warranty that the ship should be seaworthy, and that means that the assured will put the ship in such a condition as is usual and proper at the commencement of the voyage, and which a prudent uninsured owner would put her in—Burges v. Wickham (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 17, per judgment of Blackburn, J.) and Dixon v. Sadler (5 Mee. & W. 414; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 48). The carrying a deck cargo was found to be an unusual thing by the jury, and a ship not properly documented is legally unseaworthy. There is an implied warranty in every insurance that the provisions of the statutes shall be complied with.

Brett, Milward and Crompton were not heard.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now (Nov. 28) delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—In this case it appeared in the plea, in an action on a policy for freight, that, contrary to the statute, the master had taken out a cargo in November or December, and part of the cargo he was taking out contrary to the provisions of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. Now, it is clear that if Wilson, the shipowner, had done that or had been cognizant of it, according to the case of Cunard v. Hyde (El. B. & El. 670; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 408; in error, 2 El. & El. 1; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 6), it would have been an illegal voyage, and the policy thereon might have been rendered void; but the owner is not shewn to have known anything of it, or to have been a party to it in any way; and the judgment of the Court below was that by reason of knowledge and authority from him to the master not being shewn, the rule laid down in Cunard v. Hyde (El. B. & El. 670; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 408; in error, 2 El. & El. 1; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 6) did not apply to the present case. The Court was of opinion, upon that authority, that though the master had authority to load a cargo, it was not an authority to violate the statute in loading the cargo, nor was it an act of the master that the owner must be presumed to have assented to. In that judgment we concur. We are also of opinion that the second ground taken in the Court below was a valid ground. Even if it had been shewn in fact that the master had rendered this an illegal voyage without the knowledge or authority of the owner, it would have been a barratrous act on the part of the master, and the insurers would have been liable by reason of the barratry, and on that ground the insurers or freight ought to be liable. There was a further contention, in the present case, that there was a statutory unseaworthiness shewn, because the ship had taken on board timber on the deck and had sailed from Canada without having a certificate of clearance; and it was urged, on the principle on which it had been held that if a ship sails without being provided with proper documents, and for that reason the risk of the insurers is increased, and the liability for loss greater than it would be if the ship had the documents, that the insurer is discharged; that therefore, as this ship sailed without the certificate of clearance required by the statute in Canada at the time of sailing, viz., that there was no cargo on deck, the absence of that document created a statutory unseaworthiness within this principle. It appears that the principle by no means applies; the document in question here is a document merely relating to the compliance with the requisition of the statute at the port of loading to secure a compliance with the provision of the statute there, and it does not at all bear upon the risk of the voyage after the ship is out of the port of discharge, and it does not at all bear upon the ship in the port of discharge. We think that though the argument was scarcely pressed by the learned counsel with any idea that it should succeed, there is nothing in the argument, and that the judgment should be affirmed. This was the only question brought before us, and we carefully limit the judgment to the exact question that is to be decided.

Judgment affirmed.

MARSHALL v. THE EMPEROR LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

Practice—Particulars—Action on Life Policy.

INSURANCE. PRACTICE.—In an action on a life policy, a condition of which was that the person whose life was insured had not been afflicted with certain specified disorders or any other complaint, the defendants pleaded that the assured, at the time of the policy, had symptoms of disease in the stomach:—Held, that the defendants must deliver particulars under this plea.

This was an action on a policy of insurance, effected by the plaintiff on the life of one Mason. The company pleaded, fourthly, that the proposal and declaration, the basis of the policy, stated that the assured had not been afflicted with or had any symptoms of gout, rupture, insanity, liver complaint, hæmorrhoids, fistula, consumption, asthma, spitting of blood, or any other complaint: whereas Mason, at the time of making the policy, had had symptoms of disease of the stomach.

Upon an application for particulars under this plea, Shee, J. made an order directing the defendants to deliver to the plaintiff particulars of the symptoms of the disease of the stomach mentioned in the plea.

Raymond now moved to rescind the order.—It is most unfair to require these particulars to be given. The particulars, through defects in technical phraseology, may inaccurately describe the disease, and be made the subject of adverse criticism at the trial. The disorders of the stomach are numerous, and it may be difficult to give a name to each of them. In Pylie v. Stephens (6 Mee. & W. 813), an action for breach of warranty of a horse, the declaration stated simply that the animal was unsound; but particulars of the unsoundness were refused.

[SHEE, J.—The office ought not to have pleaded a plea of this description if they were unable to give particulars of the disease.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—There will be no rule. The order can be complied with if the defendants say that they do not know what is the particular disease, but that the symptoms were of some specified description. These particulars, if necessary, may be amended at the trial.

THE QUEEN v. THE RATEPAYERS OF NORTHOWRAM AND CLAYTON.

35 L. J. Q.B. 90; 7 B. & S. 110; L. R. 1 Q.B. 110.

Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), ss. 12, 13, 14, 16.—Proceedings necessary for adopting the Act—Ecclesiastical District, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, a Place with "a known or defined Boundary."

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—A district for spiritual purposes, formed under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37. s. 9, is entitled, by resolution of its owners and ratepayers (without reference to the proceedings of townships out of which it is formed), to adopt the Local Government Act, 1858, as being a place with "a known or defined boundary" according to the provisions of the act.

Rule to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up certain orders of the Home Secretary relating to the adoption of the Local Government Act, 1858, by the ecclesiastical district of Queenshead, otherwise Queensberry. It appeared from the affidavits that the township of Northowram, in York, had an area of 3,419 acres, of which about 60 acres were within the borough of Halifax. The township of Clayton had an area of 1,743 acres, and was a place with "a known and defined boundary." Two churchwardens and two overseers of the poor were elected annually in the township. A board, according to the Highway District Act, was also annually elected in the township, and a poor and highway rate assessed on all property within its boundaries. Northowram also annually elected a churchwarden, overseers, and a highway board. In 1845 part of the parish of Bradford and part of the parish of Halifax were constituted a separate district for spiritual purposes, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37. s. 9, and named the district of Queenshead. This district comprised about 1,300 acres of Northowram and 290 acres of Clayton. In setting out the boundaries, no regard was had to the sanitary requirements of the district, or any local civil, or parochial purpose. On the 10th of October, 1864, a meeting of owners and ratepayers within the district of Queenshead, otherwise Queensberry, was held, at which a resolution was passed adopting the Local Government Act, 1858, within the district.¹ Previous to this meeting no meeting of the owners

(1) By 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 12. the act may be adopted: (1.) In corporate boroughs to which the Public Health Act, 1848, has not been applied by a resolution of the council assembled at a meeting held for the purpose: (2.) In other places under the jurisdiction of a Board of Improvement Commissioners, where all or part of the Commissioners are elected by ratepayers, or by owners and ratepayers, by a resolution of such Improvement Commissioners assembled at and ratepayers of either Clayton or Northowram had been held for the purpose of adopting the act within these districts; and the Secretary of State had not determined that Queenshead, as being a less place included within the larger place, according to section 14. of the Local Government Act, ought, as respected the operation of the act, to be excluded from the limits of either Clayton or Northowram.

On the 15th of October, 1864, at a meeting of owners and ratepayers within Clayton, a resolution was passed, adopting the Local Government Act, 1858, for the whole of the district and township of Clayton. A petition of appeal was afterwards presented to the Home Secretary by more than one-twentieth of the owners and ratepayers of Clayton, praying that he would refuse his consent to Queenshead being constituted a district under the Local Government Act; or that he would, at least, exclude from such district that portion of Clayton which was comprised within it.

On the 15th of December, 1864, the Home Secretary determined "that the vote for the adoption of the Local Government Act by Queenshead or Queensberry was valid," and by his order of the same day directed "that the said petition from the owners and ratepayers of the said township of Clayton be dismissed, and that the Local Government Act, 1858, have the force of law in the said ecclesiastical district of Queenshead, otherwise Queensberry, from and after the date of this present order." A number of owners and ratepayers of Northowram (which had also passed a resolution adopting the act) presented a similar petition to the Secretary, but with the same result.

Bovill (Maule with him) shewed cause.—The ecclesiastical district is a place with a known and defined boundary, within the meaning of the Local Government Act. If Queenshead had petitioned the Secretary of State to settle its boundaries according to section 16. of the act, the answer would have been that they were already assigned.—(He was then stopped.)

Kemplay (Mellish with him), in support of the rule.—The orders are bad, as the ecclesiastical district in question is not a place with a "known or defined boundary" within the meaning of the act. The act by which ecclesiastical districts are created (6 & 7 Vict. c. 37. ss. 9, 11, 17.) shews that such districts are still to remain part of the mother parish. In The Queen v. the Archdeacon of Exeter (1 New Rep. 267) it was held, that the parishioners of a parish, for ecclesiastical purposes, were entitled to vote at the election of churchwardens for the mother parish. And in The Queen v. the Overseers of Kingswinford (3 El. & B. 688; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 337), where a district within the parish of Kingswinford had been assigned for ecclesiastical purposes, under a meeting held for the purpose: (3) In all other places having a known or defined boundary, by a resolution of the owners and ratepayers.—By s. 13. (1.) Meetings for the purpose of the preceding section shall be summoned on the requisition in writing of any twenty ratepayers or owners; In corporate boroughs, by the mayor; In other places under the jurisdiction of such Improvement Commissioners as aforesaid, by the chairman of the said Commissioners; In places having known and defined boundaries, not being corporate boroughs, or towns under the jurisdiction of such Improvement Commissioners as are hereinbefore mentioned, by the churchwardens or one of them, or if there are no churchwardens the overseers or one of them, or if there is none of the officers respectively above enumerated, or if such officer in any case neglects, is unable, or refuses to perform the duties hereby imposed on him, by any person appointed by one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State.—By s. 14. In cases where any place hereby authorized to adopt this act includes within its limits any less place which, if it were not so included, would of itself be authorized to adopt this act, such less place shall not be entitled to adopt this act unless the greater place has refused to adopt the same, or unless it has been determined by one of the Secretaries of State that such less place ought, as respects the adoption of this act, to be excluded from the limits of such greater place.—By s. 16. (1.) Any place not having a known or defined boundary may petition one of the Secretaries of State to settle its boundary for the purposes of this act . . . (6.) Any place the boundaries of which have been so settled shall for the purposes of the act be deemed to be a place with a known and defined boundary, and may adopt this act accordingly; and for the purpose of enabling it to do so, a summoning officer shall be appointed by the order settling the boundary.—By s. 17. any number not less than one-twentieth of the owners and ratepayers may petition against the adoption of the act in any place; and the Secretary of State, after inquiry, is to make an order with respect to the matter in question on such appeal, such order to be binding on the place in respect of which it is made, and to state the time at which this act is to come into force.

the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 38, and two chapelwardens annually elected for the district, it was held that they could not lawfully give a notice convening a meeting of ratepayers to adopt the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 90, so far as lighting was concerned, as their powers were confined to ecclesiastical purposes. The places alluded to by the Local Management Act are all places having a civil jurisdiction; the words "or place" in section 16. meaning place with a civil boundary.

MELLOR, J.—If there had been any cause for doubt in this case, we should have been unwilling to decide it summarily; but I cannot help thinking that the arguments of Mr. Kemplay are not opposed to the construction which is contended for by his opponents. It seems that certain of the ratepayers of Northowram and Clayton are dissatisfied with the mode in which the Secretary of State has exercised his discretion in sanctioning the adoption of the Local Government Act by the district of Queensberry. By section 12. of this act it may be adopted in all places having a known or defined boundary by a resolution of the owners or ratepayers within that boundary. Then, is the district of Queensberry a place with a known and defined boundary? It is admitted by Mr. Kemplay that for some purposes it is. Now, section 13. contains provisions for summoning meetings for the purpose of adopting the act by places having known and defined boundaries, and all these provisions have been complied with by the district in question. Therefore, a place to which boundaries have been assigned by statute has duly adopted the act. But it is said that section 14. prevents Queensberry from adopting the act. But I think this section has no application to a case like this, where the Secretary of State must be taken to have sanctioned the exclusion of Queensberry from the limits of a greater place. It is further contended that the district ought to have petitioned the Secretary of State to settle its boundaries under section 16. But as we are of opinion that the boundary of the district is known and defined within the meaning of the act, the objection cannot of course be maintained. We think that the orders were good, and that the rule must be discharged.

LUSH, J., concurred.

Rule discharged.

A, the occupier of the devised house, had been in the habit, both before and at the time of the making of the will, of going to the above-mentioned pump, to the knowledge of the testatrix.

Error was brought by the defendant to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the plaintiff.

The declaration was for trespass in breaking open a door and cutting down, injuring and destroying a certain wooden fence, and taking and carrying away quantities of water belonging to the plaintiff.

The defendant pleaded, except as to the cutting down, injuring and destroying the said wooden fence, that before the committing of the acts complained of, and before the plaintiff had any estate or interest of or in the said close in which, &c., one Rachel Polden Bonnel was seised in her demesne, as of fee, as well of and in the said close in which, &c., and of a pump and well therein, as of and in a certain dwelling-house, outhouse and garden, and being so seised, and before the committing of the said acts complained of, she duly made and published her last will and testament in writing, and the same was then so duly made and published, and duly attested according to the law then in force relating to the making and publishing of wills, and by the said will the said Rachel Polden Bonnel gave and devised to Clementina Polden, and her heirs and assigns for ever, the said house, outhouse and garden, together with a way on foot from the said house, outhouse and land unto, into, through and over the said close of the plaintiff to the said pump and well, for the purpose of the said Clementina Polden, and her heirs and assigns, having, taking and fetching, and for her and them to have, and take and fetch water from the said pump and well, and so back again from the said pump and well, in, through, over and along the said close of the plaintiff, unto and into the said house, outhouse and garden of the said Rachel Polden Bonnel, at all times of the year, at their free will and pleasure, for the more beneficial use and enjoyment of the said house, outhouse and garden; and the said Rachel Polden Bonnel, being so seised, afterwards died, without revoking her said will as to the said devise, and thereupon the said Clementina Polden became seised in her demesne, as of fee, of and in the said house, outhouse and garden, with the appurtenances, together with the said right and easement so by the said will given and devised to her as aforesaid. And the said Clementina Polden being so seised, she afterwards and before the committing of the acts complained of, by deed made by her, duly bargained, sold, granted and assigned to the defendant the said house, outhouse and garden, with the appurtenances, together with the said right and easement. and she ceased to have any estate or interest therein. And the defendant became and was seised in his demesne, as of fee, of and in the said house, outhouse and garden, with the appurtenances, and the said right and easement. and at the times of the committing the acts so complained of continued so seised; and one James Dennis was in the occupation thereof as tenant thereof, together with the said right and easement, to the defendant, the reversion of and in the same belonging to the defendant, and the said trespasses complained of and to which this plea is pleaded were a use and exercise of the said way, right and easement, the said water being water in the said pump and well; and because the said door had been and was wrongfully erected and placed in the said close, and was locked and fastened so as to obstruct and did obstruct the said way, and the use and exercise of the said right and easement of having, taking and fetching water from the said pump and well as aforesaid, and injured and prejudiced the defendant's reversionary estate and interest therein, so that without breaking open the same the said way and the said right and easement could not be used and exercised, the same James Dennis having occasion to use the said way and exercise the said right and easement for the purpose aforesaid.

he, the defendant, as his servant and by his command and authority in that behalf, and in his own right as reversioner as aforesaid, did, for the purpose of using and exercising the same, and to protest maintain and preserve the same estate and interest, necessarily and unavoidably, and to a necessary degree break open the said door; and which are the trespasses complained of, and to which this plea is pleaded.

Upon which plea the plaintiff joined issue.

At the trial, before Williams, J., at the Dorsetshire Summer Assizes, 1862, the following facts appeared in evidence. R. P. Bonnel, at the time she made her will and until her death, was seised in fee of, and was also in the occupation of, a dwelling-house, with a yard attached thereto, in which yard was a well and a pump connected with the well, and which yard is the close mentioned in the pleadings in this action as the close of the plaintiff, and which well and pump are the well and pump respectively mentioned in the pleadings, and was also seised in fee of and in a certain other dwelling-house, outhouse and garden next adjoining the first-mentioned dwelling-house and yard, and which last-mentioned dwelling-house, outhouse and garden are the dwelling-house, outhouse and garden mentioned in the pleadings.

R. P. Bonnel, by her will, dated the 26th of May, 1834, devised to her nephew Robert Baker Polden "all that my freehold cottage and garden at Charlton Marshall, now occupied by William Wills, to him and his heirs and assigns for ever. To my nephew William Polden I give the house I now live in, with the outhouse and garden and orchard, in my own occupation, to him and his heirs and assigns for ever, and also the sum of 40*l*. I give to my niece Clementina Polden the house and outhouse and garden as now in the occupation of Thomas Answood, junior, to her and her heirs and assigns for ever."

The property devised to William Polden, who is the plaintiff, comprises the dwelling-house first mentioned and the yard attached thereto, in which the well and pump were situate; and the property devised to Clementina Polden comprises the dwelling-house secondly mentioned and the outhouse and garden.

For some time before the making of the will, Thomas Answood, junior, had been in the occupation of the dwelling-house secondly mentioned and the outhouse and garden as tenant to R. P. Bonnel, and during all the time of his occupation and at the time of the will he, with the knowledge of R. P. Bonnel, used a way on foot from the dwelling-house, outhouse and garden into, through and over the yard attached to the dwelling-house first mentioned to the well and pump, for the purpose of having, taking and fetching from the well and pump all the water required by him for the use of himself and his family for domestic purposes in his dwelling-house, outhouse and garden, and so back again at all times; and at the date of the will he had no supply of water on his own premises, and no other source from which he could obtain any water for such purposes, as R. P. Bonnel knew, but he might have obtained drinking water by digging a well from 18 to 20 feet deep on the premises occupied by him, or water from a river 150 yards off, which was used for brewing purposes, but which he said he should not like to drink.

R. P. Bonnel died in 1848, without altering or revoking her will, and the plaintiff and Clementina Polden then became by virtue of the devise seised in fee of the properties respectively, and the plaintiff has since occupied the same.

On the 21st of September, 1849, Clementina Polden, by deed, conveyed to the defendant all her interest in the real property devised to her by the will, and he has since continued to be the owner. It was described as "all that cottage or tenement situate in Charlton Marshall, in the county of Dorset, in the occupation of James Dennis, with the garden thereunto adjoining and belonging, and also the fuel-house or outhouse belonging thereto, but adjoining at the back and forming part of a cottage or tenement belonging to William Polden and occupied by the Widow Groves, which said cottage and premises hereby conveyed are bounded on the east, north, and west sides by the said cottage and a garden and orchard belonging to the said William Polden, and on the south side by property belonging to Samuel White White, Esq., and all houses, outhouses, buildings, yards, gardens, ways, passages, waters, water-courses, easements, rights, members, privileges, hereditaments and appurtenances whatsoever to the said cottage, garden, fuel-house and premises hereby conveyed, belonging or appertaining, as the same were formerly held by Thomas Ainsworth, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, use, trust, benefit, claim and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity, of the said Clementina Polden of, in or to the same."

The person Thomas Ainsworth mentioned in this description is the same person as the person Thomas Answood, junior, mentioned in the said last will and testament of Rachel Polden Bonnel, and the holding by the said Thomas Ainsworth referred to in the said description is the holding by the said Thomas Answood, junior, before mentioned.

The respective tenants of the said dwelling-house before secondly mentioned and the said outhouse and garden had from time to time since the making and publishing of the said last will and testament of the said Rachel Polden Bonnel until the month of October, 1861, enjoyed the use of the water from the said well and pump in the same manner and for the same purposes as the same was enjoyed by the said Thomas Answood, junior, as hereinbefore mentioned; but in the month of October, 1861, and whilst the said James Dennis was in the occupation of the said dwelling-house, outhouse and garden, as tenant thereof to the defendant, the plaintiff erected and fastened a door in the yard in such a position and manner as to prevent any access by the occupiers of the said dwelling-house, outhouse and garden to the said yard or to the said well and pump, and the defendant broke open the said door, and broke and entered the said yard, and took and carried away water from the said well and pump, which are the trespasses complained of in the pleadings in this action, so far as they relate to the present case, at the times and under the circumstances, and for the purpose and in exercise of the rights set forth in the pleadings in this action. as far as they relate to the present case.

Upon this evidence, the learned Judge, before whom this cause was tried, directed the jury to find, and the jury did find, a verdict for the defendant; but the learned Judge reserved leave to the plaintiff to move the Court of Queen's Bench to set aside the said verdict and to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, with 40s. damages, instead thereof, if the said Court should be of opinion that the right to use the said pump did not pass under the devise to the said Clementina Polden contained in the said last will and testament of the said Rachel Polden Bonnel, as hereinbefore mentioned.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly, the Court of Queen's Bench made such rule absolute.¹

Key, for the plaintiff in error, the defendant below.—The question turns on the construction of the will, and the effect to be given to the words, "as now in the occupation of Thomas Answood, junior." These words are evidently to have a special meaning from the variation in language used by the testatrix from the expressions in the other devises in the same will, namely, "now occupied" in the one devise, and "in my own occupation" in the other. In Bodenham v. Pritchard (1 B. & C. 350) the words, "as now enjoyed by me," applied to a house and lands, called D, were held to pass other fields, which belonged to another estate, which had been purchased by the testator, before the date of his will, but taken into occupation by him as part of D. In that case the testator owned and occupied the D. estate, with the mansion-house thereupon, till his death, and bought the adjoining estate twenty-two years before his death, and, for twenty years, took into occupation, along with his D. estate, three pieces of land belonging to the newly-purchased estate. The rest of the newly-purchased estate was leased out to other tenants; and it was held that the three pieces of land passed by a devise of his mansion-house, called D, "together with all lands thereunto belonging, as now enjoyed by me." In Press v. Parker (2 Bing. 456), under a devise to A. of the messuage "wherein he now lives," and to B. of a messuage "now in the occupation of E," a coal-cellar within the boundary of the messuage, in the occupation of E, which had always been used and enjoyed with the messuage in which A. lived, was held to pass to A. In Doe d. Clements v. Collins (2 Term Rep. 498), the testator, who was a master bargeman, and tenant for years of a house, garden, stables, and coal-pen, bequeathed "the house I live in, and garden, to H. C."; and it was holden, the stables and coal-pen passed, though the coal-pen was situated on the other side from the house of a road running near it, and was used as a place to keep coals, not sold, out of his barges. Mr. Justice Ashurst there says, "The testator's intention appears to have been to give, by the bequest of his house, everything which was in his occupation, as proper and convenient for the occupation of the house." Further, the right to go to this pump to get water passed as an easement of necessity. In Staple v. Heydon (8 Mod. 1) it is agreed that by the grant of a house, to which there is a way of necessity without more, the grantee shall have the way as well as if it were specially mentioned in the grant. In Pyer v. Carter (1 Hurl. & N. 916) the right to the use of a drain through an adjoining house passed by a conveyance of a house without more, because it was necessary and given appendant thereto. Such easement need not be indispensably necessary; it is sufficient if it be an ordinary convenience and apparent. In Ewart v. Cochrane (4 Macq. Scotch App. Cas. 117) it was held, that where two properties are possessed by the same owner, and there has been a severance made of part from the other, anything which was used and was necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of that part of the property which is granted, shall be considered to follow from the grant, if there are the usual words, and it was doubted whether the usual words even were essentially necessary. In Hall v. Lund (1 H. & C. 676; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 113; 11 W. Rep. 271) an easement which was intermittent passed; and it was held, that where premises have certain ordinary and common conveniences, such conveniences pass by the grant of the premises.

The Solicitor General and H. T. Cole, for the plaintiff above, were not heard.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. The testatrix, at the time of making her will, was in possession of two adjoining cottages, and devised them to two separate devisees. For some time before the date of the will, the occupier of one of the cottages used to go to a pump on the premises of the other cottage. By her will, she devised the cottage, "as now in the occupation of Thomas Answood, junior," to Clementina Polden. It is said that that cottage is the dominant tenement; and that the devise carries with it the right to go on the adjoining premises as the servient. The question is, whether the words "as now in the occupation" make it a dominant tenement, and carry with them such right. I think they do not. If they had amounted to such words of description as "as enjoyed by Thomas Answood, with all way, &c.," such general words might have carried the easement; but our judgment must be given upon the particular words of this will. There is a distinction between such rights, as rights of way, which may be used from time to time and discontinued, and between rights of necessity and continuous enjoyment, such as drains. The decisions go the length of saying that such easements as the latter would pass without particular words of description; but the easement now in question is only used from time to time, according to inclination—it may be every day, but it may also be from time to time, at intervals, and is not continuous or of necessity. The judgment of the Court below went upon that ground, and I found mine upon the same. In Bodenham v. Pritchard (1. B. & C. 350) the devise was of all lands "as now enjoyed by me"; and if, in the present case, there had been a devise of all lands as used or enjoyed by the testatrix, it would have been in point. That is a fact of description, and the jury are to ascertain to what lands the description applies. There is no such question here, for the pump is no part of the cottage. On the ground, therefore, that there was no such continuous or necessary easement as to pass by a devise of the cottage, under the words of the above will, I think the judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Pleading—Equitable Plea—Assignment by Plaintiff of Defendant's Debt before Action—Liability of Defendant to Assignee—Unconditional and Perpetual Injunction in Equity—Res Judicata.

ASSIGNMENT. ESTOPPEL. MONEY COUNTS.—To a declaration containing an indebitatus count for money awarded to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded, as an equitable plea to a certain sum, parcel of the money claimed in count, that before action the plaintiff assigned the said sum for a good consideration; that the assignees gave express notice thereof to the defendant and required him to pay the said sum; that the assignment was still in force, and the defendant remained liable to pay the said sum to the assignees; that the plaintiff was suing inequitably and in fraud of the assignment; that the action was not brought for the benefit or with the assent of the assignees, who still required the defendant to pay the sum to them; and that if the plaintiff recovered in this action the defendant would still be forced to pay the sum to the assignees:—Held, that the plea was good, since on these facts equity would grant an absolute, perpetual and unconditional injunction to the plaintiff not to sue for his own benefit, and if the plaintiff hereafter sued the defendant for the same debt for the benefit of the assignees, or if circumstances revested the debt in him and he sued the defendant for his own benefit, this judgment could not be pleaded as res judicata, and would be no bar to either of such actions.

The declaration contained an indebitatus count for money awarded to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Plea, on equitable grounds, as to a certain sum, parcel of the money claimed, that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim and before action, the plaintiff for a good and valuable consideration in that behalf assigned to certain persons trading under the name, style and firm of Messrs. F. Devas, Routledge & Co., the said sum, parcel, &c., to which this plea is pleaded; and the said persons then gave express notice to the defendant of the assignment, and they required the defendant to pay the said sum; and the assignment at the commencement of this suit remained and still remains in full force and unrevoked; and the defendant then remained and still remains liable to pay the same to the said persons; and this action is not brought in any manner or to any extent for the use or benefit of the said persons, or with their knowledge, privity or consent, but notwithstanding the same they have required and still require the defendant to pay the said sum to them; and in case the plaintiff recovers the same in this action the defendant will be forced and obliged to pay the same notwithstanding such recovery to the said persons; and the plaintiff sues for the said sum inequitably and in fraud of the assignment and notice.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder therein.

J. Brown (Mathew with him) appeared in support of the plea, but—

Thesiger (Hawkins and B. Rigby with him) was called on to support the demurrer.—This is not a defence at law, nor is it in equity, for it is laid down in the decisions that such a plea is good only where equity would grant an absolute, unconditional and perpetual injunction. There is here no extinction of the debt to the plaintiff, who remains liable to the assignees, and if the defendant became bankrupt and only paid 10s. in the pound, the plaintiff would have to pay the whole sum to the assignees, but would never recover it from the defendant. Equity would in this case only grant an injunction to the plaintiff not to sue on condition that the defendant paid the whole amount to the assignees, and would require the three parties to be brought before the Court.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Have you any authority that equity would not grant an unconditional injunction in such a case?]

No; but the decided cases always assume that in such a case the injunction would be conditional.

[BLACKBURN, J.—All that equity would do would be to enjoin the plaintiff not to sue for his own benefit, so long as things remain as they are.]

That is a condition.

[MELLOR, J.—“Unconditional” means so long as circumstances remain as they are at present. BLACKBURN, J.—A perpetual injunction could not prevent the plaintiff suing on a new right. If circumstances reverted the subject of the assignment in the plaintiff, the injunction would not be in his way.]

The plea alleges no promise by the defendant to pay Devas & Co.—Cochrane v. Green (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 448; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 97). Devas & Co. could not sue the defendant for money had and received—Liversidge v. Broadbelt (4 Hurl. & N. 603; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 332) and Wharton v. Walker (4 B. & C. 163).

J. Brown, in reply.—There is an absolute blank of decisions in cases where equitable assignees have resorted to equity for injunctions. It is admitted that the facts must be such as would induce equity to grant an absolute, unconditional, perpetual injunction, and a Court of equity would here decree that the plaintiff would not sue for his own benefit—Wodehouse v. Farebrother (5 El. & B. 277; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 18).

BLACKBURN, J.—The time since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was passed is so short that an absence of precedents is no argument for concluding that this plea is bad. What does the plea amount to? To this, that the plaintiff sues for a debt due to him from the defendant, which the plaintiff assigned before action to Devas & Co., who gave notice of the assignment to the defendant. It is unnecessary to refer to the numerous cases where the question of the validity of the assignment has arisen on the subsequent bankruptcy of the plaintiff. All the cases, from Winch v. Keeley (1 Term Rep. 619), amount to this: that an assignment of a chose in action in equity after it has been perfected is good to transfer the equitable property. That being so, the plaintiff, having transferred the whole of his debt, sues inequitably when he sues for his own benefit. It is not disputed that this is a breach of the rules of equity, but Mr. Thesiger relies on the cases which have said that an equitable plea is only to be allowed where a Court of equity would grant an unconditional and perpetual injunction. The reason given for that in Wodehouse v. Farebrother (5 El. & B. 277; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 18) is very well stated. Under the Common Law Procedure Act we can only admit an equitable defence where the sole judgment of the Court of law, which is, that the defendant go without day, is equivalent in substance to a perpetual injunction in equity. In those cases where a Court of equity will stay proceedings on the terms that the three parties are brought before the Court, and then will make a conditional arrangement, there is nothing equivalent to a common law judgment. But here I do not think there is any such difficulty. This debt has become in equity the property of the assignees, and the plaintiff has no longer any right to it. And then when Devas & Co. institute an action in the name of the plaintiff he must carry it on, and equity will force him to do so on being indemnified for costs. But if the plaintiff sues for the benefit of any person other than his cestuis que trustent, he is suing wrongly, and equity will stop him.

This is very like the case of a bill of exchange which has been indorsed away, and of which the plaintiff is not the holder, in which case judgment would be for the defendant. But if under any circumstances the plaintiff again becomes the holder, and brings an action, the judgment in the former action would be no bar in the latter. So here, a Court of equity would say to the plaintiff.—You are suing inequitably, and would grant an injunction. If the right to sue for the debt is ever revested in the plaintiff then the injunction would no longer apply, or prevent the plaintiff from suing. This also is the effect of a judgment at common law. Our judgment here is simply for the defendant; but if the plaintiff at any future time sues for the benefit of Devas & Co., this judgment could not be pleaded in bar to the action as res judicata. Our judgment, therefore, on the demurrer is for the defendant.

MELLOR, J.—As to the goodness of the plea, if Mr. Thesiger were right in his contention as to what a Court of equity would do, I should have thought it a bad plea; but the term “unconditional injunction” I understand to be used with reference to the circumstances of the case remaining as they are at the time the injunction is granted. The plaintiff might have sued had not the Common Law Procedure Act been passed. If he ever acquires a right to this debt by a new title, then there is nothing in this judgment to prevent him from suing for it; but he has now parted effectually in equity with his property in the debt. I think, therefore, that this is a good plea.

SHEE, J., concurred.

Judgment for the defendant.

In re the claim of WILLIAM BALLS v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 101; L. R. 1 Q.B. 337; 13 L. T. 702; 14 W. R. 370;
12 Jur. N.S. 183.

Compensation—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 51, 52, 68.—Offer of a Sum including Plaintiff's Costs—Verdict for less than Offer—Time of Offer—Taxation of Costs.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Upon a claim for compensation under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the promoters of the undertaking offered a sum for compensation, such sum to include the claimant's costs, and the jury gave a verdict for less than that sum:—Held, that the claimant was not deprived of his right to costs under section 51, inasmuch as the offer was bad because it included costs. Such an offer to be valid must be for that which is the subject of compensation merely, unclogged with conditions.

Quære—Whether a sum offered to a claimant under section 68, contemporaneously with the service of the notice of the time and place of inquiry, but after the claimant has incurred the expense of attending at the nomination of the special jury, is a sum "previously offered" within section 51.

Montagu Chambers had obtained a rule calling on the claimant Balls to shew cause why the allocatur of one of the Masters of this Court should not be set aside, or why the Master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of costs.

It appeared from the affidavits, that on the 7th of November, 1865, the claimant served on the Board of Works a notice in writing, whereby, after alleging that, in exercise of the powers contained in the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and the acts amending the same, the Board had by their works connected with the Metropolitan drainage injuriously affected certain lands and buildings in Middlesex of which the claimant was owner in fee simple, and had also taken part of the lands for the execution of the works, he gave the Board notice that he required them to pay him compensation in respect of the injurious affection, and of his interest in the land taken, and that the amount of his claim for such compensation was 400*l.*; and he thereby required the Board, if they failed to pay the amount, or to enter into a written agreement for that purpose, within twenty-one days after the receipt of the notice, to issue their warrant to the Sheriff of Middlesex to summon a special jury to settle the amount of compensation for the injurious affection and the land taken. The Board declined to pay the amount, or to enter into the written agreement for its payment, and on the 24th of November issued their warrant to the sheriff to summon a special jury, in accordance with the above notice, and duly deposited the warrant with the sheriff on the 27th of November, and gave the claimant's attornies notice thereof on the 29th of November. On the 27th of November the sheriff served on the claimant's attornies, and on the 28th of November on the attorney for the Board, a notice that the sheriff had appointed the 4th of December ensuing, at eleven o'clock, at his office, for the purpose of nominating a special jury in pursuance of the warrant, and that he required both parties to appear before him by themselves or their agents for that purpose.

In pursuance of this summons a clerk of the claimant's attornies and the attorney for the Board attended at the sheriff's office on the 4th of December, and then and there nominated a special jury. On the same day, and after the special jury had been nominated, a notice in writing was served, on behalf of the board, upon the claimant, and a duplicate thereof upon his attornies. This notice was addressed to the claimant and signed "N. Lindo & Sons, 47a, Moorgate Street, for W. W. Smith, solicitor to the Metropolitan Board of Works, Spring Gardens," and contained an offer on behalf of the Board to purchase the claimant's interest in the premises at a price to be fixed by certain referees, and if the claimant declined that, an offer to make good the damage occasioned by the works of the Board, and if the claimant declined both the above offers, "then, under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and the several acts amending the same relative to the drainage of the metropolis, the said Metropolitan Board of Works are ready and willing to pay to you 100*l.* in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands of what kind or nature soever, on account of any damage or injury sustained by you through their said works in your said notice (of the 7th of November) mentioned, such sum to include all costs, charges and expenses of, occasioned by, or incidental to your said claim, or the proceedings to enforce the same."

Together with this notice a notice in writing that the inquiry would be held at the sheriff's office on the 15th of December was served on behalf of the Board upon the claimant, and a duplicate on his attornies.

The claimant alleged that in consequence of the notice of the 29th of November of the deposit of the warrant and the sheriff's summons of the 28th of November, he incurred before the 4th of December considerable costs in preparing for the inquiry and to prove his claim.

On the 15th of December the inquiry was held, and the jury assessed the damages at 75*l*. The claimant's attorneys afterwards applied to one of the Masters of this Court to have the claimant's costs of the inquiry taxed, whereupon the attorney for the Board contended that the claimant had been deprived of his costs by reason of the offer of 100*l*. made within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. The claimant's attorneys contended that the offer was too late, and was bad, both because it included the claimant's costs and also because it was not under the seal of the board. After hearing both parties, the Master held that the claimant was entitled to his costs of the inquiry, but declined to state the grounds of his decision, and he taxed the costs at 156*l*., and that part of them (including the costs of attending to nominate the special jury) which was incurred before the service of the notice of the 4th of December stating the time and place of inquiry, he taxed at 40*l*. 10*s*.

Section 51. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts that "on every such inquiry before a jury, where the verdict of the jury shall be given for a greater sum than the sum previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking, all the costs of such inquiry shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking; but if the verdict of the jury be given for the same or a less sum than the sum previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking, or if the owner of the lands shall have failed to appear at the time and place appointed for the inquiry, having received due notice thereof, one-half of the costs of summoning, impanelling and returning the jury, and of taking the inquiry and recording the verdict and judgment thereon, in case such verdict shall be taken, shall be defrayed by the owner of the lands, and the other half by the promoters of the undertaking, and each party shall bear his own costs, other than as aforesaid, incident to such inquiry." The provisions of this act (except those with respect to the recovery of forfeitures, penalties and costs) are incorporated with the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, by section 151; and the expression "the promoters of the undertaking" used in the former act is to mean the Metropolitan Board, or the district board of vestry, as the case may be.

Tindal Atkinson, Serj., and Shaw now shewed cause.—The offer is not such as is contemplated by section 51. of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, for, first, it was not made in time. It is conceded that if this had been a common jury case, it would have been in time, but the claimant had incurred the expense of attending at the nomination of the special jury before the offer was made, and those costs are certainly recoverable under section 54, even if the other previous expenses were not. If, therefore, the claimant were forced to accept the offer, then he would be in a worse position than if he went to the jury, for in the latter case he recovers the costs as well as the compensation; but if he accepts the bare offer, he pays his own costs. The statute cannot therefore have intended to compel him to accept such an offer. According to the decisions the true test is that of reasonableness. In The Metropolitan Railway Company v. Turnham (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 249) Chief Justice Erle said the offer should be made previous to the ten days' notice of inquiry, and Mr. Justice Willes said (p. 254), "no reasonable notice can be given after the time at which, by the practice of the common law Courts, the parties may incur the expense of preparing for trial." Here the offer was contemporaneous with the ten days' notice of inquiry, and the claimant had incurred the expense of preparing for trial. In Hayward v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (83 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 73; s. c. 4 Best & S. 787) the second offer was held in time, but there it was made before the special jury were nominated, and my contention is consistent with the principle of that case, and of Yates v. the Mayor, &c., of Blackburn (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 447; s. c. 6 Hurl. & N. 61). Secondly, the offer was bad, because clogged with a condition as to costs. The jury can only consider the injury done and the value of the land taken, and this offer might include subject-matter for which we had a right of action against the Board; and, thirdly, the notice of offer ought to have been under the seal of the Board, under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. s. 149, or signed by the clerk of the Board or one of their officers, under section 222. "N. Lindo & Sons" are the agents of the solicitor to the Board, and neither a clerk nor an officer.

[LUSH, J.—Why should not Lindo be an officer pro hac vice?]

Montagu Chambers and Raymond, in support of the rule. As to the last point, the signature is sufficient.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—You need not notice that. There is nothing in it.]

First, the offer was in time. The claimant's original notice of claim was under section 68. of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, and section 38 has been decided not to apply to such a case. The cases cited are in our favour. In Hayward's case (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 73; s. c. 4 Best. & S. 787), Chief Justice Cockburn cites the opinion of the Common Pleas, that "Any time beyond ten days (the time from notice of trial to the trial) is a reasonable period;" and Mr. Justice Blackburn says, "Any offer made by the company previous and up to the time of giving the notice of the time and place of inquiry, is an offer under section 51" (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 78, 79). The expenses of attending the nomination of the jury could only be 13s. 4d., and the claimant need not have incurred even that; but the Master has allowed many other expenses.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Yes; but in all actions many costs are necessarily incurred, which are recoverable if notice of trial is given, and not otherwise. It is one of the hardships on a suitor. A solicitor would be guilty of negligence if he did not prepare for trial and incur expenses which may never be recovered as costs.]

The rule laid down in Hayward's case (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 73; s. c. 4 Best & S. 787) is a simple one; but if the question of striking a special jury be introduced, then it may be necessary to inquire which party demanded a special jury. Here the expense of reducing the jury was not incurred. Moreover, sections 51. and 52. only contemplate the costs of "summoning, impanelling and returning the jury." The claimant had ample time to consider whether the offer of 100l. was enough before he incurred expenses and actual litigation had begun. Secondly, the words in the offer relating to the claimant's costs are to be rejected as mere surplusage. They could not have misled the claimant, who must be taken to know that they had no meaning. The only object of the offer was to come within section 51.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The words must either be a nullity, or make the offer bad; for the Master cannot know, on taxing, how much the jury intended for compensation; and how much for costs. The words, moreover, might mislead the claimant. If he accepted the offer he might be abandoning costs to which he was entitled.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—The rule must be discharged. I think it is very doubtful whether this offer was made in time, seeing that costs had been incurred which, if the case went on, and the jury found a verdict for a sum sufficient to entitle the claimant to his costs, would have been recoverable as costs. I doubt whether after the claimant has incurred such costs it is not too late to make an offer. The test which the authorities cited lay down is that of reasonableness. I doubt whether in this case it was made within a reasonable time; but it is not necessary to decide that here, for I think the offer is clearly bad, as being clogged with the condition that the offer of 100l. should include the claimant's costs as well as the compensation. The statute contemplates that, before the parties embark in active litigation, an offer should be made by the company of a reasonable compensation, so as to entail on the claimant all the consequences of having to pay his own costs if he refuses the offer. That means an offer simply of the compensation for the matter which is the subject of inquiry before the jury. I cannot think that it should embrace anything else. I do not think that the Board were justified in putting into the offer a condition as to the costs. On that ground I think this offer was bad.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with my Lord that an offer of compensation (at whatever time it ought to be made) should be made so that a claimant may be able to consider if it is his interest to accept it; and if the offer is made of a lump sum, not only for compensation, but also for costs, I think it might mislead the party, and not give him the means of making up his mind. A claimant has often incurred costs which, if the inquiry goes on, will be recoverable; and it would be very hard if by reason of the claimant being compelled to accept such an offer, these costs, which may be called inchoate costs, are not to be recovered. Here, where 100*l.* was offered he might say, “75*l.* was offered for compensation, and 25*l.* for expenses, which cost me 40*l.* 10*s.* I think that an offer to be valid must be plain. It is therefore unnecessary to say whether it was in time, and we do not decide that point.

LUSH, J.—I think the offer is bad, whether it was made in time or not, on the ground that it tendered a lump sum for the compensation, “such sum to include all costs, charges, and expenses of, occasioned by, or incidental to your claim.” The claimant’s right to costs is to be ascertained by comparing the amount of compensation awarded by the jury with the amount offered, but where a sum is offered for costs and compensation together, it is impossible to ascertain how much is for the costs and how much for the compensation. Again, I think it is very doubtful whether this offer was made in time.

Rule discharged.

Railway Company — Negligence — Level Crossing — Occupation Way — Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20.) ss. 47-68.

RAILWAY.—A public way passing obliquely over a railroad, the company placed gates across the way, on either side of the line. Opposite to one of these gates, on the other side of the line, was a yard abutting on the rails. From this yard there was a private way over the rails, with but one outlet, by means of the gate opposite. The plaintiff’s carter having finished his work in the yard, drove his cart, after dark, to the entrance to the railroad, and called to the company’s keeper at the opposite gate to know if the road were clear. The keeper said, “Yes, come on.” The carter proceeded, when the cart and horses were struck by a passing train:—Held, that though section 47. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, in the case of public roads crossed by a railway on a level, simply orders the company to maintain gates across the road and employ proper persons to open and shut the gates and keep the gates closed, except when horses, carriages, &c., have to cross the railway, yet that there is implied in those words a direction to the company to keep persons from passing through such gates except when it is reasonably safe to do so, and that whatever might have been the case had the carter been using an ordinary private road over the railway, the fact that the only outlet to this road was by means of the public gate, placed him in the same position as if he had been using the public way; that the answer of the gatekeeper was equivalent to an invitation to come upon the railroad, and this was a breach of his duty in the service of the company for which they were responsible.

Declaration—that the plaintiff before and at the time of committing the grievances hereinafter mentioned was possessed of a certain cart or lorry, and, to wit, two horses, and the defendants were possessed of a certain line of railway, which said railway crosses at a level a certain public road. That the defendants, before and at the time when, &c., were in the habit of driving and running by their servants divers engines, tenders and trains along the railway and across the road, and it became and was the duty of the defendants to put and place proper and sufficient gates at the said crossing, and to keep the gates properly ordered and regulated, and to keep and maintain at the crossing proper and efficient officers and servants for the safety and protection of persons lawfully using the road. That at the time when, &c., the cart and horses were lawfully and properly using the road, and were being lawfully and properly drawn across the railway at the crossing, yet the defendants wholly failed to put and place at the crossing proper and sufficient gates, or to keep such gates properly ordered and regulated, and wholly failed to keep and maintain at the crossing proper or effectual officers or servants, and the defendants maintained and kept the crossing so negligently and improperly unprotected by gates, and provided such improper, inefficient and incapable officers and servants at the crossing, and so negligently and improperly conducted themselves in and about the premises, and so negligently, carelessly and improperly drove a certain locomotive engine, tender and train of carriages attached thereto over and across the road at the crossing while the plaintiff's cart and horses were so lawfully and properly using the road, and were so being lawfully and properly driven across the railway at the crossing as aforesaid, that the engine, tender and train struck, knocked down and upset the plaintiff's cart and horses, whereby the cart was crushed and broken and rendered altogether useless to the plaintiff, and one of the horses was killed, and the other of the horses was so damaged, wounded and injured that it became altogether useless to the plaintiffs, and it became and was necessary to put it to death, and it was accordingly put to death.

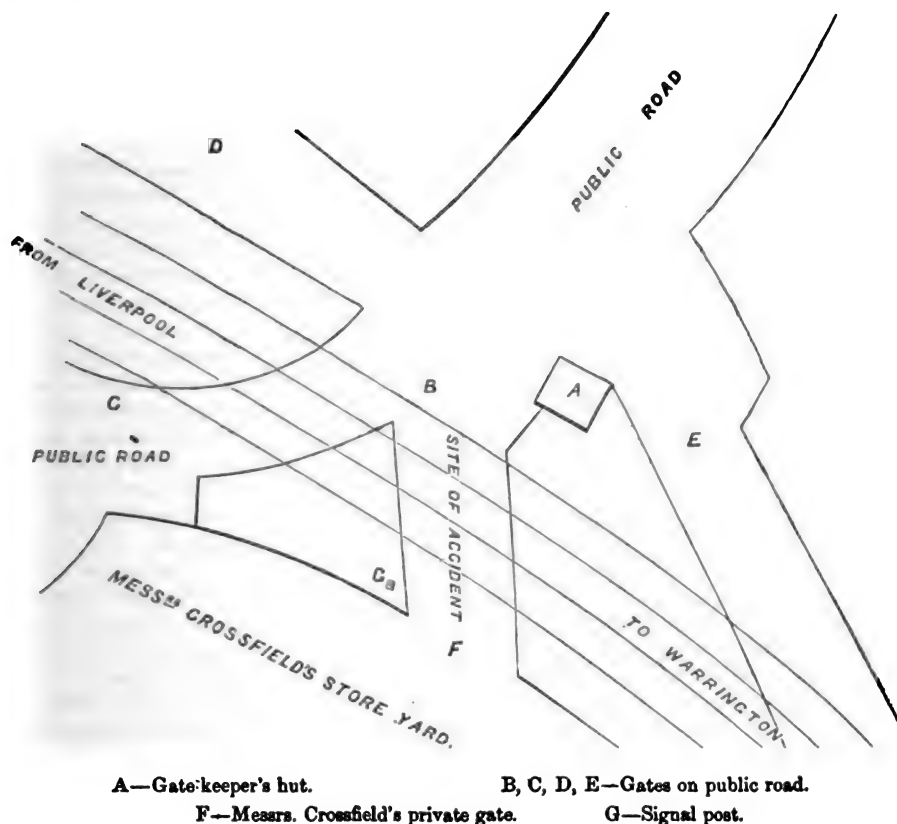

There was also a second count in general terms, ascribing the accident to the negligence of the defendants.

Pleas—First, not guilty. Secondly, that at the time when, &c., the said cart and horses were not lawfully and properly using the road and being lawfully and properly driven across the railway at the crossing as aforesaid.

Upon these pleas issue was joined.

At the second trial of the action, at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, before Shee, J., it appeared that a part of the defendants' line between Liverpool and Warrington passed obliquely over a carriageway. Across this way, on either side of the line, the company had placed gates, pursuant to the requirements of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, section 47. Opposite to one of these gates, on the other side of the line, was a yard belonging to one Crossfield, abutting on the rails. From this yard there was a private way over the rails, with but one outlet, by means of the gate opposite. Anybody using the private road in approaching Crossfield's yard entered at the public gate and passed through it on his return. Anybody using the public way from the north side of the railroad also entered at the public gate, but turned to the right of the private road in crossing the rails and went out at the opposite public gate. The plan below will shew the position of the railroad and the two ways.

The plaintiff's carter, who had been working in Crossfield's yard, on the evening of the 23rd of November, 1863, drove, after dark, a lorry and two horses to the private gates, which he threw open, and called to M'Grath, the keeper placed by the company in charge of the opposite gate, to know whether the road was clear. M'Grath, according to the carter's statement, replied, "Yes, come on." The lorry and two horses were driven on to the line, when both were struck down by an express train, the lorry broken to pieces, one of the horses killed and the other seriously injured. M'Grath and other witnesses maintained that all he said was addressed to the driver of a luggage train which was just passing. It did not clearly appear that the public gate was open at the time of the accident. His Lordship left to the jury the question, was M'Grath guilty of negligence which caused the accident, or was it caused by the carter going across the rails without proper caution? The jury found in favour of the plaintiff, the damages being fixed by consent at 100*l.* Leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict or a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that there was no evidence of negligence to charge the defendants. The jury at the first trial had also found a verdict for the plaintiff.

A rule nisi having been obtained to enter the verdict for the defendants, or for a new trial,

Mellish and Pope now shewed cause.—From the verdict of the jury it must be assumed that M'Grath was guilty of negligence. It will be contended that for this negligence the company are not liable, as section 47. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act only casts upon them the duty of employing a keeper to open and shut the gates at the level crossing, to employ proper persons to open and shut such gates and to keep such gates constantly closed across the road on both sides of the railway, except "when horses, cattle, carts or carriages have to cross the railway." But by employing a keeper of the gate the company make him their agent, to give information respecting it and respecting the state of the line. Stapley v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 7) is in favour of the plaintiff. There the person injured was a foot passenger, yet the company were held liable in consequence of the keeper of the carriage gate having left it open. In the case of Stubley v. the London and North Western Railway Company (Ibid. 3) the danger was manifest, and there was nothing to invite the deceased on to the railway. Neither can the company contend that their keeper has no duty towards a person using a private road. If they take upon themselves a duty which the law prima facie casts upon the individual, they are liable. The evidence adduced at the trial was sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Edward James, Aspinall and M'Rory, in support of the rule.—There was no breach of duty on the part of the company for which they are responsible in this action. No proof was given at the trial that the carriage gate which the carter attempted to pass through was open. The duty of M'Grath was merely to attend to the public crossing, and if people using the private road relied upon him to tell them when to come over they cannot throw the burden of any accident which has been caused thereby on the company. All that he had to do was to open or shut the gates; he is not required to say when the line is safe. If the defendants are liable, they would be liable if M'Grath refused to answer the question addressed to him. In the case of Stapley v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 7), the crossing was on a public road, thus distinguishing it from the present case. The case of Stubley v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (Ibid. 3) is in point, and explains the case of Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182), shewing that that decision was founded on special circumstances and laid down no fixed principle. By section 68. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, the company are required to erect gates for the accommodation of adjoining landowners, but they are not called upon to guard these gates. The verdict is directly in the teeth of the evidence adduced at the trial, and ought to be set aside.

BLACKBURN, J.—After considering both the grounds which have been relied upon, I think that this rule ought to be discharged. The question of fact is, whether the accident was owing to M'Grath's negligence. A new trial has already been obtained, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence; and as this verdict has been supported by the finding of a second jury, I do not think that we ought to interfere with it. The other question, which is well worthy of consideration, is, whether the negligence imputed to M'Grath was negligence within the scope of his duty so as to make the company responsible. It appears that the company have constructed their line so as to pass transversely over a public highway, and that there is a private way from Crossfield's yard over the railway to a gate on the opposite side, which is one of the gates erected by the company for the purpose of guarding the level crossing. As to private ways, section 68. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act imposed upon railway companies the duty of erecting all necessary gates and other works for the accommodation of landowners adjoining the railway, and these gates are left under the control of those for whose benefit they are made, and who are liable to a penalty if they leave them open. And by section 47, where a turnpike or carriage road is crossed on a level, the company are to keep good and sufficient gates on each side of the road, and employ proper persons to open and shut the gates. The act does not say that these "proper persons" when they open such gates, are to look and see whether it is reasonably safe and proper to do so, and that if the line is in such a state that it would be dangerous to cross it they are to exercise their discretion, and prevent it from being crossed; but it plainly means that the gate-keepers are to exercise reasonable diligence in keeping the line clear. In Stapley v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 7) the company had made regulations, by which they directed their gate-keepers to exercise their discretion, and look along the line and satisfy themselves that no train or engine was in sight. These were very proper regulations; but I think that the company were bound to observe them whether they so directed their servants or not, and that it is the duty of the keeper whom they employ to see that the line is clear. Here the occupation road crosses the line in such a way that on the west side of it there is a public gate, through which Mr. Crossfield (who is entitled to the private way) has no occasion to pass; but on the side opposite this gate, instead of making one outlet for the private way and another gate for the public road, the company have constructed one common gate for both ways. It may be that a different arrangement was impracticable; but whether this were the case or not, one gate has been constructed, and it is the duty of the keeper stationed at it to exercise the same discretion with regard to all persons who enter, whether for the purpose of going to Crossfield's yard or of passing over the public road. In the present case the matter is a little complicated, because the carter was going from Crossfield's yard; but as he could only clear the railway if the gate on the opposite side were kept open, it was absolutely necessary when he started from the private gate, to call to the keeper on the opposite side to open the public gate. According to the carter's evidence, he did call out, and the answer was, "Come on." Now, there can be no possible doubt that if M'Grath called out, knowing or having the means of knowing that the line was not clear, he was guilty of negligence. Whether, with any such means of knowledge, he did call out, is a question of fact; but if having the custody of the gate he is addressed in words which substantially amount to these, "Is the line clear?" and he answers "Yes," or words to that effect, it seems to me that he is acting in a matter which belongs to his regular duty, and that what he says is an invitation to the person who questions him to come upon the railway. I think, therefore, that this is a stronger case than Stapley v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 7). In that case the gate-keeper was absent, and had left the carriage gate open, and although the person injured was a foot passenger, on whom there was no duty to open and shut the gate, yet it was held that as he might reasonably think when he saw the gate open that this was an invitation to carriage passengers, and that the line was safe, there was evidence of neglect on the part of the company. Here the only gate which the carter could use was that placed for the public traffic, and it was much more within the duty of the gatekeeper to warn the man who could not pass without this gate being opened. I think, therefore, that there is evidence of negligence on the part of the company.

I wish to add this. I do not think that this case requires us to decide what would have been the liability of the defendants if the private road had been near M'Grath's hut, and had not passed through the public gate. It would have been his duty, as a matter of humanity, to have warned anybody proposing to cross the line; but I do not think it necessary to decide whether, if he had failed to do so, this would have been a breach of duty for which the company would be responsible.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. A manifest miscarriage of justice would be required, to set aside the verdict as against evidence, and I cannot say that this verdict was manifestly wrong. The next thing which we have to consider is, was there any misdirection in the manner in which the case was left to the jury? It has been contended, by Mr. James, that the statute imposes only the naked obligation of opening and shutting the gates upon a level crossing. But this argument seems to me to lead to the absurdity of supposing that the gate-keeper must allow anybody who wishes to do so, to pass at the risk of being crushed by the approaching trains. This cannot be the case. The gate-keeper is not a mere machine; he must exercise some judgment as to whether it is or is not safe to open the gates. There can be no doubt as to what is done in practice, as most persons who have passed through such gates will remember that they have been occasionally stopped by the keepers. It has been said, that whatever may be the rule as to gates across a public way, this rule does not apply to gates across a private way. But I think that we are relieved from the necessity of considering this question, for the gate was placed across both the public and the private way. Now, the company were not bound to keep one gate in front of both ways; they kept it in this position for their own convenience, and the obligation of the keeper is the same towards all persons who have a right to make use of the gate. I think, therefore, that the keeper might reasonably be expected to say to all proposing to cross the way by means of the gate, "Come on," or "Keep back," as occasion might require; and that as in Stapley v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 7), the circumstance that the gates were left open was said, by my Brother Channell, to amount to an invitation to passengers to cross the railway, so here the words used by M'Grath may be said to have the same effect. I think, therefore, that in calling out "Come on," he was not going beyond the line of his duties as servant to the company, and that they cannot escape from their liability in this action.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, on the ground that the conduct of the gate-keeper amounted to a breach of duty, for which the company are responsible. The defendants have asked for a literal interpretation to be put upon section 47. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, which provides, "that if the railway cross any turnpike-road or public carriage-road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road on each side of the railway, where the same shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates, and such gates shall be kept constantly closed across such road on both sides of the railway except during the time when horses, cattle, carts or carriages passing along the same shall have to cross such railway, and such gates shall be of such dimensions and so constructed as when closed to fence in the railway, and prevent cattle or horses passing along the road from entering upon the railway; and the person intrusted with the care of such gates shall cause the same to be closed as soon as such horses, cattle, carts or carriages shall have passed through the same." They contend that the words of this section only mean that the gates are to be opened or shut as occasion may require. But this is too narrow an interpretation; the section was framed to protect passengers using a level crossing, and the words "opening and shutting the gates" are the express formula, indicating a much larger amount of duty than is expressed in the bare words. It has also been said that the duty imposed by the section is only to keep, when necessary, cattle from crossing the railway, and that there is no duty with regard to foot passengers, and no duty with regard to persons using a part of the line in the exercise of a private right of way. But the object of the act is to prevent persons from crossing the railway upon occasions when it would be dangerous to do so. Now, suppose a person on horseback and a foot passenger arrived at one of these gates at the same time, went through and both perished, are the company to be held liable for the death of the man on horseback but not liable for what happens to the other? Suppose a person is going to these premises, instead of coming from them, is he to be entitled to protection on the first part of his journey but not on his way back? The statutory regulations are for the benefit of persons who have passed through any one of the public gates, and it can surely make no difference if such a person, instead of going straight to the public gate opposite, turns aside and passes over the railroad by means of a private road. Assuming, therefore, that the company would have been liable for the act of the gate-keeper, if at the time of the accident he had thrown the gate open and invited the lorry to pass over the public way, I think that the same consequence would attend an invitation to pass over this private way. But if the keeper, by words or gestures, gave the carter reason to conclude that the way was safe, he did the same, in fact, as if he had invited him upon the line. I think, therefore, that there is evidence of a breach of duty on the part of the company by their servant, for which they are liable. With regard to the verdict, I agree with my Brother Blackburn in thinking that the evidence does not justify us in sending down the case to be re-tried, now that two juries have arrived at the same decision.

Rule discharged.

WILLIAMS AND OTHERS v. EVANS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 111; L. R. 1 Q.B. 352; 13 L. T. 753; 14 W. R. 330.

Principal and Agent—Authority of Auctioneer to take Payment by Bill of Exchange—Conditions of Sale.

AUCTIONEERS AND VALUERS. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—An auctioneer sold at an auction some goods on conditions which required the purchaser to make full cash payment to the auctioneer or the clerk of sale before delivery of the goods. Before the goods were delivered the auctioneer received from the purchaser a bill of exchange in part payment of the goods, and agreed to take it as cash, and it was discounted for him at his banker's. After this, but before the bill came to maturity, the vendor gave the purchaser notice not to pay any money to the auctioneer. The bill was paid at maturity. The auctioneer having failed to pay over the whole of the receipts of the sale, the vendor sued the purchaser for payment for the goods:—Held, that the auctioneer had no authority to take payment by a bill, and that the vendor was therefore entitled to a verdict for the amount of the bill.

Semble, per Blackburn, J.—that if the bill had come to maturity before the vendor revoked the authority of the auctioneer to receive payment, the payment by the bill would have been a good payment.

The declaration contained the common counts for goods sold and delivered and money due on accounts stated, and claimed 48*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*

Pleas, except as to a certain sum, parcel, &c., first, never indebted; and secondly, payment; and as to the said sum, payment into court.

Issue on the first and second pleas.

The money claimed was in respect of malt and other goods sold to the defendant at an auction on the 2nd of November, 1864. The plaintiffs gave credit for certain sums received in cash, and claimed a balance of 48*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*

At the trial, before Shee, J., at the Summer Assizes, 1865, for the county of Carmarthen, the plaintiffs proved that they instructed Leyshon, an auctioneer, to sell certain goods upon conditions of which the parts material to this report were as follows:

“ 3. Each purchaser to furnish his or her name and residence, and to pay down into the hands of the auctioneer or Mr. George Griffiths, the clerk of sale, a deposit of 5*s.* in the pound in part payment of each lot; remainder or balance to be paid on or before delivery of the goods or lots purchased.

“ 4. The lots sold will be at the purchaser's risk from the fall of the hammer, and must be taken with any faults and errors of any description, and be duly paid for on delivery to the auctioneer or clerk. The goods may remain on the premises till Thursday evening, the 3rd of November, 1864.

"5. On failure of complying with any of these conditions, or in the event of any purchaser failing to make full cash payment within stated time for delivery, the lots, &c. to be forfeited with the deposit, and the vendor or auctioneer to resell," &c.

Evidence was given, on the part of the plaintiffs, that Leyshon was instructed to pay the money into a bank to the plaintiffs' account as he received it; that the sale took place on the 2nd of November, when the malt and other goods mentioned in the particulars of demand were purchased by the defendant; that on the 7th of November Leyshon paid into the bank to the credit of the sale account a large sum, part of which was the defendant's cheque for the goods (excluding the malt) bought by him; that on the 7th of November the plaintiffs desired the defendant not to pay Leyshon any money, but to pay the rest to them; that the malt was delivered to the defendant on the 7th of November; that the defendant afterwards produced a receipt from Leyshon for 47*l.* 4*s.*, dated the 9th of November, and that Leyshon was a defaulter.

On the part of the defendant, evidence was given that the real purchaser of the malt was James Hall, whom the defendant allowed to buy in the defendant's name; that Hall paid Leyshon part of the money due for the malt by 32*l.* in gold, on account, on the 4th of November, and a further part on account on the 5th of November, by an accepted three months' bill of exchange, dated the 20th of October, 1864, for 15*l.* 7*s.*, drawn and indorsed by Hall; that Leyshon agreed to take the bill as cash, and that it was discounted for him at his banker's, and that it was paid on the 24th of December ensuing. The receipt for 47*l.* 4*s.* was not produced at the trial; but the defendant's counsel contended that the receipt, even if dated the 9th of November, was in respect of the payments of the 4th and 5th of November. The defendant swore that he "thought" the day on which the plaintiffs desired him to pay no more money to Leyshon was the 9th of November.

Mr. Justice Shee directed the jury that if they believed Hall had paid the sum of 32*l.* in gold and the bill for 15*l.* 7*s.* on the 4th and 5th of November respectively, and that Leyshon's authority to receive money was not revoked till the 7th of November, they must find a verdict for the defendant; but reserved leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for 15*l.* 7*s.* if the jury found for the defendant.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Giffard having accordingly, on the 6th of November, 1865, obtained a rule nisi calling on the defendant to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a verdict for 15*l.* 7*s.* entered for the plaintiffs, on the ground that Leyshon had no authority to give credit to a purchaser at the sale,—

J. W. Bowen now shewed cause.—(It was conceded that the balance due from Leyshon for the receipts of the sale exceeded the amount sued for in this action, and that the defendant was liable for the malt purchased by Hall.)—I contend that the bill for 15*l.* 7*s.* was a good payment, since Leyshon, the auctioneer, agreed to take it as cash. It was, therefore, equivalent to a cash payment. But, further, an auctioneer has authority to take payment in any way he pleases, subject to his responsibility to his principal if a default occurs.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It may be an important question whether or not the bill was duly paid at maturity.]

Here no default occurred, for the bill was duly met at maturity.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Had the auctioneer authority to consent to take a bill instead of cash?]

The third condition of sale does not specify cash before delivery. In Robinson v. Rutter (24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 250; s. c. 4 El. & B. 954) a plea of payment to the principal was held no answer to an action by the auctioneer, for an auctioneer is not an ordinary agent, but has a lien on the goods sold, and on the proceeds of the sale. Sykes v. Giles (9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 106; s. c. 5 Mee. & W. 645) is distinguishable, for there the auctioneer was restricted by special conditions, and he had no authority to receive payment at all. Here the plaintiffs were not in any way prejudiced by the auctioneer's taking the bill, for he expressly agreed to take it as cash, and paid it into his own private account at his banker's, and it was duly paid at maturity. The plaintiffs would not have been better off if the auctioneer had taken gold instead of a bill, for he might have spent the money immediately afterwards, and would have been equally a defaulter.

[SHEE, J.—If the auctioneer agreed to take the bill as cash, he could not have sued upon it had it been dishonoured.]

Giffard and H. G. Allen, in support of the rule.—The point is concluded by Sykes v. Giles (9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 106; s. c. 5 Mee. & W. 645), which is an authority that an auctioneer, as such, has no right to take a bill of exchange instead of cash. Mr. Baron Parke, after deciding that the conditions of sale did not authorize the auctioneer to receive payment at all, says, "But even if the auctioneer had had authority to receive the remainder of the purchase-money, he had no authority to receive it in this way, by means of a bill of exchange. Cash payment was intended, and not a bill of exchange."

[BLACKBURN, J.—If my banker chooses to take bills for money due to me, and gives me his personal liability, I never could see that I am worse off than if the banker takes gold and gives me his personal liability. There are many expressions of very learned Judges that might lead me to think that that is not law; but it has always seemed to me to be common sense.]

This was a ready money sale according to the conditions. What right had the auctioneer to suspend the vendor's right to immediate payment? If he might suspend it for the few weeks this bill had to run, he might do it for twelve months or any length of time.

[BLACKBURN, J.—How is the vendor's right suspended if the auctioneer makes himself personally liable? If your argument is good, a cheque which cannot be cashed for twenty-four hours is equally a suspension of the right.]

There the money is supposed to be lying at the banker's at the moment of taking the cheque.

[SHEE, J.—Story on Agency says, section 98, "An agent authorized to receive payment has not an unlimited authority to receive it in any mode which he may choose; but he is ordinarily deemed intrusted with the power to receive it in money only"; and see section 181.]

Bunney v. Poyntz (4 B. & Ad. 568; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) K.B. 55) is in point. In Barker v. Greenwood (2 You. & C. 414) it was held, that a debtor must pay his creditor's agent in cash unless he can shew that the agent had authority to receive payment in any other way.¹

BLACKBURN, J.—On the point reserved at the trial, whether the payment to the auctioneer by the bill of exchange was a good payment, I think on authority that it was not. If the bill had matured before the authority to the auctioneer to receive payment had been revoked, I think then the payment by the bill would have been equivalent to money handed to the auctioneer. Here the authority was revoked after the bill was handed to the auctioneer, but before its maturity. The general rule is, that an agent to receive payment must receive it in money, and not in a bill of exchange, unless a custom is proved which establishes that such a payment is good usage. We are not now concerned as to whether this is a good rule, but there is authority for it, and that is sufficient for this case. The passage cited from Story shews his opinion of the rule. In Sykes v. Giles (9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 106; s. c. 5 Mee. & W. 645) Mr. Baron Parke, though it was not necessary for the decision, expressed a strong opinion that the auctioneer in that case could not receive payment by a bill. There are many cases, and one so long ago as Sir Charles Thorold v. Smith (11 Mod. [87]), where the question has been raised whether a payment in the city to merchants otherwise than by cash was good or not, and it has been held, that it would not be good on a general authority to receive money, but that it would be good if authority could be implied from the course of trade. Chief Justice Holt in that case "thought that this was more matter of evidence than law; and any jury at Guildhall would find payment by a bill to be a good payment, it being the common practice of the city." In such a case probably no jury would have any doubt that a payment by a cheque was good. But in the case of an auctioneer, Sykes v. Giles (9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 106; s. c. 5 Mee. & W. 645) is an authority to shew that payment by a bill is not a good payment. The rule must therefore be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Before the authority was revoked the auctioneer received the bill; but when the bill came to maturity the authority had been revoked. The general rule is, that an agent to receive payment must not receive it so as to tie up the right of his principal to immediate payment. The rule seems to be clearly established, unless the authority is extended, and there is nothing in this case to shew that it was.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule absolute.

KEMP v. WADDINGHAM AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 114; L. R. 1 Q.B. 355; 13 L. T. 709; 14 W. R. 390.

The Law of Property Amendment Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38) ss. 1-5 was repealed by 63 & 64 Vict. c. 26. s. 5 (sched.), the latter section being repealed by S.L.R. 1908.

Priority—Judgment Debt—Registration of Judgment under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15. s. 4.—Death of Judgment Debtor after 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 3.—Writ of Revivor.

JUDGMENT.—K. obtained, in 1854, a judgment against W, who died intestate in 1862. K. registered the judgment in 1863, and sued out a writ of revivor against W's administrators, who had before the judgment was registered exhausted the assets in payment of simple contract debts. K. brought an action against the administrators on the writ of revivor:—Held, that since the judgment had not been registered under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15. s. 3, until 1863, and the intestate died in 1862, after the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. came into operation, the effect of section 3. of the latter act was to deprive the judgment debt of all priority over simple contract debts.

This was an action on a writ of revivor, sued out by the plaintiff against the defendants, as such administrators, &c., on the 17th of April, 1863, of a judgment obtained by the plaintiff on the 29th of June, 1854, against the intestate Thomas Waddingham for 204l.

The defendants pleaded that they had fully administered all the personal estate, &c., and that they had not at the time of the suing out of the writ of revivor, nor at any time since, any personal estate, &c.

Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Erle, C.J., at the Summer Assizes, 1865, for Cambridge-shire, the following facts were proved. The debtor, Thomas Waddingham, died, intestate, on the 14th of November, 1862. The judgment was registered on the 25th of February, 1863. The defendants exhausted the whole of the assets, 189l. 8s., in payment of the funeral and testamentary expenses and of the simple contract debts of the intestate, which payments were all made before the judgment was registered.

The defendants' counsel contended that, by virtue of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 3, the judgment had no priority over the simple contract debts. Erle, C.J. directed a verdict for the defendants, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for her on the statutes, and if the plaintiff should be right in her construction of the statute, then a verdict for the plaintiff for 185l. 4s. 6d., less certain sums to be agreed upon by the counsel for the parties.

O'Malley, having accordingly on the 6th of November, 1865, obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for the defendants, and to enter it for the plaintiff for 185l. 4s. 6d. less certain sums, Keane and Douglas Brown now shewed cause.—The only important dates are, the judgment obtained in 1854, the passing of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38 (Royal Assent 23rd of July, 1860), and the death of the intestate in 1862. The registration of the judgment in 1863, after the intestate's death, was of no use whatever. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. had been in force more than two years before the intestate died. That statute was passed in consequence of Fuller v. Redman (26 Beav. 600; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 324), which decided that an unregistered judgment had priority over simple contract debts paid without notice of the judgment. Section 3. of that act, after reciting 4 and 5 W. & M. c. 20, which protected heirs, executors and administrators against undocketed judgments, and that the dockets under that act had been finally closed; and that in consequence of certain later acts which restored docketing, but did not expressly restore the protection to executors, &c., the latter persons had been held to have lost the protection which they enjoyed under the 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, and that it was expedient that the same should be restored, enacts, "That no judgment which has not already been, or which shall not hereafter be entered or docketed under the several acts now in force, and which passed subsequently to the said act of the 4 & 5 W. & M., so as to bind lands, tenements or hereditaments, as against purchasers, mortgagees or creditors, shall have any preference against heirs, executors or administrators, in their administration of their ancestors', testators' or intestates' estates." In re Turner (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 232) decided that this section absolutely deprives unregistered judgments of all priority over debts of a lower degree. As to judgments against administrators, see In re Rigby (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 149). In Evans v. Williams (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 661) it was held that section 4. did not deprive a judgment creditor who had registered, but had not re-registered within five years before the debtor's death, of his priority over creditors of a lower degree. But that was on the ground that the statute must not be construed to take away a right existing at the time the act was passed. Here the plaintiff had no existing rights to be taken away.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The intention of the legislature seems quite plain—to patch up a hole left open by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15. s. 4. The only question is, have they mended it?]

O'Malley and Lumley Smith, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff contends that the hole was not effectually stopped. The judgment was obtained in 1854, and then, without registration, affected purchasers, and had priority over simple contract debts—2 Lush's Practice, 3rd edit. by Dixon, p. 574.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It had not actually priority; but if the intestate had then died, it would have had priority.]

Then, in 1855, came the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15. s. 4, which said: Register, and if you do not register, your judgment shall not affect purchasers or mortgagees. That statute did not touch the force of the judgment as against executors, and we therefore had a vested right of preference to simple contract creditors. Then comes the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 3, and says, no judgment which is not registered so as to bind purchasers shall bind executors. It is impossible that that statute can have been intended to apply to such a judgment as this; for no statute is to be construed so as to destroy vested rights, unless it is expressly so enacted.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Why should it not be construed as retrospective if the intention be clear? If the intestate had died before the passing of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, then I think your argument might have been good, but that act gave the plaintiff full warning. You cannot deny that there never was a case in which the intention of the legislature was so plain.]

The judgment was good as a judgment “entered and signed” under the 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, and since that statute was made perpetual by the 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 36. s. 3, it comes within the exception of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 3, as a judgment entered and docketed under an act passed subsequently to the 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20. If the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 3. has the construction contended for by the defendants it would equally apply if the intestate had died one day after that statute had come into force, and that would be a monstrous injustice on a judgment creditor.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the matter is perfectly clear, and that the intention of the legislature is so expressed as to leave no real doubt about it. The state of the law was this: owing to mistakes committed in earlier acts, a judgment bound lands in the hands of purchasers who bought without notice after the judgment had been obtained, and this even when the judgment was not registered; and if an executor exhausted the estate in paying other debts, he committed a devastavit, though he was not aware of the existence of the judgment. This was so in 1854, and then it was thought hard on a purchaser, without notice, that he should be liable to the extent of half his lands to a judgment though not registered. In order to prevent this hardship, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15. enacted, that after the passing of that act, unless the judgment was registered previously to the purchase, the purchaser should not be liable. If the judgment was registered then it was the purchaser’s own fault if he did not discover it. But this statute left untouched the case of the executor, who, having looked for a judgment in the registry and not finding it might, nevertheless, after paying simple contract debts, be liable to the judgment. This was thought very hard, and in 1860, the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. s. 3, after reciting former acts, and saying, “whereas the said several later acts do not expressly enact that judgments not docketed as thereby required shall not have any preference against heirs, executors, or administrators in their administration of their ancestors’, testators’, or intestates’ estates, in consequence whereof such heirs, executors, or administrators have been held to have lost the protection which they enjoyed under the said first-recited act, and it is expedient that the same should be restored”—that is, in effect, that executors should have this protection in paying simple contract debts—proceeds, “Be it therefore enacted, that no judgment which has not already been, or which shall not hereafter be entered or docketed under the several acts now in force, and which passed subsequently to the said act of 4 & 5 W. & M. so as to bind lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as against purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, shall have any preference against heirs, executors, or administrators, in their administration of their ancestors’, testators’, or intestates’ estates.”

This judgment was good for one year after it was obtained, and would for that time have bound lands in the hands of a purchaser or mortgagee, but it would not have done so when the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38. was passed. Once it had that effect as against purchasers, but when that act passed it had not, because it was not registered, and the legislature expresses its intention clearly that this provision should apply to judgments already existing. The object was plain, namely, that a judgment which is not registered so as to bind subsequent purchasers, shall not bind executors or administrators. This construction does not deprive any one of any vested right. If the intestate had died in 1860, before the passing of that act, then it might have taken away a vested right; but it was not so. The effect of the act, then, is, that until a judgment is so registered as required, an executor need not regard it as having any priority over simple contract debts.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Lumley Smith's very ingenious argument did not produce any impression on my mind that the statute can be made to bear any other construction than that which my Brother Blackburn has given to it.

SHEE, J. concurred.

COBB v. THE MID-WALES RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Q.B. 117; L. R. 1 Q.B. 342; 14 W. R. 775;
12 Jur. N.S. 228.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 34, 51, 52, 68, 93, 94.—Costs of Inquiry whether Value of Land intersected by Railway Company's Works is greater than Expense of making a Communication with it.

RAILWAY.—A railway company is not liable to the costs of an inquiry (under section 94. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act) as to whether land intersected by the works of the railway is of less value than the expense of making a communication between it; as the sections of the statute which award costs apply only to cases where the obligation of the company to take land is not in question.

This was a motion for a rule for a direction to the Master to tax the plaintiff his costs of an inquiry, under section 94. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, as to the cost of making a communication between the plaintiff's land, and as to the value of the land.

The facts were as follows:

J. R. Cobb, the plaintiff, was the owner of two fields, the first consisting of something more and the second of rather less than two acres. One field lay on the north side and the other on the south side of the Hay tramroad. Access to each field was obtained by the tramroad only (over which the owners and occupiers for the time being of each field had a right of way to the public road). The access was through gates opening on the road.

The Mid-Wales Railway Company, by their special acts, acquired the tramroad and strips of each of these two fields adjoining it. On a portion of the land so acquired, the company constructed their line of railway, in such a manner as to destroy all access from one to the other of the two fields, or from either field to a public road. Besides this the wire fences inclosing the company's land had no gates, so that the occupier of the fields had no means of getting into or out of them with cattle. The plaintiff took proceedings, under sections 70. and 71. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, and obtained an order from two Justices directing the company to make good the interruption to the use of one of the fields caused by the railway, and to make a convenient passage or way from that field to the other, carried by an arch or tunnel of at least 9 feet in breadth and 9 feet in height. The company thereupon, on the 11th of July, 1865, gave the plaintiff notice that if he required the company to make such arch, tunnel or communication, the company would require him to sell to them one of the pieces of land (numbered 46), and that if after ten days from the notice he failed to agree with the company as to the sale of this piece of land, and any dispute should arise as to its value, or what would be the expense of making the arch, tunnel or communication, or failed to satisfy the company that he had other lands adjoining this piece of land, the company, in pursuance of the statutes in such case made and provided, would proceed to have the value of the piece of land, and what would be the expense of making the arch, tunnel or communication, duly ascertained.

On the 25th of July the plaintiff gave the company notice (without prejudice to his right at any future time to contend that section 94. of the Lands Clauses Act had no application to the case, and that the company were bound to make the arch, &c.) that they had no such right as claimed under the notice; that he required the company to make the arch, tunnel or communication; that he was not willing to sell the piece of land No. 46; that he did not admit that this land was of less value than the expense of making the communication; and that he required the company to issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury for ascertaining and determining the question; and that if the company did not proceed with all due despatch, he would himself (under section 70. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act) begin to execute the works directed by the order of Justices.

On the 14th of August the warrant of the company was delivered to the sheriff, requesting him to summon a jury to assess and give a verdict for the sum of money which they should consider the value of the piece of land No. 46, and also to assess and give a verdict for the sum of money which would be the cost of making the arch, &c.

On the 5th of September the inquiry was commenced before a special jury, who found that the piece of land was of less value than the expense of making a communication with it. They assessed the value of the land at 268l. 1s. 6d., and the cost of making the arch, &c. at 300l.

The plaintiff thereupon applied to a Master of the Court, under section 52. of the Lands Clauses Act, to tax him the costs of the inquiry; and it was agreed that the Master should refuse, in order that the opinion of the Court might be at once taken.

Tindal Atkinson, Serj. (H. Lloyd with him) now moved for a rule in the terms above stated.—The plaintiff is entitled to his costs under the express words of section 94,¹ which provides that the value of the land and the cost of the communication between it shall be ascertained as in cases of disputed compensation. The costs in ordinary compensation cases are regulated by sections 34. and 51, which provide that the costs are to fall on the company, unless they have previously offered a sum less than the amount recovered. Here no offer has been made by the company, and they are clearly liable.

(1) By the Lands Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18) section 93, with respect to small portions of intersected land, "If any lands not being situate in a town or built upon shall be so cut through and divided by the works as to leave, either on both sides or on one side thereof, a less quantity of land than half a statute acre, and if the owner of such small parcel of land require the promoters of the undertaking to purchase the same along with the other land required for the purposes of the special act, the promoters of the undertaking shall purchase the same accordingly, unless the owner thereof have other land adjoining to that so left into which the same can be thrown, so as to be conveniently occupied therewith; and if such owner have any other land so adjoining, the promoters of the undertaking shall, if so required by the owner, at their own expense, throw the piece of land so left into such adjoining land, by removing the fences and levelling the sites thereof, and by soiling the same in a sufficient and workmanlike manner."

By section 94, "If any such land shall be so cut through and divided as to leave on either side of the works a piece of land of less extent than half a statute acre, or of less value than the expense of making a bridge, culvert or such other communication between the land so divided as the promoters of the undertaking are, under the provisions of this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, compellable to make, and if the owner of such lands have not other lands adjoining such piece of land, and require the promoters of the undertaking to make such communication, then the promoters of the undertaking may require such owner to sell to them such piece of land, and any dispute as to the value of such piece of land, or as to what would be the expense of making such communication, shall be ascertained as herein provided for cases of disputed compensation; and on the occasion of ascertaining the value of the land required to be taken for the purposes of the works, the jury or the arbitrators, as the case may be, shall, if required by either party, ascertain by their verdict or award the value of any such severed piece of land, and also what would be the expense of making such communication."

Karslake and Littler shewed cause in the first instance.—The plaintiff is not entitled to his costs. All provisions as to costs in the Lands Clauses Act stop with section 68, and there is nothing afterwards to give a right to them. These earlier sections relate to disputed compensation, where the company is empowered to take the land.

[MELLOR, J.—This is only an incidental inquiry as to the value of the land. Could the company have protected themselves by making an offer for the purchase of it?]

They could not. The landowner raises the question by saying that the communication will cost less than the value of the land. He makes no claim for any sum as the value of the land. This is the question which the jury have to try, and it is in no respect like an ordinary case where nothing but the amount of compensation is in dispute. The value of the land may not be questioned.

[BLACKBURN, J. referred to Corrigal v. the London and Blackwall Railway Company (5 Man. & G. 249; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 209), where it was held (before the Lands Clauses Act) that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs, as his case did not fall within those specified in the special act, in which the company were made liable to the costs.]

The legislature could never have contemplated this case. Section 38. applies only to cases where the company are about to take land—Railstone v. the York, Newcastle and Berwick Railway Company (15 Q.B. Rep. 404; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 464).

Tindal Atkinson, Serj., in reply.—The landowner may be right in the main issue which has arisen between him and the company. The value of the land may be less than the cost of the communication, and yet the construction contended for would deprive him of his costs. An offer by the company has always been considered an important element in questions relating to costs—Richardson v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 154; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 236).

[MELLOR, J.—It may be that the words “shall be ascertained as herein provided for cases of disputed compensation” may mean “so far as the value of the land is concerned.”]

The plaintiff was compelled to go on with the inquiry, as no offer was made to him.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I have come to the conclusion (but not without considerable hesitation) that this rule must be discharged. The 94th section of the Lands Clauses Act does undoubtedly provide that the inquiry to be held under that section, as to the value of a piece of land intersected by the company's works, shall be conducted and the result ascertained as provided by the statute for cases of disputed compensation. Now, in cases of disputed compensation, the owner of the land is entitled to his costs of the inquisition, if no offer has been previously made by the company for the purchase of the land. Here no offer was made by the company; and it would seem to follow, according to the practice in other cases, that the claimant must have his costs. But, when we come to look more closely at the language of the 94th section, it seems to me that the only conclusion at which it is possible to arrive is, that there has been casus omissus; and that when the framer of the act inserted the words, “shall be ascertained as herein provided for cases of disputed compensation,” the provisions of the act with reference to such cases were not present to his mind. Now, the inquiry under the 94th section has two main branches—First, whether the expenses of the communication which the owner of the land insists upon having made are greater than the value of the land. If this is proved to be the case, the company have the option of taking the land. The second branch of the inquiry is a question of compensation: what is the value of the land, assuming that the company are bound to take it? If the present case could be considered to belong to the latter branch of inquiry, it might be regarded as a question of compensation. But here, unfortunately, we are dealing with what belongs to the first branch of the inquiry, and in such circumstances the legislature seems to have made no provision for costs. If the value of the land had been greater than the expense of the desired communication, a question of compensation might have arisen. But the jury have found that the value of the land is less than the cost of the communication, so that there never has been any question of compensation, and there is therefore no right to costs. There can be no doubt that it would have been much better if the 94th section had stated in express terms whether or not the landowner was to be entitled to costs; but in the absence of anything to throw light upon the words of the section, we must take them by themselves; and all we can say is, that the regulations of section 51, concerning costs where a previous offer has or has not been made by the company, are not applicable here, and that it is not for us to supply any deficiency in the statute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have come to the same conclusion,—like my Lord, with considerable doubt and hesitation. It seems to me that this is casus omissus, and that the legislature has not provided for the costs. Costs, I need hardly say, are not matter of right unless the intention of the legislature to give them has been made plain. Now the 94th section provides—[His Lordship read the section].—The value of the land intersected and the expense of making a communication with it are to be ascertained as provided in the statute for cases of disputed compensation. Now, where the company have only to consider the price to be paid for the land, they may readily make an offer; but where the landowner does not assent to the company's proposals, no offer can be made so as to supersede the necessity of an inquiry. The company may offer ten times the value of the land; but they have no right to take possession of it, so as to dispense with the inquiry. Now, what says the 94th section?—that the costs are to be ascertained as provided for in cases of disputed compensation. There are a number of sections in the act applicable to cases of disputed compensation; but the two sections relating to costs are section 34,—which provides (where any disputed compensation is referred to an arbitrator) that "all the costs of any such arbitration, and incident thereto, to be settled by the arbitrators, shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking, unless the arbitrators shall award the same or a less sum than shall have been offered by the promoters of the undertaking, in which case each party shall bear his own costs incident to the arbitration, and the costs of the arbitrators shall be borne by the parties in equal proportions,"—and section 51,—which provides, in the case of an inquiry before a jury, that where the verdict shall be given for a greater sum than the sum previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking, all the costs of the inquiry shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking, but if the verdict be given for the same or a less sum than the sum previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking, &c., one-half the costs of summoning, impanelling and returning the jury, and of taking the inquiry and recording the verdict and judgment thereon, in case such verdict shall be taken, shall be defrayed by the owner of the lands, and the other half by the promoters of the undertaking; and each party shall bear his own costs, other than as aforesaid, incident to such inquiry. In each section the legislature makes the right to costs dependent on the making of an offer. And it has been held that in a case where notice is given to the company by persons injuriously affected under the 68th section, the company have the same privileges as to costs as are given by section 51, if they make an offer within a reasonable time, although the legislature has made no express provision to this effect.² But in both these instances the right to costs depends on the amount of the offer; and under the 94th section, as I have already pointed out, no offer can supersede the necessity of an inquiry, and the legislature cannot be said to have incorporated the provisions of the statute as to costs into every part of this section. I can imagine cases where our decision may cause hardship; but the legislature has made no express allusion to the subject; and whether this omission was caused by the parliamentary draughtsmen having overlooked the effect of the previous sections, or whether it was intentional, is no concern of ours. The rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. There seems to me to be an unsurmountable difficulty in endeavouring to apply the whole of the provisions of the statute as to costs in compensation cases to the words of the 94th section. It would appear that no offer can be made which would have the effect of protecting the company from their liability to costs, and I am therefore induced to think that the section was intentionally made silent as to costs. But whether this was the case or not, it seems to me that the words of the section do not incorporate the clauses giving costs. The value of the land is only collateral to the inquiry, and section 68. deals only with compensation for taking land or injuriously affecting it. A case of great hardship may be suggested, if a company, after paying compensation for injury to land by severance, were called upon years afterwards by a new owner to make communication between different parts of it, and made liable to the costs of a second valuation, which only proved that their own estimates were correct. The case is one of great difficulty; but I am unable to put any other construction upon the section than that adopted by my Lord and my Brother Blackburn.

Rule discharged.

VALENTIN v. HALL.

35 L. J. Q.B. 121; 14 W. R. 606.

Witness, Commission to examine—Alleged Prejudice on the part of Judge of a Foreign Court—Cross-Interrogatories.

EVIDENCE.—Upon application for a commission to issue directed to the Judges of a foreign Court, to examine witnesses on the part of the defendant, it appeared that the action was brought, in forma pauperis, to recover the value of certain shares and coupons, and it was objected by the plaintiff's attorney that she had already been interrogated by one of the Judges (whose name appeared in the commission) in the course of proceedings taken against her abroad, respecting the same shares and coupons; and it was stated, that this Judge had put questions to her suggesting that she had been guilty of fraud; that he had threatened her with imprisonment, and refused to hear evidence on her behalf; and it was requested that, even if the commission were allowed, she might be at liberty to exhibit cross-interrogatories to the witnesses for the defence:—Held, that the commission might issue, the name of the Judge complained of to be omitted from it, and the foreign Court to be requested not to allow him to take part in the examination. The plaintiff to be at liberty to cross-examine on interrogatories, if the foreign Court would allow such interrogatories to be used.

Rule to shew cause why a commission should not issue, directed to M. Benoit-Champy, President, M. Bedel and M. Bertrand, Vice Presidents, and the Judges of the Tribunal Civil of the Seine, in France, for the examination at Paris of witnesses on the part of the defendant, and why another commission should not issue, directed to M. Puissegur, President, M. Rességuier, Vice President, and the Judges of the Tribunal Civil of Saint Gaudens, in the department of the Haute Garonne, for the examination at Saint Gaudens of witnesses on the part of the defendant.

It appeared from the affidavits that the action was brought by the plaintiff, in forma pauperis, for the alleged seizing and taking of coupons and certificates of shares, negotiable securities and other papers and documents, and for the detention of certain notes of the Bank of France, coupons of the Orleans Railway, Crédit Mobilier, &c. The affidavits in support of the commission stated that two commissions in the cause had been already issued, directed to Mr. Maugham, of Paris, but that several witnesses, whose evidence was material, had refused to attend before him, though they were ready to be examined before any tribunal or Judge authorized to require their attendance and take evidence according to the law of France. The affidavits further stated that the Judges to whom the commission was proposed to be directed had power to compel the attendance of the witnesses and the production of their books, which contained entries relating to the title to the shares and coupons in question.

The commission was opposed by the plaintiff in an affidavit by her attorney, which stated, among other matters, that M. Bertrand, one of the proposed Commissioners, was not only mentioned in an affidavit by the defendant as intended to be examined as a witness for the defence, but that he was (according to the deponent's belief) the Juge d'Instruction by whom the plaintiff had been examined in France in proceedings against her relating to the shares and coupons in question. The affidavit went on to state, that it appeared from those proceedings themselves that M. Bertrand, in the course of the inquiry, had put questions to the plaintiff, suggesting that she had fraudulently attempted to prevent the shares and coupons from being traced. It also charged M. Bertrand with having kept the plaintiff in confinement, and otherwise endeavoured to intimidate her, and with having refused to hear evidence on her behalf. And it declared that, if the commission were directed to any Court of which M. Bertrand was a Judge, any witnesses who might be desirous of deposing in favour of the plaintiff would be intimidated, and their words and statements twisted and falsified to the prejudice of the plaintiff. In the event of either of the commissions being granted, the affidavit requested that it might be executed upon interrogatories and cross-interrogatories only (as the plaintiff was unable to afford the expense of employing any person to cross-examine the witnesses for the defence), and that the names, addresses and a full description of each witness intended to be examined on behalf of the defendant might be communicated to the plaintiff a sufficient time before the examination of these witnesses, to enable inquiry to be made about them. The cross-interrogatories not to be communicated to the defendant nor to the witnesses until their examination in chief was concluded, when they should be exhibited to them singly.

Quain now shewed cause.—The case of Lumley v. Gye (2 El. & B. 216; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 112) will be relied upon by the defendant in support of the commission. In that case a commission was directed to the Judges of a foreign Court, the witnesses having refused to be examined except by a foreign Judge. Here, however, there are additional objections to the proposed commission. It may possibly be entrusted to M. Bertrand, who has already examined the plaintiff and charged her with fraud and dishonesty. But if the Court are disposed to allow the commission, on the authority of Lumley v. Gye (2 El. & B. 216; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 112), then it is submitted that the plaintiff ought to be allowed to exhibit cross-interrogatories to the defendant's witnesses. It cannot be presumed that the French Court will refuse to administer these interrogatories.

J. D. Coleridge, in support of the rule.—With regard to the objection that the commission ought not to be directed to the Tribunal Civil of the Seine, of which M. Bertrand is a member, it has been ascertained that this tribunal, is composed of seventy-five members, and that it is the only one which would have jurisdiction to take the evidence which is required.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It would cause much delay if we were to direct inquiries as to the existence of any other competent tribunal.]

*Per Curiam*¹.—The rule must be made absolute for the commission to issue. The name of M. Bertrand to be left out of the commission to the Tribunal of the Seine, and that Court to be requested not to allow him to take part in the examination. The plaintiff to be at liberty to cross-examine on interrogatories, if the French Court will allow such interrogatories to be used. Copies of these interrogatories to be delivered to the defendant before the commencement of the examination.

Rule absolute.

M'CREA v. HOLDSWORTH AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 123; L. R. 1 Q.B. 264: affirmed, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Q.B. 297; L. R. 2 H. L. 380; 14 W. R. 374 (Exl. Ch.).

Copyright of Designs—Registration by Deposit of Pattern with the Registrar—21 & 22 Vict. c. 70. s. 5.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 100. s. 3.

COPYRIGHT.—By the Copyright of Designs Act, 1858, section 5, the registration of any matter or portion of article of manufacture to which a design is applied instead or in lieu of a copy, drawing, &c., shall be as valid and effectual as if such copy, drawing, &c. had been furnished to the registrar under the "Copyright of Designs Act":—Held, that a design formed by the combination of shaded and bordered stars upon an ornamented chain surface might be registered under this section, by simply depositing with the registrar a piece of woven cloth to which this combination had been applied; as the design, which must be taken to be the combination of ornaments on the cloth, was sufficiently disclosed.

Whether a design is sufficiently disclosed by a pattern or piece of cloth, is a question for the Court.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, discharging a rule to enter a verdict for the defendants. The facts and pleadings will be found in the report of the decision appealed from (5 Best & S. 495; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 329), and it will be sufficient, in order to understand the nature of the appeal, to state that the action was brought for infringing a design of which the plaintiff claimed to be the proprietor under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100²; and that the material plea was, that there had been no sufficient registration of the design according to the provisions of the statute.

(1) Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J. and Lush, J.

(2) By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100. s. 3. it is provided, that the proprietor of any new and original design not previously published in Great Britain and Ireland or elsewhere (whether the design be applicable to the ornamenting of any article of manufacture, or of any substance artificial or natural, or partly artificial and partly natural, and whether such design be so applicable for the pattern, or for the shape or configuration, or for the ornament thereof, or for any two or more of such purposes, and by whatever means such design may be so applicable, separate or combined), shall have the sole right to apply the same to any article of manufacture or to any such substances as aforesaid, provided the same be done within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (for the respective terms given in a table in the act). The section specifies a number of classes of articles, of which class 12. is "Woven fabrics not comprised in any preceding class."

By section 4, no person is to be entitled to the benefit of the act unless the design is duly registered.

By section 15 (prescribing the mode of registration), the inventor is to furnish the Registrar with two copies, drawings or prints of his design previous to registration.

By 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70. s. 5 (the Copyright of Designs Act), the registration of any pattern

On the second trial of the case, on the 18th of February, 1864, before Cockburn, C.J., at Guildhall, it appeared that the plaintiff had registered his design by furnishing to the registrar of designs (appointed under the act) two similar rectangular pieces of a woven fabric to which the pattern which he claimed had been applied. The registrar was furnished with the name, style and address of the plaintiff as proprietor of the design, and with the number of the class (class 12.) in respect of which the registration was made; but he was furnished with neither copy, drawing, print, specification or description in writing of the patterns. He gave to the plaintiff a certificate of registration with one of the pieces of the fabric annexed to it. The plaintiff before trial delivered as particulars of the novelty of his design, "the particular collocation of the shaded and bordered stars upon the ornamental chain surface as shewn in the registered pattern, thus forming together the ornamentation of the woven fabric." At the trial, the plaintiff claimed the combination of the particular stars on the particular groundwork in the manner shewn by the registered pattern, as forming one design applicable to the formation of woven fabrics comprised in class 12, but did not contend that the groundwork of the pattern was new or original.

It was contended by the defendants that they were entitled to have the verdict entered in their favour on the question of registration, as the plaintiff by his peculiar mode of registration had not clearly indicated the design which he intended to register.

The jury in answer to questions put to them by the Chief Justice, found that the star in question was new and original; that the combination of the star in question on the particular groundwork as shewn in the registered pattern was a new and original design, applicable to the ornamenting of woven fabrics comprised in class 12, and that this combination was the design which the plaintiff intended to register and had in fact registered. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendants to move to set it aside. A rule nisi for that purpose was accordingly granted by the Court of Queen's Bench, on the ground that the registration was bad. This rule was discharged by the Court in Trinity Term, 1864, and the present appeal was thereupon instituted.

Manisty (Denman and Kemplay with him), for the appellants, the defendants.—It is submitted that the decision of the Court below cannot be supported, as there has been no registration of the design in question within the meaning of the statutes. It is not easy to say what pattern is delineated on the piece of fabric which was registered, and it must be left to the jury to say what is the design which the plaintiff intended to register. A description in writing and by drawings is required by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100. before a design can be properly registered. The later act, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70. s. 5, allows the registration of a pattern or portion of an article of manufacture to be substituted for the previous mode of registration. Where the new practice is not closely adhered to, the old one still exists. Registration of a pattern or portion of an article to which a design is applied, must mean the registration of something which discloses beyond a doubt the pattern or design. It is otherwise, the alternative description would be inferior to the former one, and the legislature never intended that this should be the case. In Norton v. Nicholls (1 El. & El. 761; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 225) it was laid down by Lord Campbell that in order to register a design under the former act, the inventor must give satisfactory information of the nature of his claim.

[ERLE, C.J.—In that case the Court expressed an opinion that the registration of the design was insufficient, saying that the article of manufacture, and not the design, was registered. Is it not for the Court to say whether the pattern or piece of cloth sufficiently describes a design?]

It would be necessary for the Court to receive evidence as to the different or portion of an article of manufacture to which a design is applied, instead or in lieu of a copy, drawing, print, specification or description in writing, shall be as valid and effectual to all intents and purposes as if such copy, drawing, print, specification or description in writing had been furnished to the registrar under the "Copyright of Designs Acts."

parts of it, and this evidence might be conflicting. The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70. did not intend to reform the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100, but applied only to 6 & 7 Vict. c. 65, which extended the protection given by the former act to articles which were not of an ornamental character. Such articles, which have no complicated pattern, might perhaps be registered in the mode adopted by the plaintiff; but the same rule does not apply to a design made of many pieces and ornaments.

Mellis (Gray and Philbrick with him) was not called upon to argue.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. It seems to me that each and every part of the article deposited with the registrar must be taken to be part of the design which the plaintiff intended to register. It is the combination as described in the particulars, that is, the collocation of stars upon the ornamental chain surface as shewn in the pattern, which makes up the whole of the design, and a piece of cloth which did not shew the whole of the pattern would not be sufficient for a complete registration. I think that our decision will be productive of no disadvantage to the interests of the public at large. If a person took the star alone, no action would lie against him; nor, on the other hand, if he took the chain, though each of these ornaments might be new. There would be no infringement of the design, unless the particular combination were appropriated by the defendant. Whether the design or any part of it, is new or old is a question for the jury; but it is for the Court, looking at the words of the statute and at the particular pattern which is brought before them, to say whether the plaintiff has duly and properly registered his design. We are of opinion that what he has done is sufficient.

POLLOCK, C.B., MARTIN, B., PIGOTT, B., WILLES, J., KEATING, J. and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

THE QUEEN v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH OF THE BOROUGH OF GODMANCHESTER.

35 L. J. Q.B. 125; L. R. 1 Q.B. 328; 14 L. T. 104; 14 W. R. 375: affirming, 34 L. J. Q.B. 13; 13 W. R. 155; 5 B. & S. 886 (Q.B.).

Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), ss. 2, 43, 58.)—Meaning of Word "Sewer"—Rights of Local Board over Natural Streams or Brooks.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—SEWERS AND DRAINS.—A natural stream or water-course, of about a mile and a half in length, from 15 to 14 feet in breadth, and from 5 to 3 feet in depth, flowed through arable land into a river. It received at one point the drainage of two or three houses:—Held, that it was not a "sewer," within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1848.

A mandamus directed to a local board of health, stating that a sewer is in such a state as to be a nuisance, and commanding the local board to cleanse it, cannot be enforced, as it does not shew (according to the Public Health Act, 1848, s. 58.) that the person causing the nuisance, or the owner or occupier of the premises where it exists, have failed to comply with notice to remove it.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, directing the verdict on the issues raised by the first and second pleas to the return to a mandamus directed to the local board of health of the borough of Godmanchester, to be entered in favour of the defendants.

This mandamus recited that a drain, sewer or watercourse in the borough of Godmanchester, and known by the name of Stonehill Brook, which was vested in and under the management of the local board, whose duty it was, under the Public Health Act, 1848, to cause this drain, sewer or watercourse to be properly scoured, cleansed, emptied and kept, so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, had been for some time past in a foul, unclean and improper state, so as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, and that it had caused damage to landowners by overflowing. It then enjoined the local board to cause the drain, &c., to be properly cleansed and kept.

Return—That Stonehill Brook was not a sewer vested in the local board, according to the Public Health Act, 1848; that it was a sewer made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving or improving land, under a local act of 43 Geo. 3; and that the sewer ought to have been repaired and kept at the expense of the proprietors of lands which were divided and inclosed under the act.

Pleas—First, that the drain, sewer and watercourse in the writ mentioned was a sewer vested in and under the management and control of the local board, and that it was their duty, according to the Public Health Act, 1848, to clean and keep it so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health; secondly, that it was not a sewer made and used under the local act, and liable to be repaired and kept at the expense of the proprietors of lands adjoining.

Upon these pleas issue was joined.

The facts are stated in a special case, which will be found in the report of the decision of the Queen's Bench (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 13).

It will be sufficient for the purposes of this report to say that Stonehill Brook is a stream or watercourse within the parish of Godmanchester, a district within the meaning of the Public Health Act. The whole length of its course between the London road and the river Ouse is about a mile and a half. The water of the brook between the London road and West Street is solely supplied by the drainage, natural and artificial, of a considerable area of cultivated soil, but at one point the drains of two or three inhabited houses empty themselves into the brook; but with the exception of these drains, no drains, other than the drains underground and open of purely agricultural land, discharge themselves into the brook. The channel of the brook is the natural channel of a certain natural stream, except so far as its character has been altered by the acts of the Inclosure Commissioners, acting under a local Inclosure Act of 43 Geo. 3. These persons, between 1802 and 1809, cleared out the channel of the natural stream, and in various places along its course somewhat widened and deepened it, to render it more efficient as a means of draining a portion of the tract of land, subject to the provisions of the act. Afterwards, the owner of a neighbouring farm diverted the course of the stream into an artificial channel, which ran on for a length of seven chains, and re-entered the old channel. About the same time another landowner also diverted the course of the stream into an artificial channel, running to the length of about eighteen chains, and then re-entering the old channel. The width of the brook varies from about fourteen feet at its upper extremity to about fifteen feet at its lower, and its depth from about three feet to about five feet between the same limits. Stonehill Brook, before the Inclosure Act, was cleared out and repaired sometimes at the joint expense of all the owners of the land, subject to the provisions of that act, and sometimes by paupers of the parish of Godmanchester, under the direction of the overseer of the poor of the parish for the time being, and paid by him out of the general poor-rates of the parish. After the inclosure, the brook was for a short time cleared out and repaired, when necessary, by the paupers of the parish of Godmanchester, under the direction of the overseer of the poor of that parish for the time being, and paid by him out of the general poor-rates of the parish; but for the last thirty years or thereabouts it has been cleared out and repaired by the owners of the lands through which it passes, each doing that portion of it which traverses his own land.

It was admitted that Stonehill Brook was and is in a foul, unclean and improper state and condition, so as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, as alleged in the writ of mandamus, and that for want of being properly scoured, cleansed, emptied and kept, it had become and was at the time in the writ mentioned and still was liable to overflow and damage, and then had overflowed and damaged the land adjoining it and the public way.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the prosecutor or the defendants were entitled to the verdict on the first and second pleas to the return to the writ.

Keane (D. Brown and Markby with him), for the appellant.—In the first place, the judgment of the Court below cannot be supported if it be shewn that on the face of the record Stonehill Brook is a "sewer," within the meaning of the Public Health Act.¹ It is submitted that this stream is not within the exceptions of either section 2. or section 43. By section 2. the word "drain" is limited to the meaning house-drain. The word "sewer" is declared to mean and include sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word "drain," interpreted as above, applies. "District" is to comprise the entire area of places within the limits of any district to which the act shall be applied. It will be said that these definitions are explained by the preamble, which limits the operation of the act to towns and populous places. But section 88. prescribes the mode of rating the occupiers of arable land. The definition in Callis on Sewers, 4th edit., by Broderip, p. 99. is still applicable. Callis says that it is a freshwater trench, compassed on both sides, and a diminutive of river. With regard to the objection that this is a sewer for draining, &c., land under a local act, in Coulton v. Ambler (13 Mee. & W. 403; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 10), it was held that a stream like the present one was not a drain within the meaning of a local

(1) The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. (the Public Health Act) recites "that further and more effectual provision ought to be made for improving the sanitary condition of towns and populous places in England and Wales, and it is expedient that the supply of water to such towns and places, and the sewerage, drainage, cleansing and paving thereof should, as far as practicable, be placed under one and the same local management and control, subject to such general supervision as hereinafter provided."

By section 2. "the word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom, with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed. The word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies."

By section 43. "all sewers, whether existing at the time when the act is applied, or made at any time thereafter (except sewers made by any person or persons for his or their own profit, or for the profit of proprietors or shareholders, and except sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving or improving land under any local or private act of parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating land, and sewers under the authority of any Commissioners of Sewers appointed by the Crown), together with all buildings, works, materials, and things belonging or appertaining thereto, shall vest in, belong to and be entirely under the management and control of the local board of health."

By section 58. "the local board of health shall drain, cleanse, cover, or fill up, or cause to be drained, cleansed, covered or filled up all ponds, pools, open ditches, sewers, drains and places containing or used for the collection of any drainage, filth, water, matter or thing of an offensive nature or likely to be prejudicial to health, and they shall cause written notice to be given to the person causing any such nuisance, or to the owner or occupier of any premises whereon the same exists, requiring him within a time to be specified in such notice to drain, cleanse, cover or fill up any such pond, pool, ditch, sewer, drain or place, or to construct a proper sewer or drain for the discharge thereof, as the case may require; and if the person to whom such notice is given fail to comply therewith, the said local board shall execute the works mentioned or referred to therein, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be recoverable by them from him in a summary manner, or, by order of the said local board, shall be declared to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided."

act, giving powers over public and parish drains—see also Stracey v. Nelson (12 Ibid. 535; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 97. Secondly, the brook is not within any of the exceptions in section 43. It is not a sewer made by private persons for their profit; since it is for the equal advantage of all who dwell near it—The Queen v. Whitmarsh (15 Q.B. Rep. 600; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 469) and Bear v. Bromley (18 Ibid. 271; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 354); and the profit is derived by each person who uses it from his land, not from the sewer. Neither is it a sewer made and used for draining, preserving and improving land, under the Godmanchester local act, 41 Geo. 3. c. cix.—Logan v. Burton (5 B. & C. 513). It is made under an award which was not in accordance with the provisions of that act.

[WILLES, J.—I find that, in Com. Dig. tit. 'Sewers,' C. 1), the word "sewer" is extended to arms of the sea, creeks, havens and ports.]

But, lastly, the appellants are entitled to judgment under section 58, for it is admitted that the stream is offensive and injurious; and the local board are, therefore, bound to cleanse it. He also referred to Ostler v. Cooke (13 Q.B. Rep. 143; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 71), Lord Falmouth v. Richardson (3 B. & C. 837) and Paul v. James (1 Q.B. Rep. 832; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 246).

J. Brown (Metcalfe with him), for the respondents.—If Stonehill Brook is a "sewer," within the meaning of section 2, there is hardly a natural stream in England that will not come within the definition. The old definitions of the word "sewer" cannot be applied to this case. It appears from the passage which has been referred to in Com. Dig. that this word extended to arms of the sea, and had a larger meaning than that which was intended by the Public Health Act. The preamble of the act shews that it was intended for the benefit of towns and populous places, and the statutory meaning of "sewer" must therefore be taken to be "town sewer." As to the last point taken by the appellants, section 145. forbids the local board to interfere with private streams and watercourses without the consent in writing of the persons interested in them. But there is no allusion to persons so interested in the mandamus.

Keane, in reply.—"Sewer" is nomen generalissimum, and refers to every sort of sewer. Arable lands are made ratable by and are clearly within the contemplation of the act.

EARLE, C.J.—I think that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. I agree with the reasons which they have assigned for their judgment, and particularly in thinking that Stonehill Brook is not a sewer, within the meaning of the Public Health Act. That statute, when the preamble is considered, appears to have been intended to apply to towns and populous places; and I do not think that the section vesting sewers in the local board can extend to a natural stream of the extent and description of that which is the subject of this appeal. If it were necessary, the respondents might resort to other objections, as that this was a stream made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving or improving the land, within the exception in section 43. But I need not enter upon this part of the question. The third point upon which Mr. Keane has relied for some time weighed considerably with me. He argued that as this brook was acknowledged to be a nuisance, section 58. afforded a remedy by directing the local board to drain, cleanse, cover or fill all ponds, pools, open ditches, sewers, drains and places containing or used for the collection of any drainage, filth, water, matter or thing of an offensive nature or likely to be prejudicial to health. But we cannot give judgment for the appellants on that ground, because the section does not impose on the local board the duty of removing the nuisance except in this sense—that the board is bound to give written notice to the person causing the nuisance, or to the owner or occupier of the premises where it exists, requiring him to do what is necessary; and upon default it is empowered to execute what works are required, and charge the expenses on the defaulting person. Now, the commands of this mandamus are not framed in accordance with the provisions of this section; for the local board are themselves directed to remove the nuisance without shewing how they are liable to do so. In no respect, therefore, can the arguments of Mr. Keene be supported.

Promissory Note—Alternative Payee—Uncertainty.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.—The defendant gave to the trustees of a chapel a document as follows: "On demand, I promise to pay to the trustees of, &c., or their treasurer for the time being, the sum of," &c.:—Held, in an action by the trustees, that there was no uncertainty as to the persons to whom the money was to be paid, so as to make the document had as a promissory note.

Declaration, that the defendant by his promissory note promised to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 100*l.* by certain instalments, and that he had not paid the same.

Plea, denying the making of the note. Issue joined.

At the trial, which took place at the last Spring Assizes for Yorkshire, before Shee, J., it appeared that the action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were the trustees of the Wesleyan Chapel at Harrogate, to recover the amount of a promissory note made by the defendant; one of the plaintiffs was the treasurer as well as a trustee. The note in question was as follows:

"Harrogate, March 18, 1861.

"£100.

"On demand, I promise to pay to the trustees of the Wesleyan Chapel, Harrogate, or their treasurer for the time being, the sum of 100*l.*, in four equal instalments of 25*l.* each, each of such instalments to be due and payable on the 1st day of October annually, for value received. As witness my hand,

"Williams Jakes."

The verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 100*l.*, and the learned Judge gave leave to the defendant to move to set that verdict aside, and enter a verdict for the defendant instead thereof.

Manisty now moved accordingly.—The document declared on is not a promissory note at all. It is in the alternative, the promise being to pay the trustees or their treasurer for the time being. In order that such a document should be good as a promissory note, it is necessary that the payee should be a person or body certain, and not fluctuating. The same kind of question was before the Court in Blanckenhagen v. Blundell (2 B. & Ald. 417). There the declaration alleged that the defendant made a promissory note, by which he promised to pay to J. P. Damer or to the plaintiffs 250*l.*, and the Court held that it was not a promissory note, Chief Justice Abbott saying, "I have no doubt that this instrument, in the form in which it is declared on, is not a promissory note within the statute of Anne; for if a note is made payable to one or other of two persons, it is payable to either of them only on the contingency of its not having been paid to the other, and is not a good promissory note within the statute."

[LUSH, J.—Was there not a case something like the present recently determined in this court, where the note was held bad because the payee was uncertain?]

Yes, Cowie v. Stirling (6 El. & B. 333; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 335).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But the question here is, whether the mention of the treasurer for the time being is anything more than a matter of convenience. Would such a note be bad where the two parties named in the alternative are substantially the same persons? The trustees and the treasurer were intended to be connected.]

Still there are the two payees; and if payment had been made to the treasurer, how could that be pleaded in an action by the trustees?

[COCKBURN, C.J.—No doubt, in one sense, the promise is in the alternative; but it is not so in another sense, for the treasurer is the agent of the trustees.]

In Yates v. Nash (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 581; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 306) it was held, that to constitute a valid bill of exchange the payee must be a person who is capable of being ascertained at the time the instrument is drawn.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I do not quarrel with the law laid down in that case, but here it is only a lengthened way of stating, "I promise to pay to the trustees." LUSH, J.—If the instrument is construed to mean, "I will pay the trustees by the hand of their treasurer," is there any reason why it should not be a good note?]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that there must be no rule. I fully concur in the proposition stated by Mr. Manisty, that the payee of a promissory note must be a person certain; but it appears to me that all that this promissory note shews is, that the amount was payable to the trustees in the first instance, but that the payment might be made through the medium of their treasurer, as the agent of the trustees. His authority, derived from them, was not to bring an action upon the note, but to receive the money. Suppose the promise had been to pay to the trustees, or to their bankers, or to their agents in that behalf, would not that be a valid promissory note? We should introduce an unnecessary degree of strictness if we held that this was not a good note, as there is no uncertainty as to who the payees were.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this instrument means, "I promise to pay to the trustees or to their servant, and I give you notice that I will pay to the treasurer for the time being." I notice that in Blanckenhagen v. Blundell (2 B. & Ald. 417), Mr. Justice Bayley said, in his judgment, "If there had been any community of interest stated between the payees, so as in any respect to identify Damer and Blackenhagen, it is possible that an action might have been maintained upon this note." Now, here, there being a community of interest, there is no uncertainty, and therefore the note appears to me to be good, though I agree with the law as stated by Mr. Manisty.

SHEE, J.—I also think that this note means, "I will pay to the trustees or their treasurer for the time being, who is authorized to receive the payment."

LUSH, J.—In the two cases of Blanckenhagen v. Blundell (2 B. & Ald. 417) and Cowie v. Stirling (6 El. & B. 333; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 335) there were no persons named as those certainly to whom the payment was to be made; but in the present case there are persons particularly specified, and I think that the note ought to be construed to mean, "I promise to pay to the trustees or their agent, the treasurer, for the time being."

Rule refused.

Ex parte SAMUEL FORREST.

35 L. J. Q.B. 131; 14 L. T. 285; 14 W. R. 607; 12 Jur. N.S. 499.

Attorney and Solicitor—Articled Clerk—Form of Articles—Indenture of Apprenticeship—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. ss. 8, 9.

SOLICITOR.—In the year 1847 F, being then in his sixteenth year, was, with the consent of his father, bound by indenture to serve H, an attorney, for a period of more than five years. The indenture was in the form of an indenture of apprenticeship, but contained the usual covenants inserted in articles of clerkship; and it was stamped with a 1l. stamp. After F. had served under it for two years, he discovered that it was not in the proper form, and he applied to H. to cancel it, and enter into proper articles. Although H. was willing that this should be done, it was not carried out, in consequence of the inability of the father of F, and also of F. himself, to find the money for the stamp and penalty. F. served H. as a clerk until 1858, when H. died, and he afterwards continued to serve the successor of H. until 1864. He was competent to carry on the business of an attorney and solicitor:—Held, that the indenture might be treated as articles of clerkship, and upon its production, properly stamped, it might be enrolled, and the service allowed to count from the time at which F. entered upon the service with H.

This was an application to obtain the opinion of this Court that an indenture of apprenticeship, under which Mr. Samuel Forrest had served as an articled clerk, might be treated as articles of clerkship, and that, upon its production, properly stamped, it might be enrolled nunc pro tunc, and that the service might be reckoned from the date of the indenture.

It appeared that in the year 1847, when Mr. Forrest was only in his sixteenth year, he was, with the consent of his father, bound to serve Mr. Hamp, an attorney, at Liverpool, for a period of more than five years. The document, instead of being in the usual form, was in the form of an ordinary indenture of apprenticeship, and was stamped with a 1l. stamp. There was a covenant by Mr. Hamp to instruct him in the usual form, and Mr. Forrest served under it for the whole period and up to the death of Mr. Hamp in 1858, after which time he continued to serve his successor till the year 1864. His affidavit shewed that he served for two years before he discovered that the indenture was not in the proper form, that he then applied to Mr. Hamp to cancel it, which he was willing to do, and to execute proper articles. This, however, was not done, in consequence of want of means in his father; and, subsequently, in consequence of his marriage, he himself was unable to bear the expense. He was now able to pay for the stamp and the penalty, and was fully competent to carry on the business of an attorney and solicitor. His father had advised him to continue to serve under the indenture. Upon application to the Commissioners of Stamps, with a view of making an application to this Court, he was informed that, in consequence of the lapse of time, the indenture could not be stamped without an order from the Treasury, and the Treasury refused to make such an order unless this Court should express an opinion that the indenture could properly be construed as articles of clerkship.

Joseph Brown now moved accordingly.—It must be admitted that the document under which Mr. Forrest has served is in a form most unusual; but it is also clear that it contains all the material parts which are contained in the regular forms of articles of clerkship, and which are required under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. ss. 8. and 9. He was bound by "contract in writing to serve," and he has served more than five years under the contract. These sections referred to do not shew that any particular form is necessary.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—We think that we may treat this as an exception to the general rule, and we state our opinion that there is no objection to the Treasury making the order required by the Commissioners of Stamps; but, of course, we must be satisfied that it is a proper case for the interference of the Court before the rest of the application can be granted.]

It is submitted that the case falls within the rule which has been laid down by the Courts upon this subject. The affidavits shew that the reason why articles were not regularly and properly entered into, after the discovery was made that the indenture was not in the usual form, was, that neither the father nor the son were in circumstances which would enable them to bear the expense. There has been no speculation as to avoiding the payment of the duty, in case the prospect of success in the profession should appear to be indifferent, neither has there been any intention to defraud the revenue. The rule is laid down by Chief Justice Erle, in Ex parte Bishop (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 150; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 48), "If the non-payment of the duty was the result of some unforeseen contingency, something over which the party had no control, I should be disposed to assist him; but if the omission was intentional, and part of a scheme to make use of the service under the articles, in the event of its proving a promising speculation, I should decline to grant the application." And this ruling was approved of by the Lord Chief Justice in this Court in Ex parte Wilson (4 Best & S. 889, 895; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 89). Ex parte Edwards (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 213) is to the same effect—see, also, In re Breden (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 351; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 321); and the law is settled by all the three Courts, as appears from Ex parte Wilson (4 Best & S. 889, 895; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 89). Mr. Forrest has suffered from the negligence of his father and of Mr. Hamp, not from any misconduct of his own.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this case falls within the decisions which Mr. Browne has referred to. The discovery of the mistake was not made till late after the service began under the indenture, and the parties were not then able to pay the penalty and the duty. As far as I can see, there has been no intentional default on the part of the applicant, and I think that we may direct that, upon the indenture being brought in, properly stamped, it may be enrolled, and the service allowed to count from the date in the year 1847.

BLACKBURN, J. and SHEE, J. concurred.

Counsel, Duty of—Trial—Withdrawal of Juror—Settlement of Cause.

BARRISTER. COMPROMISE.—In the course of the trial of an action for libel the plaintiff's counsel proposed to the counsel for the defendant that a juror should be withdrawn. The proposal was accepted, and the cause thus settled. The plaintiff had not been consulted by his counsel, and had given no authority for such a step being taken, but wished the case to go to the jury. The counsel had also been requested by the clerk to the plaintiff's attorney, who had the management of the cause, to let the case go to the jury, as the plaintiff would not consent to the withdrawal of a juror:—Held, that this was a step in the cause which the counsel had authority to take, and a rule to set aside proceedings and for a new trial was refused.

The declaration charged the defendant with having published a libel concerning a book written by the plaintiff, and called "The Old Ledger."

The defendant pleaded not guilty.

At the trial, which took place at the last Surrey Assizes, before Erle, C.J., it appeared that the defendant was the publisher of the Athenæum, in which had appeared a review of the book, and which was alleged to be an unfair and malicious libel.

The plaintiff proved his case by putting in the alleged libel, and by calling a witness to prove that it applied to the book written by the plaintiff. The defendant's counsel then proceeded to address the jury, and in the course of his address he read certain extracts from the book. It was sworn by the plaintiff, that in the midst of the address of the defendant's counsel, he was beckoned out of court by his attorney's clerk, who informed him that his counsel intended to throw up the case, and to propose that a juror should be withdrawn; that he at once energetically protested against this intended proceeding of his counsel, and insisted that the book should be put in evidence; that he told his attorney's clerk that no consideration should induce him to withdraw the case from the cognizance of the jury, or to consent to such withdrawal. When he returned into court he was just in time to hear the reply of the defendant's counsel to the proposition to withdraw a juror, and the concluding observations of the Judge. If he had been in time he would have protested against the proposed abandonment, and would have asked his counsel for the brief and that he would allow him to conduct his own case. That he was not consulted by the counsel, who acted throughout upon his own personal responsibility. That he never authorized him to withdraw a juror, but intended him to let the case go to the jury.

It was also sworn by the clerk to the plaintiff's attorney that he did not in any way sanction the withdrawal of a juror, but that he requested his counsel to let the case go to the jury, as the plaintiff would not consent to the withdrawal of a juror.

The counsel for the plaintiff and defendant respectively agreed that the cause should be settled by the withdrawal of a juror, and this was done.

Kenealey now moved for a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the proceedings should not be set aside and a new trial had. No counsel can take the step of withdrawing a juror without authority given him by his client to take such a step. Here it was done against the consent of the plaintiff. There can be only one dominus litis of a cause, and the counsel cannot be such dominus litis. The plaintiff's counsel has consented to a compromise, which has the effect of putting an end to the plaintiff's right of action altogether if such compromise can be sustained. A counsel has less authority than an attorney, but an attorney would be liable to an action if he settled a cause without the authority of his client; and if so, a counsel cannot have such power unless it be expressly given to him by his client. When a brief is accepted by counsel he contracts to employ his eloquence and his skill for the benefit of the client, but he has no right to take upon himself to act upon his own judgment, and settle a cause against the will of his client. The judgment of Mr. Justice Crowder in Swinfen v. Swinfen (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 364; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 97) shews what the law is, and that learned Judge there held that the agreement which had been come to by the counsel was not binding upon the plaintiff.

[MELLOR, J.—In that case the arrangement was as to the partition of an estate, and differs much from dealing with a cause by withdrawing a juror.]

It is submitted that there is no real difference; the arrangement here amounts to a dealing with the reputation and character of the plaintiff. The view taken by the Master of the Rolls, and also by the Lords Justices, is substantially the same—Swinfen v. Swinfen (24 Beav. 549; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 490). If the counsel conceived that he had any authority in the first instance to settle the cause he received notice that such authority had been withdrawn. His authority was to go to the jury and nothing else. In delivering judgment in Swinfen v. Swinfen, Mr. Justice Crowder says (26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 104), "If, therefore, in any such cases a counsel, under a misapprehension of his client's instructions, and believing himself to have authority, acts in fact without it, he cannot, in my opinion, bind his client. Where a litigant party in a cause entrusts his brief to a counsel, his object is to have the benefit of his advocacy, and not to employ an agent to negotiate terms of compromise."

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that we should not be acting rightly if we granted a rule in this case. At the trial, the counsel for the plaintiff thought that he was doing the best thing for his client in proposing that a juror should be withdrawn. He did propose it; the counsel on the other side consented to that course being taken, and it was done. The plaintiff says that he did not consent to this being done; but there is nothing upon the affidavits to shew that the authority which was originally conferred upon the counsel was withdrawn, and nothing to shew that the counsel had received his brief with the understanding that he was to be a mere tool in the hands of his client, and a mere mouthpiece for the purpose of making a speech and examining the witnesses. To take a brief under such circumstances would be most unprofessional, and it cannot be supposed that anything of the kind had taken place. Mr. Kenealey says, that the counsel only contracts to use his skill and his eloquence on behalf of his client; but I think that he also contracts to supply his judgment and discretion in the conduct of the cause, and the attorney is supposed to select such persons as his counsel as he thinks will be likely to conduct the cause properly. The case of Swinfen v. Swinfen, which has been referred to, was peculiar; an issue had been directed to try the validity of a will, and for the purpose of informing the conscience of the Court of Chancery, and at the trial it was thought, by counsel of great eminence, that it was for the interest of both parties that a settlement upon certain terms should take place. When the case came before the Court of Common Pleas, according to the report of it in the 25 Law Journal Reports, page 303, all the members of the Court, consisting of Cresswell, J., Williams, J. and Willes, J., considered that the counsel had full authority to make such an arrangement and to bind the clients; but afterwards another motion for an attachment was made against Mrs. Swinfen, and Mr. Justice Cresswell and Mr. Justice Williams still retained their former opinion, but Mr. Justice Crowder, who was then a member of the Court, dissented, and in accordance with the usual rule, there being no appeal, and it being a motion for an attachment, the rule was discharged; but I find that even Mr. Justice Crowder puts it upon the ground of its being a collateral matter. He says, that counsel "professes in conducting a cause to act entirely on his own judgment and discretion, uncontrolled by his client, and the client leaves the whole management of the cause to counsel. But where a compromise is contemplated and litigation is to cease upon terms to be arranged, counsel then can only act, as I believe, under special instructions." When the matter came before the Courts of equity, they seem to have gone partly on the ground of its being a proceeding to inform the conscience of the Court, and partly on the ground that it was not a case in which specific performance of the agreement ought to be decreed. Then, in Swinfen v. Chelmsford (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 382), the Lord Chief Baron takes the same distinction as that which had been taken by Mr. Justice Crowder. He says, "We are of opinion that although counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it, such as withdrawing the record, withdrawing a juror, or calling a witness, or selecting such as in his discretion he thinks ought to be called, and other matters which properly belong to the suit, and the management and conduct of the trial, he has not, by virtue of his retainer in the suit, any power over matters that are collateral to it." Then comes the case of Prestwick v. Poley (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 189), which has been referred to by my Brother Shee. It was an action for a piano, and the plaintiff's attorney agreed to settle the action by the return of the piano and the payment of the costs by instalments. The Lord Chief Justice said, "The plaintiffs repudiate this agreement, and say it was made without authority. The defendant says that the defendant had authority. The question is here between third parties, but I do not limit my judgment to that. It is clear that there was no express prohibition in this case, and the question is, whether his employment gave the plaintiffs' attorney a general authority to compromise as he did. It is admitted that he has a general authority over the common procedure of the suit. It is admitted that he might agree to take a lesser amount after verdict; and in my mind there is no distinction in the present case." This is followed by the other Judges. It seems to me that Swinfen v. Swinfen is an extremely analogous case to the present. If a step is taken in the cause and notice is given to the other side that the authority originally conferred on the counsel has been revoked, it would be another thing; but by well-known usage counsel has an apparent authority in the conduct of the cause so far as regards the other side, whether or not it be restricted as between counsel and client. In the ordinary management of the cause, we may rely upon the discretion and judgment of the counsel, and that he has authority to take such a step.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the time of the juror being withdrawn, the matter was apparently within the authority of both counsel, and unless it could be shewn that the attempt to revoke the authority of the counsel for the plaintiff had been brought to the notice of the counsel on the other side, I think that we ought not to interfere. I am quite sure that the counsel for the plaintiff would not have taken the brief upon the terms of hiring out his skill and eloquence, and upon the express understanding that he was not to be at liberty to exercise his judgment and discretion. The only course, if a client was to insist upon such a thing, would be to say at once, if you are not prepared to take my advice, and if you object to my having the conduct of the cause, I give you back your brief. Now, I think, that what was done in the present case was really a step in the conduct of the cause, and a thing to be done in the ordinary exercise of the judgment of the counsel. I have no doubt, after the decision in Lord Chelmsford's case (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 382), that the rule is as there laid down, and that withdrawing a juror is really a matter in the conduct of the cause, and that really the meaning of the judgment of Mr. Justice Crowder is, that the arrangement was somewhat collateral to the cause. The position of the other side is also to be considered. The defendant, on the faith of the agreement, gave up his chance of the verdict, which he might perhaps otherwise have obtained. It would be most unfair and improper to disturb such an arrangement.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the question before us, we are bound by authority to hold that the counsel had power to bind his client. It would be very inconvenient if it were not so, and much against the interests of the client. A counsel would never be able to consent to a juror being withdrawn unless his client was present at the time and gave his consent; or at all events it would be done at great risk where the client was an unreasonable man. It would be most inconvenient to hold that a juror could never be withdrawn unless the client gave his consent that it should be done. In Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 382) the question was whether the defendant was liable for having entered into the compromise without authority, and all that was decided was that no action would lie against him as no legal damage was proved. Prestwick v. Poley (34 Law J. Rep.

(N.S.) C.P. 189) is also strong against the view now presented to the Court. There might be cases where it would not be right to make such an arrangement, and if counsel differed from his client, he could throw up his brief.

Rule refused.

Burial Acts (20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 23; 22 Vict. c. 1. s. 1.)—Powers of Churchwardens over Land formerly used for the Burial of the Dead—Meaning of Statutory Description "Vaults or Places of Burial."

BURIAL AND CREMATION.—By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 23. authority is given to the Crown by Order in Council, upon the representation of one of the Secretaries of State, to cause acts to be done, by or under the directions of churchwardens or other persons having the care of "any vaults or places of burial" for preventing them from becoming or continuing dangerous or injurious to the public health. A piece of land which, though unconsecrated, had been used by its lessees for upwards of 150 years as a burial ground, came into the possession of the freeholder, who brought building materials upon the soil and let it to persons who covered it with bricks and rubbish. At the time the act passed no burials had taken place in the land since the freeholder came into possession, a period of several years:—Held, that an Order in Council directing churchwardens to cause the bricks, rubbish, &c., to be removed was invalid, and could not justify an entry upon the land, as the section must be taken to apply only to places which, at the time of the passing of the act, were held in trust or distinctly appropriated for the burial of the dead.

Trespass for breaking and entering land in the City of London, belonging to the plaintiff, abutting, on the east side, on ground belonging to Bridewell Hospital, breaking open gates and doors belonging to the walls and fences of the land, destroying the locks and fastenings of the gates and doors, pulling down and destroying a building on the land, &c. Second count, for the wrongful conversion of bricks, mortar and building materials belonging to the plaintiff.

Pleas—to the first count, not guilty (by statutes 7 Jac. 1. c. 5; 21 Jac. 1. c. 12. s. 3); to the second count, payment into court.

Issue was joined on the first plea and on the sufficiency of the amount paid into court, and the cause came on for trial at the London Sittings, after Trinity Term, 1860, before Cockburn, C.J., when, by consent, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on a case to the following effect.

The plaintiff was a builder, and the acts complained of were done by the defendants as churchwardens of the parish of St. Bride. The land is situate within that parish and not within Bridewell precinct. Edward the Sixth, by charter, gave the palace of Bridewell with its precinct to the City of London as a house for the committal and correction of vagabonds, strumpets and other idle persons.

From 1679 to Lady-day, 1844, the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London, Governors of Bridewell Hospital, held the land under leases, granted to them from time to time by the freeholder for the time being, namely,

Earl De la Warr and his ancestors and predecessors, for the successive terms of 41 years, 41 years, 41 years, 21 years and 21 years, at the annual rent of 35*l*. The first of these leases was granted in 1679, and the last of them in 1823. In the first the land was described as "all that piece or parcel of ground then lying waste on the west side of the said hospital of Bridewell," and in each of the subsequent leases as "all that piece or parcel of ground now in the occupation of the governors of the said hospital, and used as a burial place." In the last two leases a plan of the land was drawn in the margin, and referred to in the second lease, with the words "the burial ground" written on the plan. In all the leases, except the first, was a reservation to the lessor of the use of a large sewer running through the land. The second and succeeding leases contained a covenant not to build on the premises demised. In the last of these leases, which expired on Lady-day, 1844, was a covenant not to assign. From 1844 to 1855 the governors continued to hold the land under the freeholder as tenants from year to year. On Lady-day, 1855, the tenancy was terminated by notice to quit, and the key of the burial ground delivered up to Lord De la Warr.

The case here gave a description (omitted as immaterial) of a piece of land coloured yellow, in a ground-plan annexed to the case. The portion of land coloured green, on which the argument mainly turned, and which will be afterwards called "the land," contained about 748 square yards.

The Governors of Bridewell have always provided a chapel, as part of the buildings of the hospital, and a chaplain, an ordained clergyman of the Church of England, who resided within the precinct; and during the whole time that the land was under lease to the Governors of Bridewell Hospital, down to Lady-day, 1844, it was used in the first instance as a burial ground for the inmates of the hospital who died there, and afterwards, occasionally, for other persons, some inhabitants, and others not inhabitants, of the district, as well as for the inmates of the hospital, and burials in the ground have so far back as living memory goes been conducted according to the forms, ceremonies, and discipline of the Church of England, and it did not appear that they were at any time conducted in any other manner; but there was no record among the archives of the diocese of London that the land had ever been consecrated. No burial has taken place in any part of the land since 1844. There was an old burial ground belonging to the hospital situate within the precinct which was formerly used as a place of sepulture, but buildings were erected upon it more than fifty years ago which entirely covered it. About ten years ago it was let by the Governors of Bridewell Hospital to Messrs. Spicer & Co., wholesale stationers, who have pulled down the former buildings and built warehouses in their place.

From Lady-day, 1855, until the entry of the defendants, the land was used for no other purpose than that of the deposit thereon of building materials, and the old materials of adjoining houses which had been pulled down by Mr. Soward as hereafter mentioned.

On the 1st of December, 1857, the land, together with several houses, premises, &c., was leased by Lord De la Warr, the freeholder, to Mr. Soward for a term of ninety-nine years, from the previous Michaelmas. On the 9th of June, 1859, Mr. Soward leased the land and other premises to the plaintiff for fifty years from the previous Midsummer; and at the time of the alleged trespasses the plaintiff was in possession under the lease.

Before granting this lease, Mr. Soward pulled down some of the houses adjoining the land, and put the materials, consisting of old bricks, timber, &c. upon it. He also made an opening in the western wall of the land, and put and fixed gates therein, which were the only entrance to the land. The plaintiff, upon the execution of the lease to him, at once took possession, and after removing the iron railings and a portion of a dwarf wall upon the soil, commenced building a boundary wall. The old materials placed by his lessor on the land he left where they were, and also brought further quantities of timber, bricks, &c., for the purpose of making a hard surface over the land, and using the timber, bricks, &c., in the erection of a workshop or shed adjoining it.

On the 18th of February, 1854, an Order in Council was made, upon the representation of one of the Secretaries of State. This order recited that the secretary, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85,¹ had represented, that for the protection

(1) The following extracts from the Burial Acts were referred to during the argument. By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, "The Metropolitan Interments Act, 1850," is repealed. By section 2, "In case it shall appear to Her Majesty in Council, upon the representation of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, that for the protection of the public health burials in any part or parts of the metropolis, or in any burial grounds or places of burial in the metropolis should be wholly discontinued, or should be discontinued subject to any exception or qualification, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by and with the advice of her Privy Council, to order that after a time mentioned in the order burials in such part or parts of the metropolis, or in such burial grounds or places of burial, shall be discontinued wholly or subject to any exceptions or qualifications mentioned in such order, and so from time to time as circumstances may require; provided that notice of such representation and of the time when it shall please Her Majesty to order the same to be taken into consideration by the Privy Council shall be published in the London Gazette and shall be affixed on the doors of the churches or chapels of the parishes in which any burial grounds or places of burial affected by such representation, shall be situate or on some other conspicuous places within the part or parts of the metropolis affected by such representation, one calendar month, or where any order made under 'The Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention Act, 1848,' directing the provisions of that act for the prevention of epidemic, endemic and contagious diseases to be put in force, is in force within such part or parts, then seven days at the least before such representation is so considered: Provided always, that no such representation shall be made in relation to the burial ground of any parish until ten days' previous notice of the intention to make such representation shall have been given to the incumbent and vestry clerk of such parish. By section 3, no such Order in Council is to extend to the burial grounds of Quakers or Jews unless they are expressly included."

By section 4, "It shall not be lawful after the time mentioned in any such order in Council for the discontinuance of burials, to bury the dead in any church, chapel, churchyard, or burial place, or elsewhere within the part or parts of the metropolis, or in the burial grounds or places of burial (as the case may be) in which burials have by any such order been ordered to be discontinued except as in this act or in such order excepted; and every person who shall after such time as aforesaid bury any body, or in anywise act or assist in the burial of any body contrary to this enactment, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

By section 9, "no new burial ground or cemetery (parochial or non-parochial) shall be provided and used in the metropolis, or within two miles of any part thereof, without the previous approval of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State."

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128. s. 1, "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, from time to time to postpone the time appointed by any Order in Council for the discontinuance of burials, or otherwise to vary any Order in Council made under any of the said recited acts, or this act (whether the time thereby appointed for the discontinuance of burials thereunder, or other operation of such order shall or shall not have arrived) as to Her Majesty, with such advice as aforesaid, may seem fit; and every order of Her Majesty in Council made before the passing of this act for varying any order previously made under the said acts, or any of them, shall be deemed valid and effectual in law."

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 8, "It shall and may be lawful for the vestry of any parish in which any burial ground closed by Order in Council may be situate, and which does not belong to such parish, by resolution of a vestry, at a meeting called for that purpose, to purchase such burial ground, and from the time of such purchase such burial ground shall belong to such parish, and be subject to all the conditions affecting the burial grounds of the parish in which the same is situate."

By section 23, "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, upon the representation of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, from time to time to order such acts to be done by or under the directions of the churchwardens or such other persons as may have the care of any vaults or places of burial, for preventing them from becoming or continuing dangerous or injurious to the public health, and every such Order in Council shall be published in the London Gazette, and such churchwardens or other persons shall do or cause to be done all acts ordered as aforesaid, and the expenses incurred in and about the doing thereof shall be paid out of the poor-rates of the parish: provided always, that no such representation shall be made until ten days' previous notice of the intention to make such representation shall have been given to the churchwardens or other persons, or one of the churchwardens or other persons having the care of the vaults or places of burial to which the representation relates."

By 22 Vict. c. 1. s. 1, "Where it appears to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, on the representation of any person authorized by him to inspect any vaults or places of burial in relation to which an Order in Council has been or shall have been issued under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 23, that any acts which by such Order in Council are ordered to be done by or under the direction of persons other than churchwardens having the care of such vaults or places of burial, are not done or performed within a reasonable time, and according to the of the public health burial should be discontinued in the under-mentioned places, and that such representation was to be taken into consideration by the Privy Council on the 10th of March, then next. Among the places mentioned in the order was St. Bride's, Fleet Street. Burials in the churchyard, in the vaults under the church, and in the pauper burial ground of St. Bride's, and in the precinct of Bridewell, to be wholly discontinued. On the 29th of March, 1854, a final order was made, adopting the representation, and directing burials to be discontinued. Accordingly, on the 23rd of July, 1859, the Home Secretary caused notice to be delivered to the person or persons having the care of the burial ground of the precinct of Bridewell, Blackfriars, of his intention to represent to the Queen in Council, that for the purpose of preventing the burial ground of the precinct of Bridewell, Blackfriars, from becoming or continuing dangerous or injurious to the public health, an order should be issued for the adoption of the following measures :

First. That the whole of the rubbish, building materials, &c., which have been deposited on the burial ground of the precinct of Bridewell, Blackfriars, be completely removed under suitable supervision, care being taken not to disturb or damage the head and foot stones or tombs.

Secondly. That the whole surface of the ground be levelled, with the exception of tombs and gravestones, and be covered with a layer of fresh earth, of the thickness of at least a foot.

Thirdly. That the surface be sown with grass seed and that the vegetation be maintained in a proper state, and the surface be never disturbed.

The case stated facts respecting the service of the notice, into which it is unnecessary to enter. On the 12th of August, 1859, an Order in Council was made adopting this representation, and directing it to be carried into effect. On the 15th of September, 1859, the Home Secretary, upon receipt of an official report stating that the Bridewell burial ground remained in the same state as before, gave a written authority to the defendants, the churchwardens of St. Bride, directing them to do and complete the acts mentioned in the Order in Council relating to the burial ground; and Lord De la Warr, Mr. Soward and the plaintiff having failed to comply with a notice addressed to them by the defendants on the 5th of October, 1859, and stating that unless the directions in the Order in Council were carried into effect within fourteen days, the defendants would proceed to execute them; the defendants on the 24th of October, 1859, entered the land and committed the trespasses complained of. These trespasses were in substance an execution of the directions of the Order in Council. The defendants also took the padlocks from the gates, fastened them, and the plaintiff was excluded from the land, the building materials removed, the surface levelled, &c. The Court was to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact from the facts above stated, which a jury might draw. The pleadings to be taken as part of the case.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon the first count in respect of any part, and if any which part of the alleged acts of trespass. If the Court should be of opinion that he was so entitled, then judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff on that count, with such damages as should be determined by the arbitrator already appointed in pursuance of the Order of Nisi Prius, with costs of suit, the arbitrator to decide whether any and what further sum should be paid to the plaintiff under the second count beyond the sum paid into court, and verdict and judgment then to be entered accordingly. If the Court should be of intent of such Order in Council, it shall be lawful for such Secretary of State by writing under his hand to authorize and direct the churchwardens of the parish in which such vaults or places of burial may be situate forthwith to do and complete the acts in such Order in Council mentioned, or such of them as remain undone, and such order of the Secretary of State shall be obeyed by such churchwardens, and they and all persons acting under their direction shall have the same power of entering and doing all such acts upon the premises to which the Order in Council relates, as if the said acts had, by the Order in Council, been directed to be done by such churchwardens, and such vaults or place of burial had been under their care," &c.

opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover under the first count, then judgment of non pros. should be entered to that count, and the question as to the sufficiency of the sum paid into court to be decided by the same arbitrator, and judgment entered accordingly.

Mellish (Bullar with him), for the plaintiff.—Whether the Order in Council was valid or not the defendants have exceeded their jurisdiction by removing the padlocks, as the order could only justify matters necessary for the preservation of decency.

[BLACKBURN, J.—If that were the case you could only recover a farthing damages.]

It is submitted, however, that the Order in Council was clearly invalid, as the land in question is not a "vault or place of burial" within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 23; so that directions under the 22 Vict. c. 1. s. 1. could not be supported. There is no evidence to shew that the ground was ever consecrated, and the inference is strongly against such a supposition, as the land was only leasehold property.

[LUSH, J.—Do you admit a power to forbid further burials in this land?]

Yes; that is given by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. But powers which can only be exercised for the preservation of health do not apply to this case, where there is no finding that the land trespassed upon was injurious to health. There was no intention to divest any man of his property, and in the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 8. power is given to purchase burial grounds. If the words of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 23. be examined, it will be seen that they order acts to be done under the directions of churchwardens and such other persons as have the care of any vaults or places of burial, shewing that the act is limited to cases where such persons have the custody of a place "as a burial ground." It can hardly be contended that these words apply to every case where land has once been used as a place of burial.

[LUSH, J.—One might at least have expected that the words "owners or those in whom the property is vested," would have been added to the words "churchwardens, &c."]

It is contended that the section applies only to cases where land is in the custody of churchwardens or other persons, with a trust or duty to take care of it as burial officials.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Burials may have ceased and there may be no evidence of an intention to continue them, but the legislature might have thought it important to create a preventive, instead of the usual common law jurisdiction over a place of burial.]

The words of the section do not support such a view.

Bovill (Rochfort Clarke with him), for the defendants.—The order was quite valid. The preamble of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. shews that the legislature intended to provide for the public health. That object is worked out by the succeeding sections, which intended to prevent the disturbance of a burial ground in the future. The words are wide, and in section 3. there is an express exemption in favour of the burial grounds of Quakers.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Although the acts are incorporated, we cannot help seeing that the material one here came after the rest.]

The act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, must be taken to have been framed, because of the insufficiency of the previous enactments to prevent certain burial grounds from becoming dangerous. However large the compulsory powers may appear to be, they are justified by a consideration for the public health. It cannot be presumed that the Secretary of State would exercise a wrong discretion.

Mellish, in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The case has been argued at considerable length, and I do not think we should gain much benefit by taking time to consider, as the whole matter depends upon the construction of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81. s. 23. By what section it is made lawful for Her Majesty, upon the representation of one of the Secretaries and with the advice of the Privy Council, from time to time to order such acts to be done by or under the directions of the churchwardens or such other persons as may have the care of any vaults or places of burial, for preventing them from becoming or continuing dangerous or injurious to the public health. We must take no notice of the word "such," as there is nothing in the section which is correlative to it. But the object of these Orders in Council is clearly to direct churchwardens and other persons to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent vaults and burial grounds from becoming injurious to public health. Now, the argument for the defendant goes this length (as was almost admitted by their counsel), that if at any time land has been used for the purposes of burial, it must continue to be "a place of burial" within the meaning of the act. So that in the case of the Pest Fields, in the parish of Marylebone, where those who died of the plague were buried, we should have to admit that the Secretary of State could remove the squares and streets which have been built on the ground. It seems to me that we cannot give so extensive a meaning to the words of the section as to make them comprise every place which has once been a burial ground; but that the directions are to be given to persons who at the time when the act became law had the care of any land as a place of burial. I do not mean that it is necessary that burials should then have been going on in these places, but that it must appear that they are still dedicated and appropriated for the holding of dead bodies, and that persons have the custody of them as places of burial, as in the case of a burial ground of Dissenters or grounds in the hands of trustees for the purposes of burial, or appropriated for those purposes by some private individual. It is not necessary to say that these places must have been burial grounds at the time of the Order in Council, but they must not have ceased to be so used at the time of the act, that is, in 1857. Now, it seems to me that the land in question had ceased to be a place of burial in 1857. The Governors of Bridewell, as lessees of the ground, used it as a burial place, and I think that the lessors must be taken to have assented to this user. But after 1844 we find nothing to shew an intention that burials shall continue. The lease was succeeded by a tenancy from year to year, which lasted till 1855, when the land was surrendered to Lord De la Warr, and there is nothing to shew any intention on his part that it should still be "a place of burial." It was unconsecrated, and all that the common law could require was, that there should be no nuisance; no indecent interference with the bodies of the dead. The defendants, however, contend that the statute confers on the Secretary of State a superintending power over what may become dangerous and injurious, and to take measures for preventing any such possible danger or injury. But in my opinion the statute can have that effect only where a nuisance is probable, and not where, as here, the only object seems to be to keep it open to the public view. It is, no doubt, very desirable that places where bodies have been buried should not be used for any other purpose; but I think that all the statute intended was, to keep them from becoming dangerous and injurious to the public health. It was contended that the later act, 22 Vict. c. 1. s. 1, compelled the defendants to enter upon the land after the plaintiff had refused to comply with the directions of the Order. Here, however, the order has gone beyond mere sanitary purposes, so that it is invalid, and cannot be used in support of any subsequent proceedings. The judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants are sued for trespasses upon the land of the plaintiff, and they are liable as trespassers, unless they have acted under the lawful authority of the Secretary of State. The fact of the case appear to be these. For many years previous to 1855 the land in question had been held by the Governors of Bridewell. Up to 1844, it was in lease, and on the expiration of the lease, the governors held the premises up to 1855, on a tenancy from year to year. When they ceased to be lessees, that is, in 1844, all burials had entirely ceased on the land in question. The tenancy from year to year came to an end in 1855; and Lord De la Warr, the freeholder, granted a lease of ninety-nine years to Mr. Soward, who entered upon it, and made two gates, both opening on the western boundary of the land, through which was the only entrance. Having done this, he demised the land, in 1859, for a term of fifty years. No burials had taken place on the land since 1844. Previous to making the order, the land had been completely converted from the purposes for which it had been used up to 1844 by the Governors of Bridewell, for their convenience, as a place of burial, and applied to entirely different purposes, and there was nothing to shew that the freeholder, who was released from all engagements to the Governors of Bridewell, by reason of the termination of the lease, was in any way precluded, independently of these acts of parliament, from dealing with this land otherwise than he would any other place. That being the case, we have to consider whether the Secretary of State had power, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 23. and 22 Vict. c. 1. s. 1, to issue these orders, obedience to which constitutes the trespass of which the plaintiff complains. Section 23. of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. provides "that it shall be lawful"—[His Lordship read the section].—The question is, what is the true meaning of these words? In my judgment they apply only to vaults and places which were, at the time of the act, in the care of persons for the purposes of burial, that is, in the care of persons superintending them for the purposes of burial. Now I think that the place in question was not, when the act passed, in the care of any one for the purpose of burial. It was in the possession of the freeholder, who was absolute owner of it. It therefore does not appear to me that the words "churchwardens or other persons," in section 23, are satisfied by the position in which the plaintiff stood. That being so, the order, in my judgment, was not properly made, and our judgment must be against the defendants.

LUSH, J.—I also am of opinion that the order of the Secretary of State was in excess of the authority conferred by the statute, and was therefore void. It appears that the land in question had been used during the time it was in lease for the purposes of interring those who had died in the hospital. From 1844, ten years before the order for discontinuing burials in the land, the place had ceased to be used as a burial ground; in fact, nothing was done by the freeholder, when the land came into his possession, to shew that he approved of the purpose for which it had been used. The words "vaults or places of burial" seem to me only to apply to those public burial grounds which have impressed upon them the character of places of burial, and cannot properly be used for any other purpose. If the legislature had meant to give powers over the owners of private property, the words, "owners of the land or those in whom the property is vested," would have been inserted in section 23. But I think that the words "churchwardens, or such other persons as may have the care of vaults or places of burial," point to a class of places irrevocably appropriated as places of burial, by consecration or otherwise. It is true that the act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, enables Orders in Council to be made forbidding the continuance of burials in any ground. But section 23. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, upon which this case depends, can only apply to lands appropriated as burial grounds.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Contract of Sale—Warranty of Soundness—Horse “warranted sound for one Month.”

SALE OF GOODS.—G, a farmer, sold to C, a horse-dealer, two horses, and signed the following note of the sale: “C. bought of G. a brown horse, 6 years old, warranted sound, for the sum of one hundred and eighty pounds, £180. 0. 0. Also, a bay horse, five years old, for the sum of ninety pounds, warranted sound, £90. 0. 0. (Signed) G. Warranted sound for one month. (Signed) G.” The bay horse was unsound at the time of the sale, though this was not communicated to the seller until after a month from the sale:—Held, that there was no breach of the warranty, as the words “warranted sound for one month” did not enlarge, but limited, the warranty, and left the seller liable only for unsoundness of which he was informed within a month of the sale.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant, by warranting a horse to be sound for a month, sold it to the plaintiff; yet the horse was not sound then, or for a month, according to the warranty. The second count alleged that the defendant, by warranting a horse to be sound and right for one month from the date of delivery of the horse to the plaintiff, sold it to the plaintiff; yet it was not sound or right then, or for one month from the date of such delivery to the plaintiff.

Pleas—To the first count, first, that at the time of the warranty the horse was sound; secondly, a denial of the warranty. There were like pleas to the second count. Upon these pleas issue was joined.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865, it was proved that the plaintiff's father bought two horses from the defendant, who then signed the following note of the sale:

“Trewent, June 6, 1865.

“Mr. Chapman bought of Mr. G. Gwyther a brown horse, 6 years old, warranted sound, for the sum of one hundred and eighty pounds, £180. 0. 0. Also, a bay horse, five years old, for the sum of ninety pounds, warranted sound, £90. 0. 0. George Gwyther. Warranted sound for one month.

“George Gwyther.

“Trewent, Pembroke.”

Two days afterwards the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, inclosing a cheque for 270*l.*, on the back of which was written, “This cheque is received by me for a brown gelding, price one hundred and eighty pounds; also a bay gelding, price ninety pounds, both of which animals I warrant sound and right for one month from the date of delivery.” The defendant, however, paid the cheque into the bank, without affixing his name to these words, or even indorsing the cheque. When requested to indorse the cheque by the manager, he read the words on it, but refused to sign the warranty, saying that he had already given one on the day of sale. On the 9th of July the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, saying that the bay horse was lame. On the defendant refusing to take it back, this action was commenced.

The learned Judge left to the jury the questions, first, whether at the time of the sale disease, or the seeds of disease, existed in the animal; secondly (passing by the writing on the cheque as not altering the warranty), whether disease, or the seeds of disease, existed on the 5th of July; thirdly, if on the 5th of June the seeds of disease existed, had they so far developed themselves at the end of the month as to cause real disease? The jury found that the horse was actually unsound on the day of the sale, but that this was unknown to the defendant. A verdict was directed for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move.

Hardinge Giffard obtained a rule in Hilary Term, 1886, for the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered, on the ground that upon the true construction of the warranty there was no evidence of any breach of the contract.

Henry Matthews and Moir shewed cause.—Upon the true construction of the warranty, the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict. The words of the warrantor must be taken most strongly against him; and if this is borne in mind, it cannot be doubted but that “warranted sound for one month” means, “I warrant that the horses are sound, and that they will so continue for a month.” The buyer probably wished to protect himself against latent defects in the animals.

[LUSH, J.—What words do you propose to add to the warranty, for it will be necessary to supply some in order to maintain your proposition?]

It is submitted that, as the words stand, they mean that the warranty is to be a continuing one. There are cases where a limited warranty has been maintained; but they are authorities against the defendant, for in all the terms of the contract were explicit, and had no resemblance to the words used in the present case. In Buchanan v. Parnshaw (2 Term. Rep. 745) the conditions of the sale were that the purchaser of any horse, warranted sound, who should conceive the same to be unsound, should return him within two days, otherwise he should be deemed sound. In Mesnard v. Aldridge (3 Esp. 271) the conditions were that all horses in case of any unsoundness discovered were required to be returned before the evening of the second day after the sale. And in Bywater v. Richardson (1 Ad. & E. 508) the horse was sold subject to a rule that a warranty of soundness when given was to remain in force until twelve o'clock at noon on the day next after the day of sale, when it would become complete, and the responsibility of the seller would terminate, unless in the mean time a note to the contrary accompanied by a certificate of a veterinary surgeon should be delivered, setting forth the cause, nature or description of any alleged unsoundness. It is therefore clear that in all these cases express words were thought necessary in order to defeat the warranty; but no such intention is disclosed in the words employed by the defendant.—They also contended that the writing on the cheque ought to have been brought to the notice of the jury.

B. T. Williams (Giffard with him), in support of the rule.—The verdict should be entered for the defendant, for the words “warranted sound for one month,” written after the words “warranted sound” previously written, shew an intention to limit the liability of the defendant.

[MELLOR, J.—You say that these words require the plaintiff to notify to the defendant within a month of the sale any sort of unsoundness?]

Yes. In Liddard v. Kain (2 Bing. 183) there was a warranty like that which the plaintiff seeks to imply from the words used by the parties here; but the contract was to deliver horses at the end of a fortnight sound and free from blemish. A warranty, as a general rule, never goes beyond the time of sale.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we all think that the rule should be made absolute. In the first place, with regard to the question whether the writing signed by the defendant in the 5th of June or the writing on the back of the cheque constituted the contract, we hold that I was right in thinking that the agreement was contained in the first document. The writing on the cheque was, no doubt, evidence of what the original bargain had been; but the rights of the parties must depend upon the words of the real contract made on the 5th of June.

The real question in the case is, what do the words "a horse warranted sound" with the words "warranted sound for one month" following them mean? If the undertaking was that the horse was sound, and that the soundness would continue for a month, and the warrantor took upon himself the liability for any disease which might smite the animal during this period, that would have been a most imprudent and unlikely contract for any one to enter upon, and we ought not lightly to suppose that it was contemplated. What I think the parties must have intended to express is explained by what was said by Mr. Bearcroft, while arguing the case of Buchanan v. Parnshaw (2 Term Rep. 745): "Where a horse is objected to as unsound, it is extremely material that he should be returned within a certain time, to prevent all disputes respecting the time when the horse became unsound, because, if no objection were to be made on that account till a long interval had elapsed, the unsoundness might perhaps be occasioned in that interval. And it is for that reason that it is made a condition of sale at all public auctions that the horse, if objected to as unsound, shall be returned within a short limited time." I cite this to shew that so long ago as 1788 persons did restrict the warranty of soundness by saying that it should only apply within a certain time; and although here the buyer and seller have very inartificially expressed their meaning, we must take it that they meant that the warranty was subject to a term, that it was only to continue in force for a month, and that any complaint must be made within that time. If they had had the assistance of a lawyer, that, I do not doubt, is what they would have instructed him to draw up. Therefore, taking as the general rule of construction that the intention of persons must be gathered from their words, not, however, from the words as used by anybody, but as used by those who are parties to transactions like that which is in question, a rule noticed in the last edition of Oliphant on Horses, by Mr. Ryder, p. 111, we must construe the words "warranted sound for one month" as meaning that a month is the only time allowed for any complaint respecting unsoundness in the animal.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with the opinion of my Brother Blackburn that the words of this warranty must be construed according to their meaning when used by the parties to a transaction relating to the sale of horses. Adopting this construction, I understand "warranted sound for a month" to mean, "I allow a month for taking objections to the horse, but I intend my warranty to apply during that time only." In the present case the objection came too late, and the rule must therefore be made absolute.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. We should endeavour, if possible, to find a meaning in the words which will carry out the real intention of the parties. Now it cannot, I think be doubted but that the seller intended, by these words, not to extend, but to limit his liability under an ordinary warranty. With such a warranty the buyer might have claimed damages simply on the ground that the horse was not sound at the time of the sale; and it is often a question of great difficulty whether disease, or the seeds of disease, was or were in the animal at this time. But here the seller thought, "I will not have any liability on account of this horse beyond a definite limit," and he expressed his resolution in a very compendious form. The words "warranted sound for one month" may readily be amended in accordance with the sense so as to express more fully the condition that the warranty is only to continue in force for a month. To interpret them as meaning that the horse is sound now, and will so continue during a month, we must supply words which no rules of law will allow us to introduce. The plaintiff has failed in proving a breach of what we think was the legal contract, and the rule must be made absolute.

Rule made absolute.

Quo Warranto—Relator—Board of Health—Voting-Papers—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 24.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. QUO WARRANTO.—By the 24th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. (the Public Health Act, 1848), if the number of persons nominated to be elected as members of a local board exceed the number to be elected, the "chairman shall cause voting-papers in the form contained in Schedule (A.) to this act annexed, to be prepared and filled up," &c. The form in Schedule (A.) contains columns for the "Number of votes," "As owner" and "As ratepayer." An election for the local board for the district of C. being about to take place, the chairman prepared and filled up voting-papers for the persons who were entitled to vote at the election, but omitted to fill in the number of votes to which they were entitled:—Held, by Blackburn, J. and Mellor, J. (Shee, J. dissentiente), that this omission did not make the election void, as the provision in the statute could not be construed as being more than directory.

M, who had been a member of the local board previously, was a candidate for re-election; he canvassed the voters, and himself voted with a voting-paper in which the number of votes had not been filled in. He had himself been elected at an election conducted in a manner similar to the present one, and had not objected to the form of the voting-papers until he was defeated. At the first election he had himself issued papers in the same form:—Held, per totam Curiam, that this Court, in the exercise of its discretion, would not allow him, having acquiesced in the manner of voting, to appear as a relator in an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the successful candidates, and that a rule nisi having been obtained, such rule ought to be discharged with costs.

Semle, per Blackburn, J. and Mellor, J., that the chairman might be liable to a penalty, under section 28, for omitting to fill up the voting-papers in the form provided by the act.

This was a rule calling upon the defendants to shew cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against them, to shew by what authority they claimed to exercise the office of members of the local board of health of the non-corporate district of Cottingham, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the ground that the voting-papers delivered to the voters were not filled up with the number of votes which the voters were entitled to, as required by the 24th section of the Public Health Act, 1848.

It appeared from the affidavits that an election of members of the local board being about to take place, a number of persons nominated, and as the number so nominated exceeded the number to be elected, it became necessary that voting-papers should be prepared and filled up by the chairman, to be delivered to the persons entitled to vote, in pursuance of the 24th section of the act.

By that section the voting-papers are to be in the form given in Schedule (A.) to the act; and in such form there are columns headed, "Number of votes," "As owner," "As ratepayer." The chairman prepared voting-papers, but he omitted to specify the number of votes to which the respective voters were entitled. These papers were used at the election, and the defendants were elected; the relator was also a candidate, but was defeated, and he subsequently obtained the rule above mentioned.

It appeared from the affidavits used on shewing cause that the relator had held office as a member of the said board from its formation until he had retired before the election in question; that he was elected in a similar manner to that now pursued; that he sought re-election and took an active part in canvassing voters, and himself voted with a voting-paper which had not been filled in with the number of votes prior to delivery, without having ever given notice or raised the question of the validity of the voting-papers until after he was defeated. At the first election he had acted as returning officer, and had himself used similar papers.

P. Thompson, for the defendant Lofthouse, shewed cause against the rule.—The relator was not competent to apply to this Court for the present information. He had acquiesced in the propriety of the mode of election, and has taken his chance of success. The King v. Trevenen (2 B. & Ald. 339) shews that it is a valid objection to a relator applying for a quo warranto that he was present at the time of the objectionable election, even although he was then ignorant of the objection. The relator in the present case is in a still worse position, for he took his chance of being himself elected in the same manner. Next, it is wholly immaterial whether the number of votes is specified or not. By the 27th section the chairman is to attend at the office on the day following the election, and ascertain the validity of the votes, and cast them up; so that if the voter wishes to insure the right number of votes being credited to him, he has only to attend upon the chairman, and take care that that should be done; and he himself must know what number he is entitled to.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It is very difficult to say that it is not the duty of the chairman to insert the number of votes; but perhaps his failure to do so does not make the election void.]

No; the provision is only directory, and not imperative—The King v. Cross (16 Justice of the Peace, 215). (He was then stopped.)

Philbrick and Atkinson were not heard on behalf of the defendant Wilson, as they relied upon the same objections as had already been taken.

Forbes, in support of the rule.—The statute is imperative, and the omission to fill in the number of votes makes the election invalid, just as much as if the chairman had not prepared or delivered any voting-papers at all. It is essential that the voters should know what number of votes they are to be credited with; so that if a smaller number is given than that which they are entitled to, they may attend and insist upon the matter being set right. The chairman is a judicial officer. Again, how can he ascertain the validity of the votes when there is nothing to cast up? These papers were altogether silent as to the number of votes. If the defendants are right, the whole election would be at the mercy of the chairman, who can do just as he likes with the votes. Next, the relator is competent. The affidavit is not sufficiently certain; it only states that he was elected in a similar manner, not even using the word "same." How could perjury be assigned upon such an affidavit? The King v. Benney (1 B. & Ad. 684) shews that a relator is not disqualified by the mere fact of having formerly taken part in other elections, where the same irregularity existed as that complained of, but was not noticed. The King v. Parkyn (Ibid. 690) was a stronger case than the present, and does not help the defendants.

P. Thompson handed up The King v. Slythe (6 B. & C. 240).

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case there are two points that have to be considered. The application is made for a rule nisi for a quo warranto in the matter of an election to the office of members of a local board of health; and the objection arises thus—The 24th section of the Public Health Act requires that where there are more persons nominated than are to be elected, the chairman shall cause the voting-papers, in the form of Schedule (A.), to be prepared and filled up, and shall insert the names of all the persons nominated, and then deliver them to the different voters, who, by means of such papers, are to vote. Schedule (A.), which is attached to the act, gives the form in which the blanks contained in it shall be filled. Among those blanks there is one that is to be filled up with the number of votes; and I think there can be no doubt that the meaning of the 24th section is, that the chairman shall, before the papers are sent round, fill up those blanks. He has the means, by looking at the rate-book, of ascertaining what is the number of votes that can be given, and it is intended he shall insert them so as to inform the voter what number of votes the chairman means he should give. In the present case the chairman neglected to do this, and sent round the papers filled up in every respect except the blank for the votes, and left that blank; and there is no doubt that by so neglecting, under the 28th section, he made himself liable to a penalty not exceeding 50*l.* If the omission was bona fide, the penalty would not be levied to the extent of 50*l.*; but if wilful, and with intent to mislead, he would probably find the penalty enforced to that amount, in case of a proceeding against him.

But the question that is now raised is, whether this neglect vitiates the voting-papers and renders them a nullity, so as to make void the whole election. In other words, whether the direction to fill them up is a condition precedent, or merely a direction to the chairman, the neglect of which exposes him to the penalty but does not vitiate the election; and I think, on looking at the section, this omission does not vitiate the election. It is required to be done in order that the chairman may give the voter notice what number of votes he at that time supposes the voter is entitled to, to enable the voter to come afterwards at the time of election, and let the chairman know that he is wrong, and have the matter investigated. The voting-paper gives no information to the opponent as to whether the number of votes proposed to be allowed is too large. The voter who finds his name entered for twelve and believes he has only two will not object, but the one who finds his name entered for two, having twelve, would.

But then comes the 27th section, which says, that after the voting-papers have all been delivered, the chairman is to attend at the office of the local board, and ascertain the validity of the votes from examination of the rate-books, and such other books and documents as he thinks fit, and shall cast up such of the votes as he shall find to be valid and to have been duly given and ascertain the number for each candidate. It seems plain upon that that the number of votes inserted in the voting-paper is not material. If the voting-paper had been overcharged by the number of twelve, and any one then called the chairman's attention to it, or he found out he had made a mistake, it is manifest it would be the chairman's duty to disallow the twelve, and only allow the proper number. In the other case, if the number were too small, and the chairman's attention had been called to it by the voter or any one else, and he found he had put in one when the man was entitled to six, it is plain the chairman's duty would be to allow the proper number, that is, six. This is plain, and why he should not do it if a blank is left and no number put in at all is what I am utterly unable to see, and Mr. Forbes was not able to shew me any reason why it should not be done.

Then comes the question, and I agree, after what Mr. Forbes has said, that it is a good deal a question of common sense, whether the thing is from its nature essential for the election; as, for instance, the chairman inserting in the paper the proper names of candidates, without which the election could not take place—would that render the voting-paper a nullity, because it would not be a voting-paper on which a proper election could take place? I think that common sense shews that to be a condition precedent, but when you find that the mere filling up the number of votes has no such consequence, but that, because there is a blank, some inconvenience has consequently occurred, and there is no further mischief than if there were a mistake in the number, I cannot think the legislature intended that to be a condition precedent so as by its omission to vitiate the whole election. It is said that if the number is not filled in there would be no means provided by the statute of ascertaining the number of votes the returning officer would allow in respect of each person. The voting-paper itself would not shew that; and I have already shewn that if the voting-paper were erroneous it is the chairman's duty to allow the correct number of votes; the voting-paper would not, therefore, shew that at all.

Then the statute in section 27. provides, that afterwards the chairman shall make out a list in which he shall put the number of votes given to each candidate. It appears in the present case the chairman has done what is right and proper. He has made out a list shewing the number of votes which he has allowed to the voters. Such a thing, as was said the other day in a case in this Court, is right and proper to be done, and ought to be done. But in that case, where the chairman had made out a list, he made out a list in which he put a number, and a lump number of votes to each candidate, 1,000 to one, and 800 to the other, I think all of us said, but I know I said, that though the statute did not require that he should keep a register of the number he allowed for each, it would be right and proper conduct for him so to do. In the present case the chairman has not done that which the statute requires him to do, and the putting the number of votes in the voting-paper would only supply that defect. Therefore, as I said before, for those reasons I think this is a matter that ought to be done by the chairman, and that the failure to do so does subject him to a penalty, but does not vitiate the election.

If it stood on that alone, as I believe my Brother Shee has a doubt, it might be a matter that might be put upon the record; but there is another ground that cannot be put upon the record, and that is, that in the exercise of our discretion we should not allow the election to be disturbed at the application of a relator under the circumstances in which Mr. Mawe is. It must be done at the instance of some person, and from very early times it has been said the allowing such an information is in the discretion of the Court, and one of the great elements is that we shall see that the person who comes to ask us to put the law in motion, and by whom substantially it would be carried on, though in the name of the Master of the Crown Office, is a fit person to make use of the prerogative process of the Crown. Very early it was said, and the rule has been constantly acted upon, that we should see that the relator is entitled to complain, and when he complains in criminal informations for libel and other matters the rule is constantly acted upon, and in an information in the nature of quo warranto it is also acted upon.

Now, in the present case, what are the facts? It is sworn in the affidavits that, at the first election, when Mr. Mawe himself was the returning officer, he, no doubt thinking it right, did issue voting-papers in this form; and to demur specially to the affidavit, because it is sworn that he conducted the election in issuing voting-papers in a similar manner, seems to me merely cavilling with the words; the intention was to swear that he issued voting-papers such as these. He did that when the first election took place, and he was the returning officer. It appears that at the second election he was returned himself, and that election was conducted in the same way, and certainly he must be taken to know what was the form. In the third election it was done in the same way. He received the voting-paper in blank delivered to himself, and the affidavits sufficiently lead to the conclusion that when he voted on that paper he knew the other papers had been issued in the manner he himself originated. Then he proceeds, nevertheless, to take his chance upon the election, keeping this objection in reserve; or perhaps not having thought of it then, but it being suggested to him by his legal adviser afterwards, he takes his chance of being returned, and then complains of the election on a ground that he was well aware of before. I think that that is a matter we ought not to allow. It is very similar indeed to the common case in which an arbitrator has proceeded when there has been something wrong, but one party has gone on taking the chance of the award being in his favour, and, when it turns out against him, trying to upset the award. It is the same thing in principle and in common sense; but here it seems to me that Mr. Mawe, having himself originated and caused the mode of election, and taken his chance to be returned under it, cannot now be heard to say that the Court should grant the prerogative process of the Crown to be used in his favour to upset the election.

Under those circumstances, on the last ground, which is one that could not be raised upon the record, being in the discretion of the Court, I think the rule should be discharged, and being discharged on such ground it should be discharged with costs.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion, and without going at large into the last point, the relator in the present case comes within the rule which, I apprehend, is the true rule cited in Corner's Crown Practice, p. 184. And it appears to me the affidavits bring him within that rule. I agree with my Brother Blackburn upon that, and as the other point is also of importance, and I agree with my Brother Blackburn in the views he has expressed, I wish to state shortly the reasons which induce me to come to the conclusion I do. I think the vice of Mr. Forbes' argument consisted in this, that he does not distinguish sufficiently between the functions of the returning officer which are ministerial and those which are judicial. It is apparent from the form of the act that there are some that are ministerial and some that are judicial. And what is required is this, that before the election by section 23, the chairman is to prepare and sign the particulars of the number and qualification of the persons to be elected; and then (s. 24.) if the number of persons nominated shall be the same or less than the number of persons to be elected, such persons, if duly qualified, shall be deemed to be elected, and shall be certified as such by the chairman under his hand. But if the numbers so nominated exceed the number to be elected, what is the chairman to do? Why he is to do this, to cause voting-papers to be prepared in the form contained in Schedule (A.); and there is no doubt that in the form in Schedule (A.) the number of votes appears as intended to be stated. I may take it for granted in the present case the returning officer has not stated the number of votes, but has left that a blank. In other respects the voting-paper is duly filled up, but in that respect he has omitted to fill it up at all. He should insert therein the names of all the persons nominated in the order in which the nomination-papers were received, but it is not necessary to insert more than once the name of any person nominated. That is what the returning officer is directed to do, and undoubtedly, if he does not do it, then he has failed to comply with one of the directions of the act, and under the 28th section he may be liable to a penalty for neglecting or refusing to comply with one of the provisions of the act. It appears to me that that section shews that some of the provisions of the act, though they are penal upon the chairman if he wilfully refuses or neglects to obey them, still are not intended to influence the validity of the election. The voter is to write his initials in the voting-paper against the name or names of the persons, not exceeding the number of persons to be elected, for whom he intends to vote. That shews that it is necessary that the names of the persons nominated should be inserted, otherwise the voter could not exercise his functions at all. Then comes the provision in section 26, and these words are negative, shewing that the papers cannot be received except where certain conditions are complied with: "That no voting-paper shall be received or admitted unless the same has been delivered at the address or residence as aforesaid of the voter." Therefore, if they have not been delivered they cannot be received, thereby showing that the delivery at the residence of the voter is necessary. Then if it is omitted there is a provision that the person not having received the voting-paper, may require the voting-paper to be delivered to him, and may fill it up in the presence of the chairman. Then the returning officer, by the 27th section, should immediately after the day of the election and on as many days as is necessary, attend at the local board and ascertain the validity of the votes by the examination of the rate-books, and such other documents as are necessary, by examining such persons as he thinks fit, and should cast up such of the votes as he finds to be valid. Now, I stop for a moment to remark on one of the observations of Mr. Forbes on this subject. He must read it as if the words were "and shall cast up such of the votes as are named in such voting-papers," because, according to his argument, if that is not so it must fall to the ground; but see the effect of that. Suppose the paper contains a smaller number of votes than the voter is entitled to, then it would be inapplicable, because he could not do it from the votes named in the voting-paper. It would only give him a negative power; he would be obliged to strike off the votes named in the voting-paper, but he could not surcharge the paper by adding votes to it, "as he shall find to be valid, and to have been duly given, collected or received, and ascertain the number of such votes for each candidate." The other provision I have already referred to. Then the 28th section is this: "That if the said chairman or other person charged with taking, collecting or returning the votes at any such election as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this act, he shall be liable to a penalty." Therefore, it appears to me that with reference to many matters required to be done, they are such as do not necessarily, and ought not, and I do not see how they can, if the chairman does his duty under the 27th section, affect the validity of the election. There is no doubt it affords facilities, and therefore it is a proper regulation to make, and a proper requirement to impose upon the returning officer, that he shall in a particular form send out his voting-papers. It is and may be a very strong step to say that, because he has neglected to comply with something that is not material as it appears to me to the actual judicial functions he is to perform, and which he is to do from the rate-books, and those means provided by the section, that because that requirement is not complied with the whole election is to be void. Therefore it appears to me, as I agree with my Brother Blackburn on this, and also agree with him in the conclusion at which we should arrive, that we ought not under these circumstances to do other than discharge this rule, with costs.

SHEE, J.—Although I have interfered very little in the course of the argument of the learned counsel, I am afraid it has been sufficiently apparent that I differ from my learned Brothers on the main point in this case, and as I always do so with great distrust of myself I think it is right and respectful that I should state the ground of the difference. Now it seems to me, indeed it is admitted as I understand on the part of the learned counsel who shews cause against this rule, and by my Brothers, that the chairman in this case has not observed the requirements of the act, that he has not conducted this election in the way in which the act of parliament directs him to conduct it; and it appears to me that he has failed in particulars that are important, that in point of fact he has not done that thing which the act requires as essential to the validity of this election.

Now let us see what the provisions of the act are. The act contemplates that persons shall vote according to the rateable value of their property, some having more votes than others in proportion to the rateable value of their property. That is distinctly provided by the 20th section. If the property in respect of which the person is entitled to vote be rated upon a rateable value of less than 50*l.* he shall have one vote, and so on. So in the last, if to the amount of 250*l.* he should have six votes, and any person who is owner and bona fide occupier of the same property shall be entitled to vote both in respect of "such ownership and of such occupation," words that are very important when we come to consider the provision of the 24th section, and the form of the voting-paper which the chairman is directed to send out. Then we come to that section, and it provides that "if the number of persons nominated shall be the same or less than the number of persons to be elected, such persons, if duly qualified, shall be deemed to be elected, and shall be certified accordingly by the said chairman under his hand; but if the number so nominated exceed the number to be elected, the said chairman shall cause voting-papers in the form contained in the Schedule (A.) to this act annexed, to be prepared and filled up, and shall insert therein the names of all the persons nominated in the order in which the nomination papers were received; but it shall not be necessary to insert more than once the name of any person nominated. Now, I take it that no one can doubt, that if this election had been conducted by the chairman without sending any voting-papers at all, though it was perfectly plain that nobody had been allowed to have more votes than he was entitled to have, that the election could not be right.

Now let us just endeavour to see what the true meaning of the section is. He is to cause voting-papers in the form contained in the Schedule (A.) to this act annexed. Now, what is the form contained in Schedule (A.) to this act annexed? It surely cannot mean the general form that is set out in the schedule. It is the form in Schedule (A.) to this act annexed which is to be prepared and filled up. Surely that must mean a form prepared and filled up by him as in Schedule (A.) to this act annexed. Now, let us see what that form is. It is a form that is to state the number of the voting-paper, the name and address of the voter, and the number of votes, whether as owner or ratepayer or both. The voter is to put his initials against the names of the persons for whom he intends to vote, and it is to contain the names and residences of the persons nominated, the quality or calling of the persons nominated, the names of the nominators and the addresses of the nominators. Surely the meaning of the act of parliament is that all those requisites should be inserted in the form.

Now, it is remarkable that in the section of the act which gives this form, there is no direction as to any of these particulars, except as to the names of all the persons nominated, and as to that all the direction is, that those names are to be inserted in the order in which the nomination-paper was received; so that, as it seems to me, this provision of the 24th section, if it does not mean that the chairman must fill up all the blanks of this voting-paper, for the voter afterwards to put his initials to, in point of fact prescribes no form at all. My opinion upon it is, that the chairman has not sent a voting-paper, but that he has sent a form imperfectly filled up; and let us see if the other provisions of the act of parliament does not support that view of the construction of it. There must have been some object in requiring this form to be followed, and we find, in the 24th section, "And the said chairman shall, three days before the day of election, cause one of such voting-papers to be delivered by the person appointed for that purpose to the address in the parts for which the election is to be held, of each owner and proxy and at the residence of each ratepayer entitled to vote therein." What is the object of that? Why, that the person who is entitled to some votes may know three days before the election whether the right number of votes has been given to him by the chairman, so that he may be content with the arrangement that the chairman has made as to the number of votes that he is to give, or that he may give himself the trouble, before the day of election, of disputing the opinion of the chairman as to the number of votes which the voter is to give, which opinion he finds recorded in the voting-paper that has been sent to him. Then it proceeds, and by the 26th section it is provided, "that the said chairman shall cause the voting-papers to be collected on the day of election by the person appointed or employed for the purpose, in such manner as he shall direct; but no voting-paper shall be received or admitted unless the same have been delivered at the address or residence as aforesaid of the voter within the parts for which the election is had, nor unless the same be collected by the person appointed or employed for the purpose, except as next hereinafter provided;" so that by this section the legislature again attaches importance to the fact of the voting-paper so filled up being sent in to the person who is entitled to vote, and in case of any omission, intends to make provision for that omission: "Provided always, that if any person qualified to vote shall not have received a voting-paper as aforesaid, he shall on application before that day"—that is, the day of election—"to the said chairman be entitled to receive a voting-paper from him, and to fill up the same in his presence, and then and there to deliver the same to him." Surely that section clearly shews that before the election, even so late as the day of the election, if there has been any omission to fill up the voting-paper, the voter may insist on its being done, and do it himself, if necessary, in presence of the chairman. Then there is, after that, section 27, which provides "That the chairman shall on the day immediately following the election, and on as many days immediately succeeding as may be necessary, attend at the office of the local board of health, and ascertain the validity of the votes by an examination of the rate-books and such other books and documents as he may think necessary, and by examining such persons as he may see fit." What is the object of that? Why, that in case of any dispute arising as to the number of votes which he has ascribed, or which he has given or allotted to any particular voter, that may be inquired into and finally ascertained. "And he shall cast up such of the votes as he shall find to be valid." Those words "cast up" surely do not mean that he shall then and there settle how many votes each individual is to have; but it refers to that having been already, not finally, but provisionally settled, and subject to inquiry ascertained, "and he shall cast up such of the votes as he shall find to have been valid, and to have been duly given, collected or received, and ascertain the number of such votes for each candidate;" and accordingly it provides that he shall cause a list to be printed of the number of votes that each candidate has received; but that list does not shew how many votes were allowed to each particular voter, and does not afford the smallest opportunity of ascertaining whether the chairman, who is made to obey the requirements of the 24th section, has taken pains to ascertain that each elector, each owner or occupier, shall have been allowed as many votes as he was entitled to and no more. It appears to me, therefore, on the first point—though, as I said before, I differ, as I always do from my learned Brothers, who have had more experience in these matters than I have, with very great distrust of myself in my judgment—that these were not voting-papers at all within the provisions of the act, and no satisfactory answer has been given to the argument of the learned counsel who moved this rule.

Now, as to the other point, with the assistance of my learned Brothers, who have called my attention to certain cases in one of the books of practice, I have arrived at the conclusion that their decision is perfectly right, and that we ought not to assist this relator in the course which he has thought proper to adopt. It appears that, with knowledge of the irregularity of the course pursued by the chairman on this occasion, he voted on a voting-paper which he knew or believed not to be a voting-paper within the provisions of the act, and it appears to me that this case comes exactly within the description of a relator, whose application is not to be attended to, which is given by Lord Kenyon in the case of The King v. Clarke (1 East, 46). "The Court," Lord Kenyon says, "have, indeed, on several occasions said, and said wisely, that they will not listen to a common relator coming, though within the time limited, as a mere stranger, to disturb a corporation with which he has no concern; nor even a corporator, who has acquiesced, or perhaps concurred, in the very act which he afterwards comes to complain of when it suits his purpose, and, so far, I think, we have determined rightly." That seems to me to be the exact position of Mr. Mawe; he has done the same thing more than once, which he has endeavoured to take advantage of in this case—he has profited by it before this election; and it appears to me that, agreeing in this respect with my learned Brothers, he is a person who is not entitled to the assistance of the prerogative power of this Court, and that in this matter, which is entirely for our discretion, we cannot accede to the application. I agree, therefore, that this rule ought to be discharged with costs.

Sheriff, Liability of—Escape—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Invalid Deed of Arrangement—Registration—Certificate of Registrar.

SHERIFF.—The plaintiff having recovered judgment against B., sued out a ca. sa., and delivered it to the sheriff. B. had previously entered into a deed (to which the plaintiff had not assented), which purported to be a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but which was, in fact, an invalid deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. It was, nevertheless, duly registered; and the Chief Registrar gave a certificate of registration to B. The certificate contained a note that it was available as a protection in bankruptcy. The sheriff arrested B.; but upon the production of this certificate allowed him to go at large, and returned that B. was entitled to protection from arrest, and that he was not found in his bailiwick. An action having been brought against the sheriff for a false return, and an escape,—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the certificate entitled B. to his discharge, and that there must be judgment for the defendant.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in favour of the defendant, upon the argument of a demurrer to the third and fourth pleas.

The pleadings are fully set out in the report of the proceedings in the Court below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 97).

Bayliss, for the plaintiff.—The question to be argued upon this appeal is, whether the Registrar's certificate of the registration of a bad deed of arrangement is a protection, so as to justify the sheriff in discharging a prisoner whom he has arrested under a ca. sa. The decision of the Court below was wrong. For the purposes of this argument it is to be assumed that the deed was invalid, and it is clear that the certificate must be so as well—Ilderton v. Jewell.¹ And this law was approved of in Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172). The debtor had the remedy in his own hands; if he was entitled to his discharge he should have applied to the Court—Dewhurst v. Kershaw (1 H. & C. 726; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 146). The Court of Common Pleas have acted upon the opinion that the remedy is by habeas corpus, and the Lords Justices, in In re Poland (Law Journal Notes of Cases, 134), were of the same opinion. The granting of a certificate is not a judicial act, but a ministerial one simply. No judicial mind is brought to bear upon it, or is required, and it can be no protection to the sheriff unless it be supported by a good deed. It cannot stand by itself. The question arises upon the construction of the 192nd, 193rd, and 198th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134); and it is submitted that all the Registrar is required to do under the 192nd and 193rd sections is ministerial. Then the 198th section provides, that "a certificate of the filing and registration of such deed, under the hand of the Chief Registrar and the seal of the Court, shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in Bankruptcy." The word "such" is to be noticed; it means such a deed as would be valid. In the Court below, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn held that the word "such" could not be got rid of—see 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 111.

[BRAMWELL, B.—I do not quite see the cogency of the argument based upon the word "such." There might be a certificate, though there was no deed at all.]

What do the words "shall be available" mean? It is submitted that they mean shall be available for such limited protection as is for the benefit of the Court and the creditors, a protection of the debtor as a witness to attend the Court de die in diem, and give evidence as to his estate. Such a protection as is referred to in sections 112. and 113. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and for the interference with which a penalty of 5*l.* a day is imposed by section 113. There is a difference in the language used in section 113. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and of section 198. of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134; and it must be remembered that the position of the debtor under the two sections is different. Under the first his property has become vested in the assignees; but under the second it is not so, and there is good reason for holding that the officer is not excused if he act upon the production of a certificate of a deed which is bad, and which, therefore, confers no security upon the creditors. If the sheriff arrests a bankrupt while going to or from the court no action will lie against the sheriff, the remedy being an application to the Court for his discharge—Magnay v. Burt (5 Q.B. Rep. 381).

[ERLE, C.J.—In the progress of legislation upon this subject, the prominent idea is the protection of the debtor. It would be a great hardship upon the sheriff, if you are right. POLLOCK, C.B.—Do you say that it is impossible to read the statute so as to support the judgment of the Court below?]

Perhaps it would be difficult to go so far as that.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Then I think that it would be proper to read it so, in order to get rid of the absurdity of holding that the sheriff would be liable because it turned out that there was a flaw in the deed, which he could not know of.]

It is submitted that it is a mistake to argue upon the hardship to the sheriff. His office is a lucrative one, and he undertakes it knowing that the law subjects him to some apparent hardship. The hardship is rather upon the creditor, who, if the debtor is to be entitled to his discharge, although the deed be bad, loses all hold of him and his property. The deed may be altogether fictitious. Besides, a sheriff is not in the same position as other persons with regard to hardship—see Copland v. Powell (1 Bing. 369; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. C.P. 369) and Gladwell v. Blake (1 Cr. M. & R. 636).

(1) 14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 665; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 256; affirmed in error, 16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 142; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 148.

[BRAMWELL, B.—The fact of his being already subject to one hardship is hardly a reason for our holding that he is to be subject to another.]

He also referred to Ex parte Stewart (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 4), In re Windsor (1 New Rep. 230), and to the other cases cited in his argument in the Court below.

Mellish (G. Bruce with him).—The certificate was of a valid deed, but gave a misdescription of it, and it turned out to be invalid according to the law as now decided. Then, what was the duty of the officer when the certificate was produced? The plaintiff says that he was bound to keep his prisoner; but if so, what is the use of giving a certificate at all? And the latter part of section 198. would be inoperative and needless. It says that the certificate shall be available for all purposes. The legislature intended to diminish imprisonment for debt as much as possible, and that when the debtor had obtained the certificate, he should be protected at once, and that the officer should act upon it at once. Possibly, if the certificate had shewn that the deed was bad, there would have been no protection; but here it shewed that the deed was good. The officer cannot be bound to go and find out whether the deed is good or not. The other side must admit that as soon as a genuine protection is produced, the officer must act upon it at once. Next, it is a mistake to say that the duty of the Registrar is ministerial; it is, to some extent, judicial. He is not to grant his certificate without examining the deed, to see what it is, and must exercise his judgment upon it. But the argument may be put in the very words of Mr. Justice Crompton in delivering judgment in the Court below. The learned Judge said: "My judgment proceeds on the ground that the legislature appears to me to have pointed out the document in question as the one on which the sheriff is to act, at all events until he has notice of the invalidity of the deed; and I think him excused by the legislature directing him not to persist in executing the process if such document be produced, just as he is where the plaintiff himself has directed him not to execute the process. I cannot construe the act of the legislature as imposing so monstrous a hardship upon the sheriff, as to direct him under severe penalties to act upon the production of the document, and yet to leave him liable in so acting as for a breach of duty, if it should turn out that circumstances of which he can have no knowledge have made invalid the deed on which the certificate is founded. The legislature throws upon the Registrar, as the officer of the Court, the responsibility of seeing that the requisite proportion of creditors have signed, and he has the affidavit before him of that fact, and he has also the deed before him from which he is to make in his book of registry a short statement of the nature and effect of the deed. The sheriff, being required to act merely on the production and having a copy of the certificate of the registration, has no means of testing its validity, either in point of fact or law. The legislature would be putting him in a worse case than in the ordinary case of difficulty of a sheriff who can inquire, and whose duty it was in many cases at common law to inquire, into the validity of documents. Here the legislature in effect takes from him all opportunity of inquiring, and directs what is his duty on production and receipt of a copy of the certificate. It seems to me that the legislature have said that the document in question is to be evidence that 'such' valid deed has been duly executed, upon which the sheriff is required to act; and that in effect he is prevented by the legislature from inquiring further, and is compelled to act at once upon such evidence; at all events, unless he has some knowledge or notification of the badness of the deed. I think, therefore, that we ought to hold that the sheriff in the case at bar was justified in discharging the debtor who produced the certificate of the Registrar in due form, that such a deed had been executed, although the deed afterwards turned out to be invalid."

Next, the natural construction of the statute is that the Court of Bankruptcy has the whole matter before it, and has the power to determine whether the creditor should get execution or not. It affords an easy way of getting execution subject to an appeal to the Lord Chancellor. When the deed turned out to be invalid the plaintiff could have gone to the Court of Bankruptcy. In In re Tresidder (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 1) Lord Cranworth, L.C. said, that where a deed was invalidated he was inclined to think that a creditor had power to apply to a commissioner under section 198. to issue execution, and that it was not unreasonable that he should be able to set the law in motion without incurring the great peril of doing it at his own risk.

Bayliss replied.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the majority of the Court below should be confirmed. This matter has been discussed in the Court below with very ample research and very powerful argument on both sides. Nothing can be more powerful than the case as put by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, and also as put by the other three Judges, Mr. Justice Shee, Mr. Justice Mellor, and Mr. Justice Crompton. We are of opinion that the certificate of such a deed is that which is to operate as a valid certificate. We are of opinion that the sheriff is not bound to go and ascertain whether a valid deed exists, and then to act. It is a matter beyond his powers to ascertain that; and we think the words of the statute are, that the certificate of such a deed shall be the matter which the sheriff has to look to. The certificate would be without any operation at all if it did not have the effect which has been contended for. The sheriff is to see whether there is a certificate of such a deed. The certificate states the validity of the deed. The deed itself may be an invalid deed; but it is the certificate which was produced. As a protection in bankruptcy we are clearly of opinion that it did not give the debtor mere privilege, but give him a right to be discharged. It is available as a protection in bankruptcy, and entitles the party to be discharged. Whatever he might be liable to, we need not stop to inquire; but it gave the right of being discharged, and the sheriff would be wrong if he did not discharge him. The consequence is, that the judgment of the majority of the Court below is affirmed. Merely because Mr. Justice Crompton is no more, we adhere to and adopt his words, although there is an equally powerful statement on the part of the other Judges. But we rather adopt the words of Mr. Justice Crompton in the passage read by Mr. Mellish. Our judgment is based upon that passage. We prefer taking it from Mr. Justice Crompton's judgment for the reason I have stated.

POLLOCK, C.B., BRAMWELL, B., BYLES, J., KEATING, J. and PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

Ship and Shipping—Marine Insurance—Ship sunk in Deep Water—General Average.

MARINE INSURANCE.—Where a ship with her cargo on board is sunk in deep water, so that ship and cargo are in common danger of destruction, and there is nothing to rebut the inference that the most convenient mode of saving either ship or cargo, or both, is by raising the ship together with the cargo, the shipowner, in considering whether there is a constructive total loss of the ship, on the ground that the cost of raising it will exceed its value when saved, is bound to take into account the fact that the outlay will be diminished by his claim for general average on the cargo and freight, which will be secured to him by a lien on the cargo, if recovered.

Error from the decision of the Queen's Bench (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 233).

The facts are contained in the special case which is set out at length in the report of the decision of the Queen's Bench. It will be sufficient to say that the Chebucto, the vessel insured, sustained a general average loss at sea and put back into Falmouth harbour, where she was partially repaired. While lying moored to the pier she was sunk by a hurricane, at a place where at low water there was a depth of twenty-two feet and at high water a depth of forty feet. A few days afterwards, and after the plaintiff had sent notice of abandonment to the insurers, the ship's agents, without his authority, raised the ship with her cargo on board. The value of the cargo which sank in the ship and which was raised in her was, when raised, 1,750*l.* The amount of the whole freight by the charter-party was 475*l.*, and upon the portion of goods sunk 237*l.* 10*s.*; the whole net freight was 75*l.* The jury, in answer to questions put to them, found that there was a constructive total loss of the vessel when the notice of abandonment was given, and at the time when the vessel lay moored after being raised. In putting these questions to the jury, no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in a general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel or towards the general average loss at sea, and it was taken as a fact that if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation, and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of the general average to be so contributed, then that there was not a constructive total loss. The Court of Appeal were to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury would be entitled to do.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first whether the plaintiff, under the above circumstances, was entitled to recover on the policy for an absolute total loss, as distinguished from a constructive total loss; and if the Court answered this question in the negative, then, secondly, whether it was material in determining the question of constructive total loss, to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make a general average contribution towards the expenses of raising the ship, or towards the general average loss at sea. The third question is omitted, as it was not touched upon by the judgment of the Court in error. After argument in the Queen's Bench, Blackburn, J., dissenting from Shee, J., gave judgment for the defendant. Shee, J., thereupon withdrew his judgment, and the plaintiff appealed.

At the commencement of the argument

Cohen, for the defendant, intimated that he did not intend to press any question relating to the general average loss at sea.

Watkin Williams, for the plaintiff.—The decision of the Court below was wrong. In the first place the assured are not entitled to general average from the owners of the cargo, for general average can only be claimed where expenses are voluntarily incurred for the purpose of avoiding a danger threatening the whole of the ship and cargo—Benecke's Principles of Indemnity in Marine Insurance, edit. 1824, p. 165. Here the vessel was raised without the consent of the owners; the cargo was not in danger, and any benefit which it received was the result of accident, not of intention. Two leading cases on this subject are Job v. Langton (6 El. & B. 779; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 97) and Moran v. Jones (7 Ibid. 523; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 187). In the first of these cases a ship had stranded, and the cargo having been removed, expense was incurred in getting her off. It was held, that general average could not be charged on the cargo. In the second case, where the landing of the goods was part of the continuous operation of removing the vessel, the claim for general average was upheld. Secondly, it is submitted there was a constructive total loss of the vessel. In the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the Court below, his Lordship, after stating that the rule as to steps to be taken by the assured for the recovery of the subject-matter of the insurance, is to find what a prudent uninsured owner would do, comes to the conclusion that the fact that cargo would be saved and would contribute to the expense, is an important element in deciding whether it would be reasonable to raise a vessel; citing the cases of Irving v. Manning (1 H.L. Cas. 287, 306), Moss v. Smith (9 Com. B. Rep. at p. 103; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. at p. 228) and Rosetto v. Gurney (11 Com. B. Rep. at p. 186; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. at p. 261). But it is submitted that the rule so stated is not a sound one. If the shipowner could sell the hull where it happens to lie on advantageous terms, he would not care whether the ship were worth the cost of repairs or not. The true test is, is the hull worth the expenditure necessary to bring it back to the condition of a ship? The special circumstances in which the owner is placed ought wholly to be disregarded; the question is, has there been a total loss of the ship? not, how much is the owner out of pocket by the disaster? The master, within reach of the shippers, had no right to impose a charge upon the cargo. The rule that where a ship is restored to the assured there is no total loss, only applies to cases of capture and recapture. And the better opinion is, that recapture does not avail the underwriters unless the ship is restored in only a slightly damaged state. He cited Hamilton v. Mendes (2 Burr. 1198), Bainbridge v. Nelson (10 East, 329), Smith v. Robertson (2 Dow, 474), Benecke on the Principles of Indemnity in Marine Insurance, p. 215, and Phillips on Insurance, section 1545.

Cohen, for the defendant.—There was no constructive total loss of the Chebucto when she first sank; and if there had been, the loss did not remain total at the time of action brought. It is hardly asserted that there was an absolute total loss. It cannot be said in the words of Arnould on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit. 885, that there was ever an effective privation of the spes recuperandi. There is no distinction on this part of the subject between a loss by capture, or by any other disaster. It is laid down in Phillips on Insurance, s. 1527, that submersion does not by itself in all cases authorize the abandonment of a ship; and that the real question is whether the vessel can be raised and repaired at a reasonable expenditure of time and money. In section 1594 it is said that if the ship is raised, repaired and restored to the assured, and the expense of salvage and repairs paid by him, the loss ceases to be total. Here the assured could have taken possession of the ship without being liable to a salvage suit, as the claim for salvage was forfeited according to section 450. of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

The distinction between the law of England and America as to a constructive total loss is pointed out by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the Court below. There can be no doubt but that the cargo was liable to general average. It was quite as much in danger as in the ordinary case where expenses are incurred in unshipping and warehousing it. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the cargo could have been lifted up in a cheaper way. During the last 100 years, wherever ship and cargo have simultaneously been saved, the Court of Admiralty has always equally apportioned the salvage. He cited Knight v. Faith (15 Q.B. Rep. 649; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 509), King v. Walker (2 H. & C. 384; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 325), Farnworth v. Hyde (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 835; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 207), Hunt v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (5 M. & S. 47), Castellain v. Thompson (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 105; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 79), Atkinson v. Woodall (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 174), Lozano v. Janson (2 El. & B. 160; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 337), Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit. 824, 920, 921, Maclachlan on Shipping, 375, Bailey on Average, 138-150, Parsons on Maritime Law, 403, and Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, 796.

Watkin Williams, in reply.—The case of Hamilton v. Mendes (2 Burr. 1198) has, no doubt, decided that the assured cannot recover for a total loss where his property has been restored to him at the time of action brought. But this case and later ones were cases of capture, where the assured had resumed possession of the vessels insured. Here, however, the assured never attempted to take possession of the ship after it had been raised. The jury besides have found that as a reasonable man he was not bound to retake possession. The ship had no claim to a general average contribution from the cargo, because it was not raised for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Was not the shipowner bound, if practicable, to raise the ship and prosecute the voyage?]

There is nothing to shew that this was, under the circumstances, the best course.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Willes, J., Channell, B., Keating, J., Pigott, B. and Montague Smith, J.) was, on the 10th of May, delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—In this case we affirm the judgment for the defendant, and give the same answer to the two questions in the special case as was given by the Court below, being of opinion, first, that there was no absolute total loss, and, secondly, that it was material in determining the question of constructive total loss to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make general average contribution towards the expenses of the ship. The real dispute was confined to the second question; and although the case has been argued with remarkable learning, both here and in the Court below, yet our decision turns upon inference of fact from the statement in the special case more than upon any point of law. We do not lay down a rule that all claims for contributions to the ship from any other interest ought to be taken into account in determining whether the ship was worth raising. But we hold that the plaintiff, in considering whether the submersion of his ship containing cargo, as stated in the case, was a constructive total loss, was bound to take into his estimate the fact that cargo would be saved by the operation which raised the ship, and would contribute to the expense thereof, and that the circumstances which would go to increase or diminish the outlay required for raising and repairing the ship, and the circumstances which would go to increase or diminish the benefit to be derived from that outlay, are elements in calculating whether the cost of raising would exceed the value when saved.

We infer from the statement in the case that there was a common peril of destruction imminent over ship and cargo as they lay submerged; that the most convenient mode of saving either ship or cargo, or both, was by raising the ship together with the cargo; that the expense required for such raising would be an extraordinary expense for the common benefit of both; that the cargo would be liable to a general average contribution towards that expense, and that the shipowner would have a lien on the cargo to secure the payment of that general average. If these facts are properly inferred from the statement in the special case, it follows that the plaintiff in calculating the cost of raising was bound to take into his estimate the contribution which would become due to him from the cargo secured to him by a lien thereon, and if so, the special case provides that the defendant should succeed.

If the case had not been so stated, and we had to apply the common rule, we should consider that a prudent owner uninsured would calculate on the amount of the general average contribution inseparably connected with the raising of the ship and safely secured with as much reliance as if he could calculate on the value of the ship itself when repaired, it being clear that all the items, both of cost and value, upon which the owner is to make his calculation when electing between repairing or abandoning, are subject to contingency and matter of conjecture only.

In this decision we have adopted the principle upon which Mr. Justice Blackburn relied below, and we refer to his judgment for a more ample statement of that principle in the application of it to this case.

Baron Martin and Mr. Justice Willes desire me to say that, in their opinion, the judgment ought to be for a new trial, on the ground that the facts are not sufficiently stated so as to enable the Court to pronounce judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Railway—Land adjoining Surplus Land acquired by Railway Company—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 18. s. 127).

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—By section 217. of 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcii. (a section in almost the same words as the Lands Clauses Act, section 127.) it is provided that if the company do not sell within the period of ten years the superfluous lands not required by them for the purposes of their act, then such lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period shall thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same. The company became amalgamated with others; and the new company, after the period of ten years had expired, obtained an extension act, which provided that the respective periods by the several acts relating to the company limited for the sale of their superfluous lands should be extended for five years from the passing of the act, and those several acts should be read and construed as if that period had been fixed by each of those acts for that purpose":—Held, first, that the obligation to re-sell the surplus and applied to reversions or other partial interests in land acquired by the company as well as to property in which they had acquired the fee simple; secondly, that the words of the section extending the time for the re-sale could not be construed so as to defeat the vested rights which had arisen from the lapse of the time allowed for the re-sale.

The Court of Queen's Bench having decided that the surplus land forfeited by the company must be apportioned among the adjoining owners according to a line drawn from the point where their boundaries met to the nearest point of the land actually used by the company,—Held, by the Exchequer Chamber, that this mode of apportionment was wrong, and that the land ought to be divided among the owners of the adjoining properties in proportion to the frontage of each, that is, the length of the line of contact of each property, if the line were made straight from the point of intersection of the boundaries on one side, to the point of intersection of the boundaries on the other.

Error from the Queen's Bench.

The special case, with a plan of the premises, will be found in the report of the decision of the Queen's Bench (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 166).

The action was an ejectment, brought by the plaintiff as surviving trustee of land adjoining to that sought to be recovered. The defendants, the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, defended for the whole, as did the other defendants, who occupied the lands.

By 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcii. the Croydon and Epsom Railway Company was incorporated for the purpose of making a railway from the London and Croydon Railway at Croydon to Epsom. By section 216. the surplus land not required for the purposes of the company was to be sold and conveyed within ten years after the passing of the act. By section 217. (a section in almost the same words as section 127. of the Lands Clauses Act, 8 Vict. c. 18) it was enacted that if the company did not sell such superfluous lands within the period aforesaid, then such lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period should thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto, in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same.

By 9 & 10 Vict. c. cclxxxiii., reciting that by virtue of 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcvi. the London and Croydon Railway Company had purchased the Croydon and Epsom line, the London and Epsom companies were dissolved, and the powers, privileges, rights, lands, &c. granted to them were vested in the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company.

Evidence was given at the trial that the land in question was within the limits of deviation of the Croydon and Epsom Company, and, with a slight exception, scheduled in their special act. Proof was also given that a portion of this land was sold to the company and occupied by their tenants at the time of the passing of the act, and that they had by some means acquired the reversion in the other portion without disturbing the tenant.

By section 28. of 26 & 27 Vict. c. cxcii., an extension act obtained by the London and Brighton Company, "the respective periods by the several acts relating to the company limited for the sale of their superfluous lands are hereby respectively extended for five years from the passing of this act, and those several acts shall be read and construed as if that period had been fixed by each of those acts for that purpose."

It appeared that the boundary of the plaintiff's land adjoined the surplus land in question in a line running north of the railroad and almost parallel to it, while the eastern boundary of this surplus land was property belonging to a Mr. Turner, which adjoined it in a curved line.

The judgment of the Court below, delivered by Blackburn, J., was to the effect, first, that a reversion or other partial interest in land acquired by the company under their compulsory powers was as much within the section limiting the time for re-sale as a fee simple in possession; secondly, that the section extending the time for such re-sale could not be construed so as to be retrospective, and to defeat vested rights acquired by the laches of the company, and that the principle to be adopted in ascertaining the proportion in which the land in question would vest in the plaintiff and Mr. Turner, was to draw a line from the point where the boundaries of the two adjoining owners met to the nearest point of the works of the company.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Bovill (Denman and Hannen with him), for the appellants.—The judgment of the Court below was wrong. The plaintiff did not distinctly shew the boundary of the land which he sought to recover, as he was bound to do. In Doe d. Hellyer v. King (6 Exch. Rep. 791; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 301), an ejectment by tenants in common, where the exact number of the tenants in common could not be given at the trial, it was held that the case must be sent back for a new trial, as the onus probandi was on the plaintiff; secondly, the act obtained by the company for the extension of the time for re-sale affords a defence to the action. In Cobbett v. Sir George Grey (4 Exch. Rep. 729; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 187) it was held, that a plea in bar, justifying under a statute which affords a defence arising subsequently to the commencement of the action, is good after verdict. The Proprietors of the Edinburgh and Dalkeith Railway Company v. Wauchope (8 Cl. & F. 710) decides that any one, interested in the subject-matter of a private act of parliament, will have his rights affected by its provisions, though it may have been introduced and passed without notice duly given to him. The words of the section clearly apply to a re-sale under the powers of the special act.—He then proceeded to argue against the mode of apportionment adopted in the Court below.

Baylis (Mellish and Murphy with him), for the respondents, relied upon the arguments used in the Court below.

Cur. adv. vult.

ERLE, C.J. now (May 10) delivered the judgment of the Court.¹—In this case we affirm that part of the judgment of the Court below which decides that the defendants have no defence under the statute 26 & 27 Vict. c. cxcii. s. 28, extending the time for the sale of the superfluous lands for five years, for the reasons there assigned. We also affirm that part of the judgment which decides that section 216. of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcii. extends to lands of which the reversion had been purchased subject to a term, also for reasons therein assigned.

With respect to the part of the judgment relating to the practical application of the 216th section to the land, we have found difficulty in construing the enactment, that the superfluous lands shall vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining, in proportion to the extent of the lands adjoining thereto. We cannot lay down a rule that a straight line should be drawn from the point where the boundaries of two adjoining owners meet to the nearest point of the land actually used by the company for their works, and that the portions of superfluous land on each side of that line should vest in the respective owners on whose lands they abutted. In the case of superfluous land, surrounded by lands of adjoining owners, each owner would be entitled to a portion, though the line defining some portions might be drawn in a direction from, instead of to, the works of the railway company. But, notwithstanding any difficulty, we are bound to construe and apply the statute, and we do so as follows: Where there are several adjoining properties in contact with the superfluous land in question, we think it should be divided among the owners of such adjoining properties in proportion to the frontage of each; and by frontage we mean what would be the length of the line of contact of each property if such line were made straight from the point of intersection of the boundaries on one side, to the point of intersection of the two boundaries on the other side.

To exemplify an application of this principle, we assume a piece of superfluous land, bounded by the railway on the south, and that the line of contact as above described of the owner adjoining it on the north is twenty feet long, and that the line of contact as above described of each of the owners on the east and west is ten feet long; the owner on the north would take a half, and each of the other owners a quarter. Each owner would take a triangular piece, having the assumed straight line of contact for its base. If this principle is applied to the present case, it may be that Mr. Turner, on the east, has, in substance, as much as he is entitled to; at all events, we have not the data to correct this apportionment if it is wrong. But on the west it is found in the case that the land coloured brown on the plan does not belong to the plaintiff or to the defendant, therefore neither party in the cause has any claim either to this land or in respect thereof, though if we had to draw the western boundary of the plaintiff's portion of the part coloured red, he is not entitled to more than would be to the east of a straight line from the south-west angle of his boundary line, to the nearest point of the railway works. According to the principle of the judgment below, this would take off a portion allotted to him in that judgment; but we consider that the statute gives a title to each of the adjoining owners at the time when it comes into operation, and that all land has an owner, and that therefore the land coloured brown has an owner, and that such owner has a title to a portion on the west on the above principle, and that the plaintiff has no title to such last-mentioned portion; and therefore, as the plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, the decision in the Court below, on this special case, for the plaintiff ought to be restricted in the manner here laid down in respect of a further portion of the land coloured red, lying on the western side of the superfluous land in question, which is represented on the plan as coloured red.

Judgment below affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Bankrupt—Petition in Forma Pauperis—Adjudications, Relation of—Goods in Possession, Order or Disposition of Bankrupt at Time of Arrest.

BANKRUPTCY.—Section 103. of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, which enacts, that

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B. and Keating, J.

"every adjudication against any prisoner for debt so brought up as aforesaid shall, unless the Court shall otherwise direct, have relation back to the date of his commitment or detention, as the case may be, shall be as valid and effectual for all purposes as if it had been made under any other of the provisions of this act," has reference to petitioners petitioning in forma pauperis, and brought up and adjudicated bankrupts under sections 98. and 99.

A debtor having been arrested under a ca. sa. and lodged in prison, petitioned in forma pauperis, under section 98, and was adjudicated a bankrupt under section 99. Goods which were in the apparent order and disposition of the bankrupt at the time of his arrest, by the consent of the true owner, were seized by the true owner after the first day of the imprisonment, and before the bankrupt filed his petition. At the time of the seizure the true owner had notice of the arrest and imprisonment. The bankrupt's assignee brought an action against the true owner for the conversion of the goods, and an order was made for the sale of them, under section 125. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106:—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court below), that section 103. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 6. applied to the case of this debtor, who was "brought up" within the meaning of that section, and operated so that the goods passed to the bankrupt's assignee; since the effect of the section was to render the adjudication as complete as if it had been made on the first day of the imprisonment.

Held, also, that sections 98.—103. formed a distinct chapter in the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and were to be read with reference to 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 57 (repealed), and that to sections 98.—103. section 133. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, had no application; so that whether the seizure of the goods by the true owner was or was not a bona fide transaction, without notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, within section 133. of the act of 1849, that section did not apply to the present case.

Quære—Whether a prisoner, against whom an adjudication is made by the Registrar, under section 101. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, is a "prisoner for debt so brought up as aforesaid," within the meaning of section 103.

The following CASE was stated pursuant to section 39. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, by way of appeal by the defendant, the appellant, from a rule of the Court of Queen's Bench, discharging a rule to shew cause, which was granted on the 5th of November, 1863, and which is hereafter set forth.

The action was brought by Bramwell (the respondent), as official assignee, &c., of C. G. Service, a bankrupt, against the defendant (the appellant).

The first count of the declaration was for the conversion, by the defendant, before Service became bankrupt, of certain goods (household furniture) belonging to Service. The second count was for the conversion, by the defendant, after Service became bankrupt, of the same goods belonging to the plaintiff as such official assignee.

The defendant pleaded, to both counts, not guilty, and, severally to each count, not possessed. Joinder of issue.

The cause came on to be tried, before Mellor, J., at the Durham Summer Assizes, 1863, when the following facts were proved:

The plaintiff is the official assignee of the estate and effects of one C. G. Service, a bankrupt, who before and up to the time of his arrest hereinafter mentioned carried on the business of a shipbroker at Sunderland, and the defendant at the time of the said arrest was the holder of a bill of sale, previously given to him by Service, upon the goods and chattels, claimed by the plaintiff in this action, as a security for divers sums of money, amounting with interest to 50l., advanced by the defendant to Service.

The bill of sale, bearing date the 22nd of October, 1862, was duly registered, and empowered the defendant to seize and sell the said goods and chattels upon default being made by Service in payment of the principal and interest, after demand made upon him by notice in writing. The bill of sale may be referred to as a part of this case.¹

At the time when the bill of sale was given the defendant also drew a bill of exchange, dated the same day (the 22nd of October, 1862), for 50*l.*, at four months, on account of the same debt, which Service accepted and the defendant at once indorsed over for value, and it was outstanding in the hands of other persons for value at the time the defendant seized the goods as hereinafter mentioned. This bill would become due on the 25th of February, 1863. Service remained in possession of the furniture, it being that of the house in which he and his wife lived, down to the time when he was arrested and committed to prison as hereinafter mentioned.

On the 12th of February, 1863, Service was arrested on a ca. sa., at the suit of a creditor, for 33*l.* 10*s.* He immediately informed the defendant of the fact of his arrest, and was advised by him to go to gaol, and petition the Court in forma pauperis, which he afterwards did. Service was lodged in Durham Gaol on the same day, of which the defendant had notice. On the 16th of February, about noon, the defendant, knowing Service was in gaol, left a notice in writing with Mrs. Service at their house, demanding payment of the money secured by the bill of sale; and the same evening he took possession of the furniture by putting a person in the house, and, afterwards, by a friendly arrangement with Mrs. Service, he locked the house up.

On the 18th of February Service filed his petition in forma pauperis (together with the proper affidavits), for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself in the County Court of Durham, under section 98. of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861; and on the 23rd of February he was brought up to the county court under the 99th section, and adjudicated a bankrupt, protection being granted, and an order made for his discharge from custody. He was discharged accordingly, and on his return home on the same day, Service first received actual notice of the defendant's demand for payment.

No creditors' assignee was appointed after the adjudication, and the plaintiff being the registrar of the Court became and remained official assignee, and, as such, demanded the furniture of the defendant; the defendant, however, retained possession, and on the 13th of March sold it. On the 8th of June this action was commenced, and on the 15th of June an order for the sale of the furniture was made by the county court Judge, under the 125th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

On the trial, at Durham, it was contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that Service having petitioned the Court in forma pauperis, and having, after being brought up before the county court Judge for adjudication upon such petition, been duly adjudicated a bankrupt by the said Judge, under the 99th section of the act, the said adjudication related back to the 12th of February, the date of his commitment to prison, by virtue of the 103rd section, and that the goods and chattels having been in the order and disposition of Service on that day, with the consent of the defendant, as the true owner thereof, the property therein passed by relation on that day to the plaintiff, as official assignee of the bankrupt's estate and effects.

For the defendant it was contended that the adjudication of bankruptcy against pauper petitioners did not, by virtue of the 103rd section, relate back to the date of their commitment to prison; that the operation of the 103rd section was confined to cases of recusant or contumacious prisoners within the 102nd section; and that, as there was no evidence that the bankrupt had brought himself within the 102nd section, or been adjudicated a bankrupt under it, the 103rd section had no application to his case. It was also further contended, on the part of the defendant, that, even on the assumption that the 103rd section did apply to the cases of bankrupts who had done no more than petition the Court in forma pauperis, and been thereupon adjudicated bankrupt, still the seizure of the said goods and chattels having been made by the defendant on the 16th of February, without notice of any prior act of bankruptcy committed by Service at the time of such seizure, and having therefore preceded the date of the petition on the 18th, and the date of the fiat on the 23rd of the same month, was a protected transaction, within the 133rd section of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849. The learned Judge reserved these and other points, and gave the defendant leave to move the Court of Queen's Bench to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant, and a verdict was in the mean time entered for the plaintiff, subject to the said point so reserved.

On the 5th of November, 1863, the defendant, in pursuance of the leave so reserved, obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered, or a verdict entered for the defendant on the ground that, on the evidence, the defendant was entitled to succeed, and on the 22nd of February, 1864, the Court of Queen's Bench discharged the rule to shew cause; and from this decision the defendant appeals.

The question for the Court of appeal is, whether the said rule of the 5th of November ought to have been discharged or ought to have been made absolute upon the said points hereinbefore stated, and so reserved as aforesaid, or upon either of them. The Court of appeal to make such rule upon this appeal as it shall think fit, and to proceed thereon, pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.²

Edward James (Levers with him), for the defendant.—The Court below was wrong in ordering that the rule should be discharged. It was argued in that court, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the words in section 103. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, "commitment or detention," refer to the 98th and 99th sections, and that they ought to be construed as meaning arrest on final

(2) The appellant's points were as follows: That assuming the bankruptcy to have dated from the arrest, the doctrine of reputed ownership does not apply to this case, the bankrupt having been at the alleged date of the bankruptcy the true owner of the goods, his ownership not being then terminated by a demand in writing. That assuming the date of the arrest to have been the date of bankruptcy, the seizure of the goods was a protected transaction within the 133rd section of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849, having been made without notice of any prior act of bankruptcy. That assuming the effect of the 133rd section to be limited to cases where acts of bankruptcy have been committed, the legislature intended, in the 103rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, to make the suffering a commitment or detention an act of bankruptcy, and that on this assumption also the seizure was a protected transaction within the 133rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, a prior notice of such act of bankruptcy having been an impossibility under the circumstances. The defendant, however, contends, that to construe the words "commitment or detention" to mean a commitment to prison or a detention in prison for debt, would, in cases where there had been a detention under a detainer subsequently to the original commitment, create two distinct dates of bankruptcy, an anomaly never intended by the legislature. That the object of the legislature in the 103rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, was to prevent the rights of the assignees from being prejudiced by the contumacy mentioned and provided for in the 102nd section, and that the true meaning of the words "commitment and detention" is this: the Court may, under the 102nd section, where a contumacious prisoner is reported by the Registrar, commit such prisoner to the common gaol of the county, and the Court may at the same time adjudge such prisoner bankrupt; but this power is discretionary, and may not be exercised all at once. The Court may omit on the first occasion to commit him, and simultaneously adjudge him bankrupt. In such cases the prisoner would be detained where he was, i. e. in the debtors' prison, and any subsequent adjudication would relate to the date of such detention; or again, the Court may commit him at once and postpone the adjudication of bankruptcy. In that case the subsequent adjudication would relate to the date of such commitment; but in either case, and however the Court may exercise its discretion, the date of the bankruptcy would be the same, however differently described, and the title of the assignees would be protected to the same extent in either case from the consequence of contumacy on the part of the prisoner.

The respondent's points were, that the adjudication of bankruptcy relates back to the date of the commitment to prison under section 103. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt at that date. And further, that the 133rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, has no application to this case, and does not protect the seizure.

Sections 98.—103. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. are set out in 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 131.

process or detention; but it is submitted the 103rd section only applies to the case of prisoners brought up for contumacy before the county court Judge, as provided for by the 102nd section. The Court below admitted that the 102nd section did not provide in express terms that contumacious prisoners should be "brought up" before the county court Judge; but they thought that as the county court Judge was empowered to send them to the common gaol with hard labour, the legislature intended that they should be "brought up" for the purpose of being heard in their own defence. There is no difficulty therefore created, as regards the defendant's construction, by the words "brought up." On the other hand, on the plaintiff's construction, there is this palpable inconsistency—that the section is made to apply exclusively to pauper petitioners "brought up," under the 99th section, before the county court Judge, and not to pauper petitioners discharged and adjudicated bankrupt by the Registrar; for the 99th section says, "if not previously discharged by the Registrar," so that the bankruptcy of pauper petitioners "brought up" before the county court Judge would be held to relate back to the date of their arrest, and the bankruptcies of pauper petitioners discharged by the Registrar relating back to the fourteenth day of their imprisonment, as provided for by the 101st section, taken in connexion with the 71st section. The key to the true construction of the 103rd section is suggested by the analogous provisions of the 71st section. By that section the bankruptcy of a trader lying in prison dates from the fourteenth day of imprisonment, and of a non-trader from the expiration of two months; whereas in the case of prisoners who do not conform, and who effect their escape from prison, the bankruptcy dates from the time of their arrest. So here, in the case of prisoners who conform, their bankruptcy dates from the fourteenth day or the expiration of three months (otherwise why should the power of the Registrar be limited by the 101st section to prisoners who had committed acts of bankruptcy by lying in prison?); but in the case of prisoners who prove contumacious, the bankruptcy is made, by the 103rd section, to relate back to their arrest by way of penalty for their contumacious conduct. The mere collocation of the 103rd section, coming, as it does, immediately after the 102nd section (and for which the Court below admitted that they could not suggest any satisfactory reason upon the plaintiff's construction of the words) shews clearly that the 102nd, and not the 99th section, was before the mind of the legislature when enacting this section. But even if this adjudication does relate back to the commencement of the imprisonment, the defendant is protected by the 133rd section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, which is unrepealed—Graham v. Furber (14 Com. B. Rep. 134; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 51), Conway v. Nall (1 Ibid. 643; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 165) and Edwards v. Gabriel (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 113).

Mellish (Quain with him) was requested to confine himself to the second point, viz., the effect of the 133rd section of the act of 1849 upon bankruptcies under these sections—Section 133. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, has no application to the present case. The scope of sections 98.—103. of the act of 1861, which form a code distinct from the rest of the Bankruptcy law, may be perceived from comparing the enactments under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. ss. 57-59, relating to insolvent debtors. The legislature there appeared to think that there was no injustice in saying to all persons, "If you choose to deal with a person who is a prisoner in actual custody, you must do so at your peril."³ This being the law, on drawing the code of 1861, these clauses may have suggested to the framers that there were some cases to which the laws affecting insolvent prisoners might properly be applied. This is the explanation of section 103. of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861. It was urged on the other side that that section was designed as a punishment of the prisoner; but that is quite a mistake. It is to be taken

(3) By section 57. goods in the prisoner's apparent ownership at the time of his arrest or other commencement of his imprisonment were vested in the assignee, and there was no protection whatever for bona fide transactions without notice.

(from the intimation of the Court) as established that that section includes the case of prisoners petitioning under section 98. Is it not most consistent with that to hold that the intention of the act was to draw the dividing line between the rights of the official assignee and the rights of a private creditor at the first day of imprisonment?—(He was then stopped.)

Leuvers, in reply.—It is admitted that if sections 98.—103. of the act of 1861 form a distinct code, the 133rd section of the act of 1849 has no application; but they must be construed with reference to the act of 1849. It was only by virtue of the 125th (the reputed ownership) section of the act of 1849 that the assignee had even a colourable title to the goods. That section always was qualified by the 133rd section of the same act, and the result of holding the 98th to the 103rd sections of the act of 1861 to be a distinct code would be to give the 125th section of the act of 1849 a different operation in the case of those bankruptcies from what it had in ordinary bankruptcies. Again, if these sections formed a separate code, why is it that the 101st section limited the jurisdiction of the Registrar to the cases of prisoners who have committed acts of bankruptcy by lying fourteen days or two months in prison, as provided by the 71st section? If bankruptcies under these sections were to relate to the date of the arrest, no reason can be suggested why the jurisdiction of the Registrar should be limited to persons who had lain fourteen days or two months in prison, as provided by the 101st section? Why should the Registrar, on the plaintiff's construction, not have been empowered to deal with prisoners who had lain one day in prison? Besides, the concluding words of the 103rd section are adverse to the plaintiff's contention that these sections are to be construed solely by themselves. The concluding words of the section are, "shall be as valid and effectual for all purposes as if it had been made under any other of the provisions of this act." The extent of the operation of these bankruptcies must therefore be deduced from the other provisions of the act; and yet the plaintiff asked the Court to close its eyes to all other parts of this or any other act. In truth, the plaintiff claims for these bankruptcies a more extensive operation than ordinary bankruptcies have, in contravention of the clear meaning of the legislature, because the legislature, in enacting that these bankruptcies should be "as valid and effectual" as other bankruptcies, by implication enacted that they should not have any higher or more extensive validity, on the principle, unius expressio est exclusio alterius. There is internal evidence, therefore, in these sections that they are not to be construed solely by themselves; but that they must be construed with reference and subject to the rest of the Bankrupt Law. Assuming that the Court is satisfied on this point, the seizure of the goods was clearly a protected transaction, under the 133rd section of the act of 1849. This is clear under the principles of Edwards v. Gabriel (31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 113) and Conway v. Nall (1 Ibid. 643; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 165). Notice of the arrest could not be "notice of a prior act of bankruptcy," within the meaning of that section, so as to deprive the defendant of the protection given by that section.

ERLE, C.J.—We are unanimous in thinking that we ought to affirm the judgment of the Court below on both points. We think that section 103. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, applies to a prisoner brought up as the bankrupt was in this case. Section 98, and the following sections of that act, relate to adjudications of bankruptcy against paupers, prisoners for debt; and we think that section 103. goes back so as to relate to all petitioners, so far as it is possible for it to apply, that come under this chapter of the statute, and we read these sections as forming a separate and distinct chapter in the statute. Section 103. applies to every "prisoner for debt so brought up as aforesaid." It is not necessary to decide whether these words apply to prisoners brought up before the county court Judge only, and not to those against whom an adjudication is made under section 101. by the Registrar, because this pauper is clearly "brought up" within these words.

As to the second point, the transaction in question was after the bankrupt was committed to prison, and before the adjudication. The defendant, the owner of the goods, took possession of them between the first day of the imprisonment and the day of adjudication of bankruptcy. Whether or not there is anything in the point of law that was raised, whether or not the taking possession of the goods by the defendant, with notice of the arrest, was a bona fide transaction, without notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, which would be protected under section 133. of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849—however that may be—the moment Mr. Mellish infused the idea that the distinction⁴ between the code relating to prisoners under the Insolvents' Act and the code relating to prisoners under the Traders' Act, might throw light on this statute, and that the statute is to be read with reference to both classes, I thought the legislature might well have intended that as to all pauper prisoners, whether insolvents or bankrupts, coming under the 98th and following sections, section 103. should apply, and that the effect of that section should be that the operation of the adjudication of bankruptcy should be as complete as if the bankrupt had been so adjudicated on the first day of his imprisonment. This construction gives the same effect to the clause in the Insolvents' Act (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 57), which enacts, that all property in the possession, order or disposition of the prisoner at the time of his arrest or other commencement of his imprisonment, with the consent of the true owner, shall pass to his assignee, and to the 103rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Now the words of that section are, "Every adjudication against any prisoner for debt so brought up as aforesaid, shall, unless the Court shall otherwise direct, have relation back to the date of his commitment or detention, as the case may be, and shall be as valid and effectual for all purposes as if it had been made under any other of the provisions of this act." I think that, giving effect to these words, in reference to the legislation before existing, the adjudication has full operation from the first day of the imprisonment, and gives to the creditors the right to the goods then in the order or disposition of the bankrupt.

Judgment for the respondent.

Practice—New Trial—Cause ordered to be tried in County Court—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 26.

COUNTY COURT.—A motion for a new trial in an action of contract, tried under Judge's order in a county court, must be made in the superior court in which the writ was issued.

This was an action for the price of certain goods, tried, under a Judge's order, according to 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108,¹ in the County Court of Bradford, on the 20th of April, 1866, when a verdict was given for the plaintiff.

Kennedy having obtained a rule nisi to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial had on the grounds, first, that the action was

(4) This distinction is clearly explained in the written judgment of Blackburn, J., 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 133-4.

(1) The following sections of the County Court Acts were referred to during the argument :
By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 89. every order and judgment of any Court holden under this act, except as herein provided, shall be final and conclusive between the parties; but the Judge shall have power to nonsuit the plaintiff in every case in which satisfactory proof shall not brought before credit expired; secondly, that the order for the goods was not complied with by the plaintiff; thirdly, that the quality of the goods ought to have been considered by the Judge,— Kemplay now shewed cause.—There is a preliminary objection to this rule, namely, that the application ought to have been made to the county court. The words of the section under which this case was tried, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 26, which enable orders to be made for causes to be tried in the county court, shew that the superior Courts are divested of all control over such a case as the order is made, and that any decision made in it afterwards can only be reviewed by the machinery of the county court. The section is very different from section 17. of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, which only substitutes the sheriff for the Judge at Nisi Prius.

[BLACKBURN, J.—After issue is joined nothing remains to be done but to try the cause.]

In Angel v. Ihler (5 Mee. & W. 600; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 8), where it was held that after trial of a writ of inquiry before the sheriff, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 17, execution could be stayed by the Court at Westminster, although the sheriff had refused to certify, the decision turned upon the special words of 1 Will. 4. c. 7. s. 19, which was incorporated in the former act.

[LUSH, J.—That section was only necessary to allow a new trial when judgment had been signed.]

In Breese v. Owens (6 Exch. Rep. 413; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 288: in error, 6 Exch. Rep. 916; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 359) it was held that a county court established under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. is not a Court of record to which a writ of trial can be directed under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 17. Those words in the section which direct the Registrar to certify the result of the trial to the Master's office, create another difficulty, for the Court ought not to interfere until the arrival of the certificate. In the case of a writ of inquiry a day certain is fixed for the return; here there is no such limit. In Wheatcroft v. Foster (El. B. & El. 737; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 277), where the order directing a cause to be tried in a county court was silent as to costs, it was held that the Master might tax the costs with reference to the County Court scale, Crompton, J. saying, that the case seemed to him very like a proceeding in a county court.

[BLACKBURN, J.—When a cause was tried in the court of the county palatine of Lancaster by virtue of a mittimus to the Justices of the Court, it was always the duty of the Court at Westminster to see that the issues were properly tried. There is nothing in this act to shew that the same supervising power is taken away.]

The County Court Acts have provided a special mode of application for a new trial, from which there was no intention to depart in a case like this.

Kennedy against the objection.—The words of the section giving jurisdiction to the county court merely relieve the superior Court from the burden of trying the cause. In all other respects the jurisdiction remains as before.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that the objection must be overruled. The question, which is one of considerable importance, is whether application for a be given to him entitling either the plaintiff or the defendant to the judgment of the Court, and shall also in every case whatever have the power, if he shall think fit, to order a new trial to be had upon such terms as he shall think reasonable, and in the mean time to stay the proceedings.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 26, Where in any action of contract brought in a superior Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed 50l., or where such claim, though it originally exceeded 50l., is reduced by payment into court, payment, admitted set-off or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding 50l., a Judge of a superior Court, on the application of either party after issue joined, may in his discretion and on such terms as he shall think fit, order that the cause be tried in any county court which he shall name, and thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge with the Registrar of such Court such order and the issue, and the Judge of such Court shall appoint a day for the hearing of the cause, notice whereof shall be sent by post or otherwise by the Registrar to both parties or their attorneys, and after such hearing the Registrar shall certify the result to the Master's office of such superior Court, and judgment in accordance with such certificate, may be signed in such superior Court.

new trial can be made to this Court in a cause tried before a county court Judge, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 26. The case appears to my Brother Mellor to be by no means a clear one, but my other two Brethren and myself have no difficulty. The ground which I adopt is, that the words of the section merely make provision for the trial of the cause, but do not extend to other proceedings. It is like a case tried in the county palatine of Lancaster, where it was one of the incidents of the trial that the superior Courts had a superintending power to set aside the verdict, if any miscarriage had happened. The question arises, what is there here to take away the superintending power of this Court? There is nothing in the statute by express terms to do this. There may be considerable difficulty, particularly where the Judge tries a case without a jury, in ascertaining the terms of his direction; but that difficulty cannot take away the superintending power of this Court. If the legislature had meant to say that this Court should not review such cases, they might have said that the county court Judge must dispose of them altogether. But what they have said is that the cause is to be tried in a county court, and that the Registrar is to certify the result to this Court. When the trial is over the jurisdiction of the County Court is terminated, and this Court resumes its control over the case by means of the Registrar. I therefore think the objection cannot be supported.

MELLOR, J.—I by no means dissent from the judgment of the Court, as I do not feel entire confidence in my construction of the act; all I say is, that the policy of the legislature seems to have been to have these cases tried in a county court, according to the practice in such courts, and not according to the course of common law. As to the words of section 26. of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, which provide that after the hearing of the cause the Registrar shall certify the result to the Master's office of the superior Court, and that judgment may be signed in accordance with such certificate, it has been contended that the verdict only is to be certified; but it seems to me that the effective result of the proceedings may possibly have been intended. I agree, however, that the words can bear two constructions: I am simply uncertain as to which I am to adopt. It is quite true that the express power of granting a new trial in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 89. applies only to plaints commenced in the county court, and that cases like the present one are only sent there after issue has been joined in the superior Court.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion as my Brother Blackburn. Section 89. of the first County Court Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, applies exclusively to plaints instituted under the provisions of that act, while section 26. of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. applies to cases commenced in the superior Courts and after issue is joined. This section, as it seems to me, merely intended to introduce a cheap and expeditious mode of trying certain cases. If the construction contended for by Mr. Kemplay were correct, and the provisions of the earlier act are to be altogether applicable to cases tried under section 26, those which relate to writs of certiorari would be useless, as the section orders the Registrar to forward the result of every case to this Court. With reference to these last three lines of the section directing the Registrar to certify the result of the trial, one would surely have expected if the whole of the act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, was to apply to them, that the words "unless a new trial shall have been ordered by the Judge" would have been added.

[LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, as I think that the jurisdiction of this Court is not taken away by the fact that it was sent for trial before a county court Judge. If it had been intended to deprive this Court of any jurisdiction, we should expect to find words indicating such an intention. But as I read the section, it merely vests in the county court Judge a jurisdiction to try the cause. When the case is tried, the Judge is functus officio, and in the same position as the sheriff after the execution of a writ of trial or a Commissioner of Assize, who tries by virtue of his commission, and not as a Judge. I therefore think that there is no ground for this objection.

Objection overruled.

REEVES AND ANOTHER v. WATTS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 171; L. R. 1 Q.B. 412; 14 L. T. 478; 14 W. R. 672; 7 B. & S. 523;
12 Jur. N.S. 565.

Referred to, M'Laren v. Baxter, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 247; 16 L. T. 521; 15 W. R. 1017 (C.P.). Followed, Solomon v. Laverick, 1868, 17 L. T. 545 (Ex.).

The Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, was repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83 s. 20.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.—Composition Deed—Parties to Deed—Covenant with all the Creditors—Creditor not named—Non-assenting Creditor.

BANKRUPTCY.—A composition deed under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, was expressed to be made between the debtor of the first part, and "all the creditors" of the debtor of the second part, whereby the debtor covenanted severally with the parties of the second part to pay a composition, in consideration of which the parties of the second part released the debtor from all debts, &c.:—Held, on the authority of Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74), that the deed was valid, and bound non-assenting creditors, since, though not named by name as parties, the description was such that they could be ascertained, and they could therefore, sue on the covenant.

The declaration was on a bill of exchange accepted by the defendant and indorsed to the plaintiffs.

Second plea—That before action the defendant had executed a composition deed under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which was made between the defendant of the first part, and all his creditors of the second part, and contained a release from all the said creditors' claims, &c., except the covenant for payment of the composition therein mentioned. The plea then averred performance of all things required by section 192, to make the deed binding upon non-executing creditors, and that the plaintiffs were creditors of the defendant within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

The second replication set out the deed, which was made between "A. Watts," the defendant, "of the first part, and all the creditors of the said A. W. of the second part," and by which, after reciting (inter alia) that the deed was intended "to operate equally for the benefit of and to bind all the creditors of the said A. W., whether they assent to them or not," and that A. W. was indebted to the parties thereto, of the second part in divers sums, which he was unable to pay in full; it was witnessed that A. W. covenanted "with the said several persons parties hereto of the second part respectively," that he would pay "unto the said several persons parties hereto of the second part, being all and every the present creditors of him the said A. W.," a composition of 10s. in the pound, by the instalments and at the times therein mentioned. And it was witnessed, further, that in consideration (inter alia) of the above covenant "the several creditors parties hereto of the second part respectively," did, and each of them did hereby release, &c., the said A. W. from all the debts, covenants, &c. (except the covenant for the payment of the said composition), which "the said several creditors, parties hereto of the second part respectively," or any of them, might claim of or from the said A. W. on account of the debts, &c. due to them from him. And it was further expressly declared, that "all the creditors of the said A. W." should be equally bound by and entitled to the benefit of these presents, although they might not assent thereto or approve thereof. In witness whereof "the said parties to these presents" have, &c.

The deed appeared to have been executed by only two persons, and the replication averred that they were two of the creditors of the defendant of the second part, and executed the deed; and, further, that the plaintiffs were not parties to, and did not execute the deed.

Demurrer to the replication, and joinder therein.

J. Brown (with him Eyre Lloyd), for the defendant, in support of the demurrer.—This deed binds non-assenting creditors. It is exactly similar to the deed in Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74), which concludes the question. The Court there held the deed good on the authority of Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 479).

[BLACKBURN, J.—We should be very sorry to upset such a salutary decision as Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74). If that case is applicable to the present, it is enough to bind us in this Court.]

This case is distinguishable from The Chesterfield Colliery Company v Hawkins (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 121; s. c. 3 Hurl. & C. 667).

C. H. Hopwood, for the plaintiff, in support of the demurrer.—This deed does not bind a non-assenting creditor, for he could not sue on the covenant, and since the two creditors who signed could sue, there is inequality. Unless Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74) was intended to overrule Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17) (which there is authority for saying it was not), the Court of Exchequer have been led into error; for they gave judgment in Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74) on the supposition that there was no distinction between that case and Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 479). It is contended there is a distinction. In the latter case Lay, the non-assenting creditor, was by implication named in the schedule, but neither in the present case nor in Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74) was the non-assenting creditor named in the schedule, for there was none. Therefore in Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 479) the Court had not the present point before them, and it is no authority against my proposition that on a deed inter partes a person must either be named nominatim or must seal, in order to be able to sue. This is established by Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17). In Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 479) there were means of ascertaining all the creditors.

[BLACKBURN, J.—But in fact they may perhaps not have been ascertained. From the judgment of Mr. Justice Willes, in Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 479), it appears that the Court had the present point before them. He says (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 487), “Mr. Philbrick says the deed is unreasonable and not binding on dissentient creditors, because no remedy is given them for the composition. But I think the case of Farrall v. Hilditch (5 Ibid. 840) furnishes a complete answer to that argument.”]

But it is apparent from the judgment of Byles, J. that the point was not raised before them. On the pleadings here it appears that there are only three creditors. The deed is limited to those who sign and seal. The end runs, “In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals;” and the creditors who do not execute are therefore excluded.

[BLACKBURN, J.—These words must not be allowed to control the whole of the deed, so as to defeat the intention to bind non-assenting creditors.]

The covenant is with “the said several persons parties hereto of the second part respectively.”

[BLACKBURN, J.—The parties of the second part are all the creditors. It all comes round to what the Lord Chief Baron said in Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74), “The only question is, whether the description of the persons with whom the covenant is made is not too vague.”]

In Ex parte Rawlings (32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 27) and Ex parte Godden (32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 37) the deeds were held invalid.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Neither of those cases have any bearing on the present point.]

In Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17) Lord Westbury said (see p. 20), "As the deed is between parties, no person who is not a party could sue upon the covenant." That case was implicitly followed in The Chesterfield Colliery Company v. Hawkins (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 128), for Martin, B. quotes the words, and says he feels bound by it.

[BLACKBURN, J.—That point has been treated as an obiter dictum.]

Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17) was again followed in Martin v. Gribble (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 111, per Pollock, C.B.). See also Ilderton v. Jewell (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 148), Lyne v. Wyatt (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 179) and Benham v. Broadhurst (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 61).

[BLACKBURN, J.—If you can produce any authority, except Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17) and Martin v. Gribble (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 111, per Pollock, C.B.) to shew that on a deed between a debtor and all his creditors, a non-assenting creditor could not sue, that would be material. The Chesterfield Colliery Company v. Hawkins (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 121; s. c. 3 Hurl. & C. 667) differs from this case. The technical rule of law there mentioned has no application to this case. The non-assenting creditors there were covenantees, but were not made parties to the deed either individually or in a class.]

In 2 Preston's Conveyancing, p. 394, it is said, "With reference to indentures between parties, it seems to be a general rule that no one can be considered as a party to a deed, unless he be named as a party in the clause containing the names of the persons who are formally made parties." So, in 8 Bythewood's Conveyancing, by Jarman (edit. 1832), it is said, "On the general principle that a stranger to a deed cannot take the benefit of it, covenants in an indenture, entered into with persons who are not parties confer no right of action on such persons; and where a deed is expressed to be made between parties, the persons so named alone are parties to the instrument." Would a party be considered to be named nominatim if he were a member of a firm which was named?

[BLACKBURN, J.—The Lord Chief Baron, in Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74), thought that on a covenant with a firm, the several members could sue.]

He cited, as to parties to deeds, Storey v. Gordon (3 M. & S. 308), Metcalf v. Rycroft (6 Ibid. 75), Salter v. Kidgley (Carth. 77), Scudamore v. Vandertene (2 Inst. 673), Berkeley v. Hardy (5 B. & C. 355), Lord Southampton v. Brown (6 Ibid. 718), Bushell v. Beavan (1 Bing. N.C. 120).

[BLACKBURN, J.—You have not produced any case which says that a person included in a description cannot sue; though no cases have been produced which assert the affirmative. You propose to add to the technical rules already existing one that a person cannot sue unless named by name.]

[J. Brown here referred to Maughan v. Sharpe (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 24), where it was held that a conveyance to the "City Investment and Advance Company" operated as a conveyance to two persons, who were the only members of the company. Williams, J. there said, "I apprehend it is settled that a grant may be good, though the grantee be not named by his christian name or surname. In Shep. Touch. 236, after stating the consequence of a mistake in the christian name or surname of the grantee, it is stated, 'And yet if the grant do not intend to describe the grantee by his known name, but by some other matter, there it may be good by a certain description of the person, without either surname or name of baptism'; and it is added, 'id certum est quod certum reddi potest.' I am of opinion that the meaning of the grant in this deed is to convey the goods to the persons using the style and name of the 'City Investment and Advance Company.' They may or may not be a corporation; but when it has been ascertained that the persons answering to that description are the defendants, the grant operates accordingly to convey the property to them."]

[BLACKBURN, J.—That is very much in point.]

It required the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 5. to enable a person to take benefit of a covenant in an indenture, where the taker was not "named a party" to the indenture.

J. Brown was not called on to reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this Court (whatever view might be taken in a Court of error, where the whole question might be reviewed), there can be no doubt that our judgment must be for the defendant, for we are bound by Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74); and even if we were at liberty to review it, I think the decision was right. We must follow that case, which is expressly in point. The matter was there fully argued; and the Court, having taken time to consider, say that the deed was good; and even if I thought that decision wrong, still we should be bound to follow it here. In Maughan v. Sharpe (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 24) Mr. Justice Williams's remarks are in favour of the position that on a deed inter partes one who is not named by name as a party, but is so described that he can be rendered certain, may sue; but whether that is right or not, we are bound by the recent case in the Exchequer, Gresty v. Gibson (35 L. J. Ex. 74).

Corporation—Contract not under Seal—Offer to return Goods before Action brought.

CORPORATION. POOR LAW.—The guardians of the B. union accepted a tender by the plaintiff for the supply of Ruabon and Aberdare coal for the use of the workhouse. The coal was from time to time accepted by the guardians from the plaintiff, of which that which purported to be Aberdare was, and that which purported to be Ruabon was only in part, according to the contract. The guardians, after consuming a part of each sort of coal, discovered an inferiority in the Ruabon coal, and required the plaintiff to take back the unconsumed portion of the Aberdare coal which was according to contract as well as the Ruabon which was not, and offered before action to return it to him:—Held, that the fact that the contract was not under the seal of the guardians was no defence to an action for the price of the Aberdare coal.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered, on the 23rd of May, by—

BLACKBURN, J.—This was a case argued at the sittings after last term, before my Brother Lush and myself. The facts were, that the guardians of the Bradfield Union had advertised for tenders for the supply of Ruabon and Aberdare coals, for the use of the workhouse. The plaintiff, amongst others, sent in his tender for 70 tons Ruabon coals at 21s. 9d., and 60 tons of Aberdare coals at 22s. 3d. per ton; and on the 21st of June, 1864, by a resolution of the board of guardians made at a board meeting duly held, his tender was accepted, and on the 22nd of June the clerk of the guardians wrote to inform the plaintiff of this, and requested him to call with his sureties and execute the formal contract. This contract was in the form of a deed purporting to be made between the plaintiff of the one part and the guardians of the poor of the Bradfield Union of the other. The plaintiff attended and executed the deed, but not having brought his sureties with him, the execution by the guardians was postponed till he had procured them. He did afterwards procure his sureties to execute the bond, but, first, on account of some informality, and afterwards in consequence of some dispute, the seal of the guardians was never in fact affixed to the contract. Both parties, however, acted in the interval as if the contract had been formally executed. The plaintiff sent to the workhouse in pursuance of orders properly given to him four parcels of coals, for the price of which he brought this action. Two of these parcels, delivered on the 28th and 30th of June, amounting together to 21 tons, were ordered and supplied as Aberdare coals. The price of these at the contract price amounts to 23l. 7s., and in fact they were such coals as by the contract ought to have been supplied as Aberdare coals. Two other parcels were sent in as Ruabon coals, one lot of 15 tons 9 cwt., on the 1st of July, which really were Ruabon coals, such as by the contract ought to have been supplied as Ruabon coals, and another lot of 7 tons 8 cwt., on the 2nd of July, which were not in fact Ruabon coals at all, and not such as to satisfy the contract. The two parcels delivered as Ruabon coals were shot into the same heap, so that, in consequence of the plaintiff's fault, the coal of the 1st of July, which was according to contract, and that of the 2nd of July, which was not, got mixed together.

On the 2nd of August the plaintiff sent in his account for the whole of these coals, amounting to 48*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, being the amount he would have been entitled to under the contract if the coals had all been according to contract. About 6 tons of the Aberdare coals were used in the workhouse, and about 6 tons of the coal, delivered in July, which consisted partly of Ruabon coal and partly of inferior coal mixed with it, were consumed in the workhouse before the inferiority of the last lot was fully brought to the notice of the board of guardians. On the 17th of August, the clerk of the guardians, by their authority, wrote to the plaintiff, requiring him to take back the whole of the coals, making no distinction between the Aberdare coals supplied in June, which were in fact according to the contract, and the Ruabon coals supplied in July, which were not in fact according to the contract. The plaintiff refused to take back any, and brought his action for the whole sum of 48*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*

It is clear that the plaintiff cannot be in a better position than if the contract had been executed by the defendants. By the terms of the contract the guardians were to be at liberty, in case the articles delivered were not of the quality and sort contracted for, to return the same at the expense of the contractor, or give notice for the same to be sent for and fetched away; and to obtain a supply elsewhere and charge the contractor with the extra cost of this supply. It is clear, therefore, that the defendants had a right to require the plaintiff to take away so much of the coals remaining as were not according to contract; and we think that as the two parcels sent in in July were mixed together, so that the heap was partly Ruabon and partly not, the whole of these coals must be considered as not according to the contract, though had they been kept separate, one parcel would have been according to contract. The plaintiff cannot therefore, in any view, recover for the price of so much of these latter coals as were not consumed; and the defendants are also entitled to charge him with the extra cost of the supply of coal in their place; and the six tons of this inferior mixture which were actually used cannot be charged for at the full contract price. The plaintiff, therefore, cannot recover for the whole sum he claims.

But the defendants had no right under the contract to require the plaintiff to remove the portion of the Aberdare coals, which in August still remained unconsumed, those coals having been delivered in June, and being in all respects according to the contract. There is indeed a term in the contract that a proper bill of parcels shall be delivered with each lot of goods sent in, or the guardians may reject them; and it appears that the bills of parcels for the Aberdare coal were not sent in till some time after the delivery; but, though this would have entitled the defendants to refuse to receive the goods so sent in, and, probably to send back the whole if inadvertently taken in, provided they did so promptly, it did not authorize them to return a part of the goods so sent in, especially after such a lapse of time. The plaintiff, therefore, if the contract had been sealed with the seal of the corporation, would have been entitled to recover, but not the whole of his demand. At the time of the argument the amount of the deductions were calculated, and it appeared he would be entitled to 26*l.* 10*s.*

There remains, therefore, only the question, whether the fact that the defendants are a corporation and that the contract was not under their seal makes any difference as to the whole or part of this demand. Mr. Harington argued that the price of those coals which still remained unconsumed, and which the corporation were ready and willing and offered before action to return, stood on a different footing from the price of the portion consumed, and that, as to those at least, the plaintiff could not recover; but we think that there is no such distinction. We think that if the defendants are bound to pay for any of the coals as goods sold and delivered, their liability was fixed as soon as the coals, being according to contract, were received, so that there remained nothing to be done but to pay for them; and that this liability could not be got rid of by any subsequent offer to return the coals which the plaintiff was not bound under the contract to accept, and which, if he had at that time accepted, would by no means have put him in the same position as if the goods had never been kept by the defendants. We think, therefore, that the only question is, whether the absence of a sealed contract does, under such circumstances prevent the plaintiff from recovering.

It is not necessary to express any opinion as to what might have been the case if the plaintiff had been suing on this contract for a refusal to accept the coals, or any other breach of the contract, whilst still executory, or how far the principle of The London Dock Company v. Sinnott (8 El. & B. 347; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 129) would then have applied to such a contract. The goods in the present case have actually been supplied to and accepted by the corporation; they were such as must necessarily be from time to time supplied for the very purposes for which the body was incorporated; and they were supplied under a contract, in fact, made by and with the managing body of the corporation. If the defendants had been an unincorporated body, nothing would have remained but the duty to pay for them. We think that the body corporate cannot, under such circumstances, escape from fulfilling that duty, merely because the contract was not under seal. The case of Clarke v. the Cuckfield Union (21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 349) is in its facts undistinguishable from the present case. We are aware that very high authorities have questioned the soundness of that decision, and, as pointed out in the judgment in that case, there are prior decisions in the Court of Exchequer which it is difficult to reconcile with it. We think, however, that, as far as it extends to such a case as the present at least, the case was rightly decided. There may be cases in which the circumstances are different from those in Clarke v. the Cuckfield Union (21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 349) and the present case, and which would still be governed by the principles laid down in the decisions in the Exchequer. Those we leave to be decided when they arise; but so far as these prior decisions are inconsistent with the decision in Clarke v. the Cuckfield Union (21 Law L. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 349), we prefer to follow that authority, which we think founded on justice and convenience. We therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for 26l. 10s.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Reward—Apprehension of Offender—Information leading to.

ADVERTISEMENT.—The defendant's shop having been broken into and watches and other property having been stolen, he offered a reward to be given "to any person who will give such information as shall lead to the apprehension and conviction of the thief or thieves." Shortly afterwards R. brought one of the watches to the plaintiff, who gave information to the defendant, in consequence of which R. was apprehended with another of the watches in his possession. While in custody, he told the police where the thieves might be found, and they were taken at that place with some of the stolen property upon them, and were subsequently convicted of the burglary. In an action to recover the amount of the reward,—Held, by Mellor, J. and Shee, J. (Blackburn, J. dubitante), that the information given by the plaintiff was not so remote that the question ought not to be left to the jury to say whether he did give such information as led to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves.

In this case the declaration was framed upon a handbill issued by the defendant, offering a reward in the terms hereinafter set out. It alleged that the plaintiff gave such information as led to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves, and such information as led to the recovery of part of the property, but that the defendant had not paid him the reward.

The declaration also contained counts for work and services rendered, and upon an account stated.

The defendant pleaded, that the plaintiff did not give such information as led to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves.

He also pleaded payment into court of 11*l.* in respect of such information given by the plaintiff as led to the recovery of part of the stolen property.

To the residue of the declaration, he pleaded never indebted.

At the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J., at Guildhall, at the Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865, it appeared that the shop of the defendant, a watch-maker, on Cornhill, had been broken open upon or about the 4th of February, and that a number of watches and other goods were stolen. The defendant issued a handbill, the material part of which was as follows :

" A reward of 250*l.* will be given to any person who will give such information as shall lead to the apprehension and conviction of the thief or thieves, and a further reward of 750*l.* will be paid for such information as shall lead to the recovery of the property, or in proportion to any part thereof recovered."

The plaintiff worked as a jeweller, and on the 14th of February one Roberts brought a watch to his shop and asked him to alter it. The plaintiff consented to do so, but went to the defendant and told him that the watch was one of those which had been stolen, and that Roberts was coming to his shop again in the afternoon. The police were sent there, and Roberts was taken into custody, having another of the stolen watches upon him. He was kept in prison, and was visited by some female friends. On the 17th of February he gave information to the police that the thieves were to be found at a particular eel-pie shop, which he named, and there they were found, and were ultimately tried and convicted. There was some doubt as to whether Roberts knew of the house where the thieves were at the time of his being apprehended, or whether his friends gave him the information afterwards; but it rather appeared that he knew of it at the time. The police-officers, who apprehended the thieves, swore that the information given by Roberts about the eel-pie shop had nothing to do with the capture, as they had already found the place out.

The learned Judge told the jury to consider whether the plaintiff had given such information as led to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves, pointing out that the real information had been given by Roberts, so that the information given by the plaintiff was very remote, and that according to the evidence of the police, they would have captured the thieves without either the plaintiff's or Roberts's information.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 250*l.*, and for the defendant upon the plea of payment into Court, thinking that the 11*l.* was the proper proportion in respect of the two watches.

A rule was subsequently obtained for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Parry, Serj. and Laxton shewed cause.—The plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict found for him by the jury, inasmuch as if it had not been for the information given by him to the defendant in the first instance, the police would not have had their attention called by Roberts to the specific house in which the thieves and the stolen property were to be found. How can it be said that he did not give information which might, and in fact did, lead to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves?

[BLACKBURN, J.—Roberts would not have spoken if he had not been in custody, and there is no doubt that the jury considered that the police acted upon the information given by Roberts, although they all denied that that was so; and the question is, whether I ought not to have told the jury that the information given by the plaintiff was so remote, that he could not be entitled to recover. I feel great difficulty in saying that the act of Roberts was the act of the plaintiff?]

But Roberts would never have been in custody at all if the plaintiff had not told the defendant about him. The case is very like Smith v. Moore (1 Com. B. Rep. 438), where the words of the placard were almost identical with those now before the Court. Chief Justice Tindal there said, "The words of the placard offering the reward are large and general enough to comprehend every mode by which information could be conveyed that might have the effect of discovering and convicting the guilty person." Surely the information given by the plaintiff might have the effect of discovering the thieves. (They also referred to the definitions of the word "lead" in Johnson's Dictionary and Richardson's Dictionary.)

Digby Seymour, in support of the rule.—The mere apprehension of Roberts upon the information given by the plaintiff would not have brought about the apprehension of the thieves. It would rather seem that he would not have been able to tell the police of the place where the thieves might be found, if it had not been for the information given to him by the female friends who visited him while in prison. In order to entitle the plaintiff to the reward, the apprehension of the thieves must have been the natural result of the information given by him. But here it was only the accidental result; for all that the plaintiff can say is this, "I was the cause of Roberts being apprehended, and then by an accident which occurred, he was put in such a position as to be able to tell the police where the thieves could be found."

[MELLOR, J.—The information given by the plaintiff does not end with the apprehension of Roberts, for he was connected with the burglary by his possession of part of the stolen property, and it was natural to suppose that he would be able to give some information about the thieves.]

The words "lead to" in the handbill mean giving information of such a kind that the facts disclosed should lead as a natural result to the apprehension of the thieves. Here it did not lead at all to the apprehension. He also referred to Williams v. Cavardine (4 B. & Ad. 621; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 101), and to Lancaster v. Walsh (4 Mee. & W. 16; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 209).

BLACKBURN, J.—In these cases of misdirection it is usual that the Judge who presided at the trial should deliver his judgment after the other Judges, but there is this peculiarity in the present case that both of my learned Brothers think that I was right in leaving the case to the jury, as I did, while I myself, though with some doubt, have come to the conclusion that I was wrong. The reward is offered by the handbill or placard in these terms—[His Lordship read it as above set out.]—The facts are that the plaintiff gave information that one of the stolen watches had been offered to him by Roberts, and as the consequence of that information Roberts was apprehended with another of the stolen watches in his possession, and he was a receiver with guilty knowledge. There is no doubt that the plaintiff gave information which led to the recovery of those two watches, but the proper proportion of the 750*l.* having been paid into court, that part of the case is disposed of. But then Roberts being in prison, either from information which he obtained while there, or which he had obtained before, and which comes to much about the same, though he was not able to tell who the thieves were, did tell the police that they might be found at a particular eel-pie shop, and after about a week they were found there, and upon them or in one of their houses some of the stolen property was found. The jury must be taken to have found that the police went to the eel-pie shop upon the information of Roberts, and that Roberts would not have "split" if the plaintiff had not given the information upon which he was taken into custody. Logicians draw a distinction between the causa causans and the causa sine qua non, but the application is not very easy. I thought that there was great doubt whether the information given by the plaintiff was not so remote that it could not be said to have led to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves, but I left the question to the jury to say whether it did so lead or not.

Now, the question is, whether I ought not to have told them as a matter of law, that it was too remote, and I rather think, though not without a good deal of hesitation, that I ought to have so laid it down. Long ago, in his work on maxims of the law, Lord Bacon, in reference to the maxim "In jure, non remota causa sed proxima spectatur," wrote as follows: "It were infinite for the law to judge the causes of causes and their impulsions one of another; therefore, it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any further degree." There is no doubt that that is the law, but the difficulty is how to apply it. I rather think here that the information was too remote, though I do not think that it was necessary that the plaintiff should have given such information as would actually convict the thieves. I doubt whether when the police had followed up all the information which the plaintiff had given to the defendant, and had got Roberts into custody, they and he did not have a fresh start. I hardly dissent from the judgment of my Brothers, but I entertain sufficient doubt to justify myself in saying that if the defendant wishes to appeal, he may do so.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that my Brother Blackburn could not have non-suited the plaintiff, because I think that there was evidence for the jury to consider within the terms of the handbill issued by the defendant.—[His Lordship read the part of the handbill above set out, and went through the facts, and then continued]—Therefore, by the information given by the plaintiff, the police had got hold of one of the parties implicated in the burglary, and he gave them some more information, but there is great difficulty in saying why the information given by the plaintiff any the less led to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves. It is said that while Roberts was in custody he obtained information from his friends, but that seems to me not to be made out by the evidence, and it was probably said by him to make out that he was as little guilty as possible, and it was a matter for the jury to consider along with the other circumstances. Then it seems that Roberts, for very likely reasons, gave information to the police, and I think that my Brother Blackburn was right in putting the case to the jury, and telling them that the remoteness was an element for them to consider, and I think that he could not properly have told them that the information was so remote that there was nothing for them to consider. I say this with great diffidence, because the Judge who presides at the trial has greater opportunity for forming an opinion than the rest of the Court; but, as I think that a longer consideration would not throw any more light upon the matter, I give my judgment, though it may be very proper to appeal if the defendant thinks fit to do so.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether my Brother Blackburn was right in leaving to the jury the question, whether the information given by the plaintiff led substantially to the apprehension and conviction of the thieves, and whether he ought not to have said that the information was too remote to entitle the plaintiff to have the reward which had been offered. I think that my Brother was right in leaving the question to the jury, and that he could not, and ought not to have non-suited the plaintiff. I was at first struck with Mr. Seymour's observation, that Roberts had not the means of giving information as to the place where the thieves were to be found at the time of his apprehension, but it turns out to be doubtful whether he knew it at that time or not; and I do not think it very material, because he was so connected with the burglary by having the stolen watches in his possession, that he might have been himself convicted if he could not have given a good account of himself; he was a man so implicated as to be extremely likely to make a clean breast of it, and give information in order to save himself from punishment. It seems to me that the plaintiff having given information of the man who may have known all about it, and through whose information the thieves were actually apprehended, did give such information, as led to their apprehension.

I do not think that the words "shall lead," mean the same as "shall cause" or "shall suffice for," but as "shall conduct to," and therefore I consider that the plaintiff has brought himself within the true meaning of the handbill, and that my Brother Blackburn was right.

Rule discharged.

Interrogatories—Action for Slander—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 51.

DISCOVERY. LIBEL AND SLANDER.—In an action for slander the defendant may be compelled to answer interrogatories as to the words uttered, if it be made out to the satisfaction of the Court that the plaintiff cannot otherwise obtain redress. Therefore, the Court ordered a defendant to answer such interrogatories where it was shewn that the defendant had stated publicly that the plaintiff had committed forgery, and where the plaintiff was unable to discover from any of the persons who heard the statement, what the exact words spoken by the defendant were.

Rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why an order of Blackburn, J., directing that the defendant should answer certain interrogatories, should not be set aside.

The declaration alleged that the defendant had spoken of the plaintiff the words following, that is to say, "He was obliged to leave Oxford on account of a forgery," and "he committed a forgery while he was at Oxford," by reason whereof the plaintiff was excluded from the Bath and County Club in Bath.

The defendant pleaded not guilty.

It appeared from the affidavits that the father of the plaintiff had proposed him as a temporary member of the club, but that the committee had refused to admit him, and passed a resolution of which the following is a copy: "A statement having been made in public by Mr. Fosbroke, and in the presence of Mr. Pym, a member of the club, affecting the character of Mr. J. W. Atkinson, the committee do not feel themselves justified in admitting him as a temporary member until such accusation is refuted in as public a manner."

Inquiry was made of the secretary of the club, a Mr. Clephane, and of the chairman, and the former said that Mr. Pym had told the committee that the defendant had stated in the shop of Herring & Son, tobacconists, that the plaintiff had committed forgery on his father, but subsequently they both said that the accusation was simply one of forgery.

Application was made to Pym, but he stated that he had merely reported to the committee a conversation which he had heard in a public shop. He also said that the words in the declaration were not the precise words uttered by the defendant, but that he should not tell what those words were unless the defendant consented to his doing so. A letter was then written by the plaintiff's attornies to the defendant, asking for an apology, upon which he wrote as follows:

"In reply to your letter of the 17th inst., I have to request that you furnish me with a statement of the charge made against me by Mr. Atkinson."

To this the plaintiff's attornies replied as follows:

"The statement referred to in our letter of the 17th inst. was made in the shop of Messrs. Herring, Milsom Street, and was that Mr. Atkinson had committed forgery on his father, the Rev. R. A. Atkinson."

To which the defendant replied:

"I must distinctly deny ever having made such a statement as that imputed to me by you in your letter of yesterday's date."

Subsequently the plaintiff's attornies wrote again as follows:

"Our letter to you of the 19th instant was the result of information received from Mr. Clephane, who now states that he was somewhat in error, and should not have named Mr. Atkinson's father as the person whose name was forged. But we have ample evidence that you stated that Mr. Atkinson had committed forgery, and for that statement we require the retraction and apology on the terms of our letter to you of the 17th inst., and we must have it in the course of to-morrow, or an action will be commenced."

No reply was received to this letter.

The chairman of the club refused to give any further information, and Messrs. Herring declined to give any at all unless compelled to do so. The order above referred to was then obtained.

The following were the proposed interrogatories: first, did you in the month of February last, or on the first nine days of last March, on the premises of Messrs. Herring, tobacconists, Milsom Street, Bath, in the presence of Mr. F. A. Pym, use any words imputing forgery to the plaintiff, to the effect that he had to leave Oxford on account of a forgery, or that the plaintiff had put another man's name on a bill of exchange, or had issued or used a bill of exchange with the name of a person written on it but not by that person, or had used a bill of exchange having the signature of a person on it who had repudiated it as his signature, or to any effect similar to any of the above, or that he had been obliged to leave Oxford about any such transaction as above? If yea, what, as near as you can remember, were the words which you so used? Secondly, what words, as near as you can remember, affecting the character of the plaintiff, did you use in this year before the 10th of March in the presence of the said Mr. Pym, or on the premises of the said Mr. Herring?

Coleridge and T. W. Saunders shewed cause.—The rule ought to be discharged; this is not what is called a fishing application, but is fairly for the purpose of making out the case of the party asking for it. It is a matter for the Court to decide according to its discretion, taking into consideration the necessity of the case, and the convenience and inconvenience of the course suggested. The defendant is not bound to criminate himself, but the possibility of his doing so is no reason why the question should not be put to him—see Bartlett v. Lewis (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 230). And it is clear that the plaintiff cannot vindicate his character unless he is allowed to interrogate the defendant who has uttered the slander. That being so, the case falls within the ruling of Erle, C.J., in Stern v. Sevastopulo (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 268), where that learned Judge said, "I do not say that interrogatories should never be allowed in an action for slander, but I think that they should not be ever allowed in such an action, unless the Court be satisfied from the peculiar circumstances of the case that the party could not get redress, unless they were allowed."

[BLACKBURN, J.—That is the case upon which I acted, and I thought that in the exercise of my discretion, I ought to make the order. Probably the statement by Pym, to the committee of the club, was a privileged communication, but not that of the defendant, who was repeating in a shop the gossip which he had heard.]

Holl, in support of the rule.—The Court ought not to allow the interroga-

stories, unless a very strong necessity is shewn. It is admitted that it is a matter for the discretion of the Court, but interrogatories have generally been refused in actions for libel and slander—see Baker v. Lane (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 57) and Topping v. Ward (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 222; s. c. 6 Hurl. & N. 749). Here there is no necessity for issuing them, as the plaintiff has been furnished by the secretary and the chairman of the club with all the information which Pym had given to them, and with the resolution passed by the committee.

[BLACKBURN, J.—That is not sufficient; he wants to know what it was that the defendant said. COCKBURN, C.J.—The defendant does not deny that he has uttered the words.]

The plaintiff may go on with the action, and call Pym as a witness.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that we ought to discharge this rule, which has been obtained to rescind the order of my Brother Blackburn. I think that that order was rightly made. I quite agree that in exercising that jurisdiction which has been conferred upon us by the Common Law Procedure Act, we ought to take care that the interrogatories should be issued only where the party applying for them really has a case, and applies to the other side in vain for information. Thus we ought not to grant them in a mere fishing application; but in the present case we may safely do so, and for this reason: It is clear, on the evidence before us, that the defendant has uttered some slanderous words affecting the character of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was put up as a member of the club, and was rejected; and, upon inquiry, was informed that this had been done upon a suggestion that he had been guilty of forgery, and Pym was referred to as the person who had made the statement. Of course the plaintiff is anxious to know by whom the slander was uttered, and the circumstances under which it was uttered; but all that he is able to discover is, that Pym made the statement, and that he had it from the defendant. Pym will not state what he heard, except in general terms, and the committee are only able to state what Pym told them; and although the plaintiff has a good cause of action in respect of the slander upon him, he has no means of ascertaining the precise form in which it has been uttered, unless from the defendant himself, by means of these interrogatories. I think that, under these circumstances, he is entitled to receive such assistance as the Court can give him; and, that, therefore, the present rule ought to be discharged.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In making this order I did not wish to interfere with Stern v. Sevastopulo (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 268), with which I entirely agree. It is a matter in the discretion of the Court or the Judge; though, no doubt, in cases of slander it is not, in general, the practice to make the order.

Local Board of Health—“Trustees”—Transfer of Powers to Borough Corporation—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 142. and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 98. s. 26.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2, repealing section 75 of

5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, the trustees under any act for paving, lighting, supplying with water or gas, cleansing, watching, &c. any borough, whether the powers of the trustees extend beyond the limits of the borough or not, may by indenture transfer their powers to the borough corporation, which is henceforward to be the trustee for carrying the act into effect. By section 142. of the latter act, "trustees" are defined to mean trustees, commissioners or directors, or the persons charged with the execution of a public trust or duty, by whatever name they are designated:—Held, that local boards of health, established by virtue of the Public Health Act, are not "trustees" within the meaning of the last section, and cannot transfer their powers to the borough corporation.

Held, also, that the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 98. s. 26. does not render valid a transfer by a local board of health to the corporation of a borough where the district of the local board includes and is more extensive than the district of the borough.

Special CASE stated for the opinion of the Court, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

The facts are so clearly stated in the judgment of the Court that the following summary of them will enable the argument to be understood. The action was brought to test the validity of rates made by the corporation of Margate in parts beyond the limits of the borough. The parish of St. John the Baptist, Margate, has an area of about 2,500 acres, of which about 1,000 acres are within and form the town of Margate. The residue consists for the most part of arable land beyond the limits of the town.

By a provisional order of the General Board of Health, dated the 4th of July, 1851, and confirmed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. cxviii., after reciting that local acts relating to the purposes of the Public Health Act were in force within Margate, the Public Health Act was applied to the whole parish. The order provided that none of the rating powers of the act should be put in force within any part of the parish not included in the schedule to the order, but that the rating area should be from time to time extended by order of the local board. The scheduled boundaries did not extend beyond the town of Margate.

On the 29th of July, 1857, a charter of incorporation was granted to the borough of Margate within the limits scheduled in the order of the General Board of Health. On the 2nd of February, 1858, an indenture was made between the local board and the corporation of Margate, by which all the rights, powers and liabilities of the local board were transferred to the corporation. On the 31st of May, 1864, an order was made by the corporation for extending the rating area of the borough to the whole of the parish of St. John the Baptist, being the district constituted by the provisional order of the local board of health. The plaintiff, who was the owner and occupier of property beyond the limits of the borough, had refused to pay his proportion of a general district rate for the purposes of the Public Health Act on all property within the district. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the corporation had power to levy such rate upon the plaintiff. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment of nolle prosequi was to be entered for the defendant, with costs of suit. If the Court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for 40s., with costs of suit.

Bovill (Tomlinson with him), for the plaintiff.—The rate is bad. The deed of transfer to which the board of health and the corporation were parties is invalid. The defendants will rely upon the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2,¹

(1) By the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2, the trustees under any act for paving, lighting, supplying with water or gas, or cleansing, regulating or improving, or for providing or maintaining a cemetery or market in and for any borough (whether mentioned in the schedule to the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, or subsequently incorporated under that act or otherwise), or any part of such borough, and whether the powers of such trustees do or do not extend beyond the limits of such borough, may by indenture duly made, transfer to the body corporate of such borough their powers, property and liabilities, and the body corporate of such borough shall on such transfer being made be the trustee by the council of such borough for carrying any such act repealing 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 75, and upon the interpretation clause of the last act, in which a very large definition is given to the word "trustees." But the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. was not intended to apply to local boards of health. These boards exercise not only the powers referred to in section 2, but others of a more extensive and varied character under the general act. This will be made more clear by the fact, that provision is expressly made by the Local Government Act for the exercise of the powers of a local board by the town council in certain cases only. At the time of the passing of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 75, local boards of health like the one in question were not in existence. By section 33. of the Public Health Act, 1848, in any charter of incorporation by which the district of a local board becomes a corporate borough, a day shall be specified in which the transfer of powers, &c. is to take effect. By section 26. of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, this portion of the section is repealed, and it is provided that all transfers of powers, &c. which have been, or shall hereafter be, made by a local board of health to the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of a corporate borough by their council, the district of such board and such borough being identical, shall be valid and effectual though no day for such transfer shall have been named in the charter incorporating such borough. But the district of the borough of Margate and the local board of health are not identical. The borough comprises only the area of the board before it had exercised its powers of extension.

Manisty (Watkin Williams with him), for the defendant.—The rate is good. It is not contended that this is a transfer under the Public Health Act. But the transfer is valid according to the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2. The members of the board act by and under acts of parliament, and are persons charged with the execution of public duties. There is no reason why the powers given by the Public Health Act should not be exercised by a corporation. The duties of the trustees specified in section 2. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. are analogous to those of a local board of health.

Bovill, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

BLACKBURN, J. (June 13) now delivered the judgment of the Court.²—We have come to the conclusion that the common council of the borough of Margate had not power to make the rate in question, and, consequently, judgment must be entered, according to the agreement of the parties, in favour of the plaintiff for 40s. and costs. The question depends on the construction of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50, which is to be construed along with the 5 and 6 Will. 4. c. 76. By this enactment the trustees acting under any act for paving, lighting, supplying with water or gas, or cleansing, watching, regulating or improving, or for providing or maintaining a cemetery or market in and for any borough (whether mentioned in the schedule to the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, or subsequently incorporated under that act, or otherwise), or any part of such borough, and whether the powers of such trustees do or do not extend beyond the limits of such borough, may, by indenture duly made, transfer to the body corporate of such borough their powers, property and liabilities, and the body corporate of such borough shall, on such transfer being made, be the trustee by the council of such borough for carrying any such act into operation, and all the property of the trustees shall vest in the body corporate of the borough, and all the liabilities shall be borne by the body into operation, and all the property of the trustees shall vest in the body corporate of the borough, and all the liabilities shall be borne by the body corporate from the time of the transfer.

By section 8. this act and the unrepealed portion of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. are to be construed and read together as one act.

By the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 142. "trustees" are defined to mean trustees, commissioners, or directors, or the persons charged with the execution of a public trust or duty, by whatever name they are designated.

(2) Blackburn, J., Mellor, J. and Shee, J.

corporate from the time of the transfer. The interpretation clause, section 142, of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. defines trustees to mean "trustees, commissioners or directors, or the persons charged with the execution of a public trust or duty by whatever name they are designated." The facts are, that by a provisional order, confirmed by act of parliament, a local board of health was constituted for the parish of St. John the Baptist, Margate, Kent, comprising the town of Margate, and also a rural district; but by the terms of the order their rating powers were, in the first instance, confined to an area conterminous with the town, though power was given them from time to time to extend the rating area so as to bring into it the rest of the district; and the members of the local board were to be elected by the ratepayers within the rating area for the time being. Then the town of Margate was incorporated. At this time, therefore, the local board of health was elected by the inhabitants of a rating area co-extensive with the new borough, though the district over which they might extend their powers was more extensive. They professed, by indenture, to transfer their powers to the corporation of the borough, which, subsequently, sought to extend its powers to part of the rural district; and the question whether the municipal corporation can thus extend their powers over the rural parts of the district depends on the question, whether the transfer to them of the powers of the local board of health was valid; and that again depends on this, whether a local board of health for a district comprising a borough are within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2. trustees for executing an act for paving, &c. within the meaning of the enactment; and we think that they are not. There is no doubt that the duties of the local board of health, imposed by the General Public Health Acts, comprised many of those duties enumerated in the enactment in question, and the general course of legislation has been by a provisional order, confirmed by act of parliament, to transfer to the local board of health the powers of all trustees for executing local acts of that description within their district: so that local boards of health are charged with the execution of a public trust or duty, and are acting under the Public Health Acts, confirming the provisional order under which they are created; and those acts may, in one sense, be said to be acts for the purposes mentioned in the 2nd section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. But we think that they are not such as were intended by the legislature. The whole scheme of the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, is to transfer all powers of this kind to a local board where there is one. By section 12, if the district either is or becomes co-extensive with a borough, the council of that borough are the local board, but the local board of health and the municipal corporation are kept distinct, so that the borough fund is not liable to the creditors of the local board. If the district consists partly of a borough, the local board are to consist partly of members of the council; and, by section 33, if the district become entirely comprised within a borough, and a day is named in the charter of incorporation for that purpose, the powers of the persons then forming the local board are to be transferred to the council of the borough. There is no similar provision applicable to the case of part of the district being brought within a borough. Now, we cannot think that the legislature intended by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 50. s. 2. to give to a local board, part of whose district lies within a borough, power to reverse the whole of this legislation, and to charge the municipal corporation with the duty of carrying the Public Health Act into execution, so as on the one hand to charge the borough fund with all the liabilities of the local board of health, and, on the other, to deprive the ratepayers of the rural part of the district of all share in the election of those who are to govern them. We think, therefore, we must, in order to effectuate the intention of the legislature, construe the section as applying only to bodies charged with the duty of executing local and personal acts of the kind mentioned in the enactment, which was, no doubt, what was meant.

Our attention was called to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 26, which is, no doubt strangely framed, as it declares that a transfer made by any local board of health to the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of any corporate borough, by their council, shall be valid and effectual, the district of such board and such corporate borough being identical, "though no day shall have been named for such transfer in the charter incorporating such borough." Now, in case, within the 33rd section of the Public Health Act, 1848, no transfer is made by the local board, and if the transfer was supposed to be made under the Municipal Corporation Acts, the absence of the naming of a day in the charter of incorporation is quite immaterial. But though it is very difficult to say what was meant, it is clear that this enactment cannot extend to the present case, in which the districts are not identical. We regret to be obliged to decide as we do, as we are sensible that the consequence must be that the affairs of the district must be thrown into a state of confusion, which may probably render it indispensable to apply for a local act to set things right; but this we cannot help.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Distinguished, Shannon v. Good, 1884, 15 L. R. Ir. 284 (V.C.).

Will, Construction of—Devise without Words of Limitation—Inference from Direction as to Education of Children.

WILL.—The following devise, made before the Wills Act, "As touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me in this life, I give and bequeath to my well-beloved wife M. A., whom I likewise constitute, make, and ordain my sole executrix of my last will and testament, all and singular my lands, messuages, and tenements, by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed, together with all my houses and household goods, deeds, and movable effects; all my children to be educated and settled in business according to my wife's discretion," was held to carry the fee to the executrix, as the words relating to the education of the children, whether they created a binding trust to be enforced in equity, or merely expressed a wish which was not obligatory, were enough to shew the intention of the testator that the executrix should have the inheritance.

Ejectment by the plaintiff as heir-at-law of the testator, Ebenezer Lloyd, to recover possession of certain land, houses, and premises in the parish of Fishguard, in Pembroke.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Assizes for the county of Pembroke, on the 28th of February, 1866, it appeared that the will of Ebenezer Lloyd, dated the 9th of June, 1809, was as follows:—

"In the name of God, amen. I, Ebenezer Lloyd, of the parish of Fishguard, in the county of Pembroke, being of perfect mind and memory, thanks be given unto God therefore, calling into mind the mortality of my body, knowing that it is appointed to all men once to die, do make and ordain this my last will and testament; that is to say, principally and first of all, I give and recommend my soul into the hands of Almighty God that gave it, and my body I recommend to the earth to be buried in decent Christian burial, nothing doubting but at the General Resurrection I shall receive the same again by the almighty power of God, and as touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me in this life, I give and bequeath to my well-beloved wife Mary Ann Lloyd, whom I likewise constitute, make, and ordain my sole executrix of my last will and testament, all and singular my lands, messuages, and tenements, by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed, together with all my houses and household goods, deeds, and movable effects; all my children to be educated and settled in business according to my wife's discretion."

The will concluded with a revocation of former testaments. Mary Ann Lloyd, the widow of the testator, upon his death, took possession of the property in question, which she occupied till her death, in 1865, devising it by her will to uses for the benefit of the plaintiff and the defendants. A verdict for the plaintiff was directed by the learned Judge, with leave for the defendants to move.

Joshua Williams, accordingly, in Easter Term, 1866, moved for and obtained a rule to enter the verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the widow took under the will an estate in fee simple, and not one for life.

Mellish, Hardinge Giffard and J. W. Bowen shewed cause.—The widow took an estate for life only. The rule is clear, that before the Wills Act a devise without words of inheritance did not pass the fee. The introductory words, "as touching such worldly estate," cannot be relied on as shewing an intention that the testator intended to convey the fee, unless the word "estate" is imported into the devise. By themselves, the words merely mean "with reference to my estate." In Denn v. Gaskin (2 Cowp. 657), where the will commenced with these words, Lord Mansfield said that, as there were no words to connect the devise with the introduction so as to pass the whole interest, the words could only mean "with respect to my worldly estate." That case is in point, and differs only from this by the fact that here there is but one devisee. But no decision can be referred to which shews that this circumstance is material. In Grayson v. Atkinson (Wils. 333) it is merely said that if the words "all my temporal estate" are used, they shew an intention to charge the inheritance. The words "by her freely to be possessed and enjoyed" might, in the absence of authority, be thought material. But in Goodright v. Barrow (11 East, 220) it was held that these words by themselves are insufficient to raise a presumption that the testator meant to convey the fee. But the main question will, no doubt, be, whether the words "all my children to be educated and settled in business according to my wife's discretion" are enough to impose a charge on the wife, so as to raise an inference that it was meant to give her the fee. It is quite clear that they do not. It may be doubted whether they mean more than that the widow is to be guardian. A leading case on this subject is Foley v. Parry (5 Sim. 138), where the words were "it is my particular wish that my dear wife will superintend and take care of the education of W, so as to fit him for any respectable profession or employment." It was held, that these words amounted to a gift to W. of the expense of his education. But it is decided that, in order that such a direction should raise a presumption that an estate in fee is conveyed, the direction must be one which without the inheritance cannot well be carried out. In Moor v. Denn (2 Bos. & P. 247) the rule is explained by Chief Baron Macdonald, and it is shewn that where there is no charge no presumption can be derived from words of request. Here there is only a personal direction to the wife.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Settling a child at once may require a large sum.]

The principle upon which the Courts have acted in holding that the existence of a charge was evidence of a devise in fee is that otherwise damnosa hæreditas might fall to the devisee. But according to Foley v. Parry (5 Sim. 138) there is a gift to the children of the expenses of maintenance, and the executrix is not bound to see to the execution of any trust. They cited Doe d. Small v. Allen (8 Tem. Rep. 497), Doe d. Ashby v. Baines (2 Cr. M. & R. 23; s. c. 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 141), Bromitt v. Moore (9 Hare, 374; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 129), Thorp v. Owen (2 Ibid. 607; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 129), Doe d. Knott v. Lawton (4 New Cases, 455), Doe d. Knocker v. Ravell (2 Cr. & J. 617), Burton v. Powers (3 Kay & J. 170; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 330), and Jarman on Wills, vol. 2, 3rd edit. 247.

Joshua Williams (June 9), H. G. Allen and C. Coleridge, in support of the rule.—The executrix took under the will an estate in fee. Even before the Statute of Wills the intention of the testator was the chief criterion in construing a will—Biederman v. Seymour (3 Beav. 368), Jarman on Wills, 7th edit. vol. 1, p. 277. The words “as touching such worldly estate” cannot be rejected. They shew that the testator intends to part with everything that he has. In Ibbetson v. Beckwith (Ca. t. Talbot, 157) it is said that where the testator sets out in his will to give and dispose of his worldly estate, this is a strong proof that he intends to dispose of the inheritance.

[BLACKBURN, J.—There the word “estate” was brought down into the body of the devise.]

In Smith v. Coffin (2 H. Black. 444) it is said by Serjeant Williams, arguendo, that the introductory clause when connected with the rest of the will, affords a good ground on which to reason in favour of the devisee. Love-acres v. Blight (1 Cowp. 352) is also strongly to the same effect. With regard to the direction as to the education of the children, it is contended that these words amount to a charge on the executrix. The Courts of Chancery have had much difficulty in deciding as to the existence of such charges. Costabadie v. Costabadie (6 Hare, 410) shews that the mere fact that the devisee has a discretion, does not prevent the trust from being enforced. There is no guardian appointed and no trustees, so that the charge falls upon the wife as executrix. They cited Doe d. Willey v. Holmes (8 Term Rep. 1), Doe v. Richards (3 Ibid. 356), and Cole v. Rawlinson (1 Salk. 236).

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we heard part of the argument on a former day, and it is unnecessary that we should take further time to consider our judgment. The question arises upon the construction of a will; and if the widow of the testator took under this will an estate in fee, the defendants are right and the rule must be made absolute. I have come to the conclusion that upon a true construction of the will the widow did take an estate in fee, and the rule must consequently be made absolute. The general rule by which a case like this is decided, is to look at the will and endeavour to collect from it the intention of the testator. This word “intention” must not, of course, be understood in its ordinary sense, but must mean an intention expressed in proper words, according to the ordinary rules of law. Now, at a very early period, before the Wills Act, it was established that a plain gift or devise of lands, farms or tenements, or words to that effect, would only operate to convey to the devisee an estate for life, and would not disinherit the heir unless, from the express words or provisions of the will, it should appear to have been the intention of the testator that an estate of inheritance should pass. But it has often been held, that if the word “estate,” or some equivalent term, be used in the devise, as if the testator had said, “I devise all my estate in Blackacre to A. B.,” that there would be sufficient to explain the intention of the testator, and that a devise of the estate would carry the inheritance. But I do not think that the mere introduction of these words at the beginning of the will, “touching all my worldly estate,” shewing that the deviser did not intend to die intestate, will alone make a subsequent devise carry the fee. The distinction is rather a nice one, but where it is shewn that the introductory words may be brought down into and united with the devise, so that the testator may be supposed to have said, “I do not intend to die intestate, but to dispose of all my estate, and I give and devise it accordingly,” the Courts have adopted that construction, so that the estate is included in the devise, and the inheritance is conveyed. But the two cases, Denn v. Gaskin (2 Cowp. 657) and Doe d. Small v. Allen (8 Term Rep. 497) distinctly shews that where the word “estate” is not brought down and incorporated in the devise, the inheritance cannot be enlarged. These cases Mr. Williams endeavoured to distinguish from the present one, on the ground that here there is but one devise to one devisee. But in Denn v. Gaskin (2 Cowp. 657) an equal interest in the whole of the lands was devised to the same persons; and in Doe d. Small v. Allen (8 Term Rep. 497), it appeared that there were other lands as to which the testator intended to die intestate. I think, therefore, that these two cases are not to be distinguished, and that as far as they apply, they go to shew that the fee was not conveyed by the words of the present will. Proceeding further, we find the testator gives all his lands, messuages and tenements to the executrix, by her "freely to be possessed and enjoyed." Now, there can be no doubt that in Loveacres v. Blight (1 Cowp. 352) Lord Mansfield gave some weight to these words, "freely to be possessed and enjoyed." But there were other circumstances, to which his Lordship attached weight, to lead to the inference that an estate of inheritance was given; and in the subsequent case of Goodright v. Barrow (11 East, 220), where the same words occurred, and Loveacres v. Blight (1 Cowp. 352) was brought to the notice of the Court, it was distinctly held that by themselves these words were not sufficient. This case is the later one of the two; and I think that we ought to follow it, and hold that in the present instance these words alone are not sufficient. But we now come to that part of the will which, I think, is sufficient to give to the widow an estate of inheritance. After devising all his lands to his wife, to be by her freely enjoyed, with all his houses, household goods, and so on, the testator uses these words, "My children to be educated and settled in business according to my wife's discretion." Now, it has been decided by the Court of Chancery that where there is a devise of lands, without words of limitation, and the devisee would incur any burthen by accepting the estate, the devisee must be presumed to have meant to convey the inheritance; for otherwise the devisee might be a loser. If the devisee were very old, and his life worth only a few years' purchase, the amount of the burthen might be equal to the value of his life, and there would be strong ground for concluding that the testator intended that the devisee should have an interest in the estate for a term larger than his life. On the other hand, if the devisee were young, and his life worth many years' purchase, and the only charge was a small annuity to a servant, there would not be the same ground for such a conclusion. If we are to ascertain whether the inheritance was conveyed, according to the magnitude of the estate, and the burthen placed upon it, there must always be some uncertainty. It has therefore been laid down, that the magnitude of the estate is not to be taken into account; and in Mr. Jarman's work On Wills, vol. 2, p. 220, it is said, "It has long been settled that where a devisee whose estate is undefined is directed to pay the testator's debts or legacies, or a specific sum in gross, he takes an estate in fee, on the ground that if he took an estate for life only he might be damnified by the determination of his interest before reimbursement of his expenditure; and the fact that actual loss is considered highly improbable, by the disparity of the amount of the sum charged relatively to the value of the land, does not prevent the enlargement of the estate." The question then arises in the present case, do the words relating to the education of the children cast a burthen on the widow if she accepts the devise, and will she be under an obligation to educate the children, and settle them in business according to her discretion? It may well be that this is a burthen which the Court of Chancery would compel her to undertake; not controlling her discretion, but looking upon it as a fiduciary discretion, so that she should not give away the property, but must bona fide apply it in satisfaction of the charge imposed on her. If that were so, the burthen of educating the children, putting them to some business, paying the premiums and other expenses, would be a considerable one. Now, the cases in the Court of Chancery leave me in considerable doubt as to whether this direction would in the present case be treated as an obligation and enforced. Whether it does amount to such an obligation, or is a mere expression of a wish on the part of the testator, without depriving the devisee of the power of obeying or disregarding it, must depend upon an examination of cases in Chancery; and I should give my decision with much diffidence and doubt as to whether it would be approved of by a Court of equity. It seems to me, however, most unlikely that the testator could have meant that his wife should have the estate clogged with a burthen; but if such a burthen were to fall upon it, he would be more likely to wish that the devisee should have the fee, so as not to be a loser. Now, it seems to me that precisely the same reasoning would apply to this case if, without imposing any obligation, the testator had strongly expressed his desire that a particular charge should be incurred. If the testator makes a devise of land, without binding the devisee by any conditions, but requesting that certain payments may be made, the inference would be that he intended to give the inheritance in the land, so that the object of his bounty might comply with the moral obligation. In this view of the case, I think that it is unnecessary for us to decide whether this will creates a binding trust to be enforced in equity, or merely expresses a wish which is not obligatory. In either case, according to the principle of decided cases, there would be evidence of an intention that the executrix should have the inheritance. The rule will be made absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that we see in the words of the will a clear intention on the part of the testator that his wife should take an estate in fee. Mr. Mellish, indeed, so far succeeded in his argument as to shew that it would be extremely unsafe, notwithstanding some expressions in the decided cases, to hold that the words "as touching such worldly estate" are sufficiently brought down into the devise so as to carry the fee. I think also, that he succeeded in shewing that the other words, "to be freely possessed and enjoyed," are not sufficient. But it is not enough to shew that one portion of the will, taken by itself, is insufficient, and that another portion is also insufficient. The arguments must be based upon the words of the whole will taken together, and I think that Mr. Williams is quite right in saying that though the words to which I have alluded may not by themselves suffice, yet that they assist us in coming to a conclusion as to the meaning of the last clause upon which he relied. I quite agree with my Brother Blackburn in feeling considerable doubt as to whether this will creates an equitable obligation which a Court of equity would enforce. At the same time, if we were called upon to decide the question, it seems to me that the authorities cited against the obligation may either be distinguished, or admit us to decide (looking at the words which precede and follow the devise) that it was the intention of the testator that his children should be educated and settled in business, and that the mode of carrying out his intention should be left to the discretion of his wife, though with no power on her part to decline the trust. For if it were left at her option to educate the children or not, the word "discretion" need not have been used in the will. And I also agree with my Brother Blackburn, that the principle by which words imposing a charge on the estate are used as evidence of the intention of the testator, applies also to a mere recommendation to the wife that she should exercise that discretion with regard to her children, which a husband might reasonably expect. In either case the quantity of the estate of the devisee would be material, since it would be absurd to express a hope that the devisee would incur expenses unless the estate bore some proportion to the object contemplated; and the testator must be supposed to have intended that his wife should take what would reasonably enable her to carry out the objects which he had in view. I think, therefore, that the defendants are clearly entitled to judgment.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The clear result of the cases cited in the course of the argument is, that words shewing an intention to convey the whole quantity of the testator's interest in a particular estate may be sufficient to carry the fee, though no words of inheritance be used. The words of this will, independently of any construction, legal or equitable, which has been previously put upon such words, shew an intention on the part of the testator to give the whole of his estate, real and personal, to his wife, to be by her freely possessed and enjoyed. If the will had contained nothing more I should have had some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the wife took more than a life estate, for the words, "as touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me," are not incorporated with the devising part of the will. But the intention of the testator is made apparent by his direction, and it seems to me of little moment whether this direction is the mere expression of a wish, or creates a trust, that his wife should enjoy the real estate in a way consistent with his and her moral duty to their children, not merely to their nurture in childhood, which, in a vast majority of cases, would in no way derogate from the full and free enjoyment of the estate by the widow, but subject to an outlay on their account for their education and settlement in business, which would probably be payable out of her income from the estate during her life. There can be little doubt, therefore, that he meant to give to his wife such an estate as would, at the cost to herself of some diminution of her estate, secure the object of educating and settling her children in life. It has been argued that the words "at her discretion" import that the executrix should have the discretion of disposing of the estate in any way that she might think proper. But it seems to me that, coupling these words with the rest of the will, the right construction to be put upon them is that suggested by my Brother Mellor, and that they apply rather to the mode of educating and settling the children than to an absolute discretion on the part of the wife to dispose of the estate as she might think proper, without reference to the interests of the children. The rule must be made absolute.

Evidence—Negligence—Shipkeeper—Action against Registered Owner.

SHIPPING.—A ship, of which the defendant was the registered owner, was lying in a dock under the care of a shipkeeper. One of the hatchways was left by the negligence of that person, and the plaintiff, who was lawfully passing across the ship, fell down the hatchway and was injured. He brought an action against the defendant. At the trial, it was proved and found by the jury that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of the shipkeeper, but the only evidence to fix the defendant was the proof of the register, in which he was described as "owner":—Held, by Blackburn, J., and Lush, J. (Mellor, J. dissentiente), that this was evidence to be left to the jury, and would have justified them in finding that in fact the defendant had employed the shipkeeper.

The declaration alleged that the defendant was possessed of a vessel called the Jarnia, lying in the Surrey Dock, and that the plaintiff, being the master of another ship lying alongside, was entitled to pass over and across the deck of the Jarnia to get to his own ship, and that the defendant improperly removed the hatches from one of the hatchways, and allowed them to remain off after dark, whereby the plaintiff, having occasion to cross over, fell down the hatchway and was injured.

The defendant pleaded, among other pleas, not guilty.

At the trial, which took place before Mellor, J., at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1865, it appeared that the ship had been lying in the Surrey Dock for some considerable time under the care of a shipkeeper. The plaintiff had occasion to pass across the ship, in order to get to his own vessel, which lay on the other side of her. In doing so, he fell down an unsecured hatchway and sustained some injury. The register was produced, and it appeared therefrom that the defendant was the registered owner, but there was no other evidence to fix him with liability. The learned Judge thought that this evidence was not sufficient, but he left to the jury the questions as to the fact of negligence and of contributory negligence, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff. Leave was given to the defendant to move for a rule to shew cause why a nonsuit should not be entered.

Subsequently a rule was obtained by Brett, against which Bush Cooper (Kenealy with him) shewed cause (Jan. 13).—The presumption of law, in the absence of direct evidence, is that a keeper in charge of a chattel which cannot be carried about the person, is the servant of the owner of the chattel, just as the driver of a hackney carriage is considered to be the owner's servant. Under the old Hackney Carriage Act, the owner's name must be on the vehicle. In the present case, there being no evidence as to who appointed the shipkeeper, the owner must be held liable for the negligence, unless the presumption that the owner is the master of the shipkeeper is rebutted. In an action against the owner for breach of contract, it might be necessary to give further evidence of agency; but in actions of tort, of which this is one, all the avenues of information are closed against a plaintiff, and such actions could not be sustained if direct evidence were required.

[BLACKBURN, J.—For all that appears, the keeper might be the servant of the broker to sell the ship.]

It was clearly part of his duty to keep the ship free from danger to persons coming on board; but in fact he kept the hatchway open during the night, although it was always covered by day. By the Piers and Dock Act, lights are prohibited at night. Cox v. Reed (Ry. & M. 199) is stronger than the present case; for there it was laid down that a registered owner is prima facie liable for the repairs of his ship, until that presumption is rebutted: see also Fletcher v. Reid (Ibid. 202). Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 353) is also in the plaintiff's favour.—He also referred to Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 39).

Brett (May 7), in support of the rule.—This is a most important question, and comes to this: is the mere production of the register sufficient to fix the defendant as the employer of the shipkeeper? It is much the same question as whether the owner of a ship is liable in respect of necessities ordered by a person on board, though in such a case it would be enough to shew that the person ordering the goods was the agent of the owner, while here it is necessary to shew that the shipkeeper was the servant of the defendant. It often happens that the registered owner is not the beneficial owner, or the owner who nominated the master. There is this additional peculiarity in the present case, that the ship has been laid up in dock for some considerable time, so that it may well be that the shipkeeper was employed by the dock company or by the broker, and that the defendant had nothing to do with him at all.

[BLACKBURN, J.—But the registered owner is prima facie the beneficial owner, and inasmuch as the truth of the matter is almost exclusively in the knowledge of the defendant, is he not bound to rebut the presumption that he employed the shipkeeper? LUSH, J.—May it not be carried so far as that the registered owner should be presumed to be in possession of that which is his own?]

No; it is submitted that those presumptions do not fairly arise from the mere fact of the defendant being the registered owner.

[MELLOR, J.—The plaintiff ought to shew that the shipkeeper was the servant of the defendant, before he can properly call upon him at all.]

Yes; and the case may be likened to a case where a man is seen digging a hole in a field, and injury is occasioned by such hole to another person. Could an action be maintained against the owner of the field on the mere proof that he was the owner? The legal owner may be a mere trustee. In Hackwood v. Lyall (17 Com. B. Rep. 124; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 44 n.), which was an action for repairs done to a vessel of which the defendant was the registered owner of forty-eight sixty-fourths, Mr. Justice Cresswell said, "The question is, whether the captain has power to make contracts to charge any person whose name appears on the register as owner. At one time the register was considered to be conclusive evidence of ownership, in an action for repairs or for necessities supplied to a ship. Now, it is not considered even prima facie evidence." And Jervis, C.J., said, "The Register Acts, are mere matter of fiscal regulation."

[BLACKBURN, J.—The observation of Mr. Justice Cresswell is a mere dictum thrown out arguendo.]

He also referred to and discussed Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 353) and Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s.c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 39).

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 13th of June the following judgments were delivered.—

MELLOR, J.—In this case the defendant is sought to be made responsible for an accident which happened to the plaintiff in lawfully crossing a ship called the Jarnia, lying in the Surrey Dock, to get from another ship, called the Moulshi, lying alongside, to the quay. It must be taken for granted, upon the finding of the jury, that the accident was occasioned by the negligence of the shipkeeper of the Jarnia, which ship was then, and had been for some time, laid up in the dock for the winter. The only evidence to fix the defendant with liability, was the proof of the register, in which he was described as owner. There being no other evidence, I was of opinion that the registry of ownership, without more, was insufficient for that purpose; but I left questions as to the fact of negligence and of contributory negligence to the jury, who found their verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at 450*l.*; and I therefore reserved leave for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, in case the Court should be of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence for me to leave to the jury to entitle them to find for the plaintiff. A rule to set aside that verdict and to enter a nonsuit, pursuant to the leave reserved, was obtained by Mr. Brett, and the question now arises, whether the mere proof that the defendant was the registered owner of the ship, is prima facie sufficient to fix him with liability for the negligence of the shipkeeper. I retain the opinion which I formed at the trial, viz., that such evidence alone was not enough to submit to the jury, to support the allegation in the declaration, that "the defendant negligently removed the hatches, whereby the accident complained of happened."

In order to make the defendant liable, it was incumbent on the plaintiff, upon whom the burden of proof rested, to shew affirmatively that the shipkeeper was the defendant's servant. This depends upon the ordinary principles of law, applicable to the case of master and servant, and is not embarrassed by considerations arising out of the peculiar relation which the captain of a ship in general bears to the owner, and upon which the liability of the owner of a ship for repairs done to it, or for necessities supplied to it, by the captain's orders, may depend. Even in that case it would appear to be incumbent upon the plaintiff, who seeks to render an owner liable, to shew affirmatively that the master who gave the orders was the master appointed by or sanctioned by the owner, so as to make him in the particular case "his master"—Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 39). As was said by Mr. Justice Erle, in Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 353), "The doctrine that the legal ownership of the ship is proof that the master has authority to contract for such owner has been repeatedly negatived." That is a material circumstance, as a step to proof, is undoubted, and, coupled with evidence that the repairs were done for the benefit of the ship, or the stores were supplied for its use, may in general be a sufficient prima facie case to call for evidence by way of explanation or answer; but I apprehend that the present case differs materially from that. Here the registry is the only evidence, and I cannot perceive that the single fact of ownership raises a presumption that the man in charge of the ship was the servant of the owner or appointed by him. And unless there is a presumption of fact, arising out of the mere ownership of the ship, to that effect, the rule to enter a nonsuit ought to be made absolute. The ship was not in the course of navigation, and there was absolutely nothing to shew that the owner ever came near the ship, or knew that it was in the dock. Whether the ship was in the possession of the owner, or of a mortgagee, or of the dock authorities, or of a broker, or of any other person, did not appear. In the case of Mitcheson v. Oliver Mr. Baron Parke, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (5 El. & B. 445-6),—says, in remarking upon a passage of Lord Campbell's summing-up, in which he had put it to the jury "whether upon the evidence on both sides they were of opinion that the defendant had authorized the goods and work to be supplied and done on his credit," &c. "No doubt if the jury disbelieved the parts of the case that made for the defendant, and drew the prima facie inference from the ownership and other facts, there was evidence on which they might find that Thompson was in fact master for the defendant." It appears to be clear, I think, that Mr. Baron Parke did not consider that the mere fact of ownership, without "the other facts," would have afforded even prima facie evidence that Thompson was the defendant's master. The action was for ordinary repairs done to the ship and for goods supplied to it, upon the orders of the registered master, and there were other circumstances tending to raise an inference as to the liability of the defendant; but it never appears to have been contended by the counsel, or suggested by any of the Judges, that the registry alone would have been sufficient proof that the captain was the captain of the owner so as to bind him.

However this may be, in the case of repairs done to a ship, or stores supplied to it, for the apparent benefit of the owner, the same reason does not apply to the present case. I think that it would be unduly shifting the burden of proof to call for an answer to the mere fact of ownership; and I cannot see why any presumption should be made which would dispense with the necessity of further proof. Possession may be presumptive evidence of title; but the converse does not necessarily hold, viz., that title is presumptive evidence of possession. It is obvious that in the case of things which are constantly the subject of demise, charter, mortgage or the like, the presumption that the actual possession is in the owner cannot but be weak, and is not to be classed with those strong presumptions which shift the burden of proof from a plaintiff to a defendant.

There exists an exception to the general rule that a party who alleges a matter must prove it in cases in which the subject-matter of the allegation lies peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties. In this case there is no peculiar knowledge on the part of the defendant within the meaning of that maxim. In one sense, in almost every case, the defendant has peculiar knowledge affecting his relation to the act complained of, but that is not the knowledge referred to. Here the shipkeeper could have proved by whom he was appointed, and so have laid a good foundation for the plaintiff's case, if appointed by the defendant. Why should the burden of proof shift in such a state of things in order to compel a defendant to disprove that which it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove? I am not aware of any case in which such evidence has been held sufficient, and I think that all experience at Nisi Prius is against it. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute; but as a majority of the Court is of a different opinion, the rule will of course be discharged.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, tried before my Brother Mellor, it appeared that the plaintiff was lawfully passing over a ship then lying in dock under the charge of a shipkeeper, in order to reach his own vessel, which lay on the other side. In so doing he fell through an unsecured hatchway, and sustained considerable injury. There was evidence proper to be left to the jury, that this accident was occasioned by the negligence of those having the charge of the ship, over which it was known that the plaintiff might pass, in not keeping it reasonably safe; and the evidence was such as to make it a question for the jury whether the plaintiff had or had not himself contributed to the accident by the want of reasonable care on his part; but the only evidence to connect the defendant with those having charge of the ship was the production of the ship's register, by which it appeared that the defendant was the registered owner of the ship in question. It was objected that there was no evidence to fix the defendant, and my Brother Mellor was of that opinion; but in order to avoid the expense of a new trial, he reserved leave to enter a nonsuit, and left to the jury the question whether there was negligence in the shipkeeper occasioning the accident, and whether the plaintiff could by due care have avoided the consequences of that negligence. Both of these questions the jury found in favour of the plaintiff. No question was left to the jury as to whether they thought that, in fact, the defendant was the employer of the shipkeeper, nor was my Brother Mellor asked to leave that question to the jury.

A rule nisi was obtained to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence to fix the defendant, which was argued before my Brothers Mellor and Lush, and myself. I have come to the conclusion that the registry was evidence which would have justified the jury in finding that, in fact, the defendant employed the shipkeeper if that question had been left to them, and, consequently, that the rule to enter a nonsuit should be discharged; but, under the circumstances, I think the defendant ought to be permitted, if he desires it, to have a new trial, costs to abide the event, in order to have the question of fact more distinctly raised and determined.

I do not think that any liability attaches to the defendant merely as owner of the ship. The question I think is, whether he employed the shipkeeper as his servant. In all cases in which the owners of a ship are sought to be made liable,—either in contracts for necessaries supplied on the order of the captain, or as in cases of collision for the negligence of the crew, or as in the present case for the negligence of the shipkeeper,—I think that the question really is, whether the persons sought to be charged were the employers of the captain who made the contract, or the masters of the persons who were guilty of the negligence, and that the liability does not depend on the title to the ship. In cases of contract a further question sometimes arises, as to whether the ship-owner may not have clothed the master with apparent authority, so as to be precluded from disputing his authority; but in cases of tort the question can only be, whether he in fact employed those actually guilty of negligence. But whilst agreeing that the ownership of the ship does not render the owners liable, either in contract or in tort, for the acts of the master and crew or other persons in charge of the vessel, unless the owners are the employers of those persons, I think that the ownership is a very important piece of evidence, tending to shew that the persons who are proved to be owners of the ship are, in fact, employers of those who have custody of the ship. Ships are most commonly in the possession of their owners, and those who have the actual custody of the ship are most commonly in the employment of the owners; and, consequently, proof of ownership is evidence tending to prove that the persons proved to be the owners of the ship are employers of those having the actual custody of the ship; and the register being evidence of the title to the ship is, I think, evidence that the registered owners are in possession, and employ those having the actual custody. It is by no means conclusive. The ship may be demised (though that is very rarely the case) and the persons navigating her may be employed by the lessee, or by a person who has purchased her, but has not yet paid the price, and consequently not had the ship conveyed to him, as was the case in Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 353), or, as in the most common case, they may be employed by one who is, in fact, a mortgagor in possession, though the mortgagee is registered as absolute owner; and when the ship is like the one now in question, not being navigated, but laid up in dock, there is the additional possibility that the shipkeeper may be the servant of the dock company, or the ship's broker, or any one else with whom the owners may have made an arrangement to keep his ship for him as a bailee of the ship. But those are all exceptional cases; and the facts lie so entirely in the knowledge of the defendant, and may so easily be proved by him, that I think a jury would be fully warranted in acting on the prima facie inference that the persons having the actual custody of the ship are employed by the owners, unless some evidence to the contrary is given.

The case in this respect, in principle, somewhat resembles those in which it has been held that the evidence of possession of demised premises is sufficient proof that the person in possession is assignee of the lease, in the absence of any evidence of facts tending to shew that he is in possession as sub-lessee or otherwise, Doe v. Williams (6 B. & C. 41), or the cases that establish that, though dealing with the goods of the deceased, is quite consistent with the person who does so being agent for a lawful executor, or claiming the goods as his own; yet, in the absence of anything to explain it, the fact is sufficient to charge the defendant as executor; "for the most obvious conclusion which strangers can form from his conduct is, that he hath a will of the deceased, wherein he is named executor, but hath not yet taken probate thereof"—2 Black. Com. 507. If, instead of considering the case on principle merely, we look to the cases decided as to ships, I find none in which it has been held that the title of a ship is not some evidence that the owners were the employers of the person who acts as captain, and several which, as it seems to me, are authorities for saying that it is sufficient prima facie evidence that they are his employers. At one time it was a common idea that even if it was proved that the owners did not employ the captain, yet that the ownership of the ship conclusively made them liable to those who supplied necessaries on the order of the captain. That, it is now established, was a mistake; the persons liable are those who really were the captain's principals, when he made the contract, or who had precluded themselves from denying that they were so; but in all the cases on the subject there was evidence that the persons who were on the register as owners were not, in fact, the employers of the captain. In Abbott on Shipping (5th edit. p. 18, by Shee), Lord Tenterden states his own view of the law thus: "The title to a ship may furnish evidence that repairs are made or stores furnished under the authority and upon the credit of the legal owner, as in fact they generally are; but it does no more; and therefore if it appear that they were made or furnished under the authority and upon the credit of another, the legal owner will not be answerable." In Jennings v. Griffiths (Ry. & M. 42) Lord Tenterden left the case to the jury, using expressions which (though not quite bearing out the statement in the marginal note) seem to me, when taken in conjunction with this passage, to shew that, in Lord Tenterden's opinion, the title to the ship was evidence that the owners employed the captain, and so gave him authority to order necessaries for them, though this evidence might be rebutted. This must be because he is in the control of their ship, and they can explain how that is, if he is not their captain. The same principle applies where the person in control is not the captain, but one acting as ship's husband. That was the case in Fletcher v. Reid (Ibid. 202) and Cox v. Reid (Ry. & M. 199). In Fletcher v. Reid (Ibid. 202) the plaintiffs rested their case on an admission that necessary repairs, to the extent of 540*l.*, were done by the plaintiffs to the ship Asia, and the bill rendered to one Bulmer, and that the defendants, during the time when the repairs were done, were registered owners. Lord Gifford, after objection, decided that this was sufficient to call on the defendants for an answer; the defendants failed in proving what it subsequently appeared was the fact, that they were only mortgagees, Bulmer being in fact not their agent, but a mortgagor, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict. In Cox v. Reid (Ry. & M. 199), a similar action against the same defendants, they were provided with evidence that the transfer to them was only intended to be as mortgagees, though the then Registry Acts made it operate in law as an absolute transfer. Chief Justice Best told the jury that the owner of a ship is prima facie liable for repairs, but it was for them to say whether that presumption was not met by the facts of the case. And the defendants obtained a verdict. These were but Nisi Prius decisions, but no attempt was made to disturb either verdict.

The whole law on this subject was discussed in the two cases of Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 353) and Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 39), and as these are the latest cases on the subject, and the latter was the decision of a Court of error, it is important to see what really was decided in them. In Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 353) the question arose on a rule to set aside the verdict obtained by the plaintiff for misdirection in leaving the case to the jury at all, on the ground that there was no evidence on which the verdict could be supported, the Court having refused a rule as against the weight of evidence. The evidence as the Court then took it to be, is reported by Lord Campbell in the beginning of his judgment. The evidence on the trial of Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 39) came before the Court of Exchequer Chamber on a bill of exceptions, and is set out in the beginning of the report of Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 39), and was not quite so favourable to the plaintiff as that stated in Frost v. Oliver (2 El. & B. 301; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 353); though in substance not different. Lord Campbell based his judgment mainly on the ground that the facts were such that Oliver was precluded from denying that Thompson was his captain, even if the jury believed that in fact Thompson was not his captain; the decision of the Court of error was, that in this he was wrong. Mr. Justice Wightman, after stating that "the legal title to a ship will furnish prima facie evidence that repairs are made under the authority and for the benefit of the legal owner, but if it appears that they were made under the authority and for the benefit of another, the legal owner will not be answerable," proceeds to state, as the basis of his judgment, that there was in this case evidence of a holding out by the defendant of himself as the beneficial owner, and "to have held Thompson out to the world as his captain." The Court of error decided that in Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 39) there was no evidence of any such holding forth as his captain, but they did not impugn the earlier part of his judgment. Mr. Justice Crompton did not base his judgment on this erroneous ground. He states the question to be, whether there was "evidence of any authority on the part of the master to pledge the credit of the defendant by giving the general orders for the supply of the rigging in question." He says, "It does not follow from the ownership or interest in the ship not determining the question of liability, that it is not a material circumstance in ascertaining the question of credit and contract," and he proceeds, in a very able and instructive judgment, to shew that they did make a prima facie case, though liable to be rebutted, and then asks, "How is the prima facie case to be rebutted? Surely by proof of all the circumstances by which the contract is proved to have been made with, and the credit given to another, and not to the legal owner; and all the facts on the one side and the other, as to such contract and credit, must be for the jury." He pretty plainly intimates that in his opinion the verdict was against the weight of evidence, but that there was evidence for the jury that in fact Thompson was acting by the plaintiff's authority. This judgment was certainly not overruled in the court of error, and is, in my opinion, correct in point of law. Mr. Justice Erle, who differed from the majority of the Court, does not question that there was prima facie evidence of authority, but states, as the basis of his judgment, "I take it to be a general principle that if direct evidence of the matter to be proved (here of the making of the contract, and of the giving of authority for that purpose) is adduced and believed, the circumstantial evidence from which the matter to be proved might be inferred, in the matter of direct evidence, then becomes immaterial and irrelevant." This the Court of error decided to be correct; and I think the only difference between Chief Justice Erle and Mr. Justice Crompton was, that the latter thought the rule could not be made absolute in its then shape, because the question whether the rebutting evidence was believed could not be withdrawn from the jury; though, if the rule had been granted on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, he should have thought that there ought to be a new trial, because they did not believe it. In Mitcheson v. Oliver (5 Ibid. 419; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 39) the Court of error had to decide on the exceptions taken to the summing-up of Lord Campbell as appearing on the bill of exceptions. One of those was, that there was no evidence to go to the jury; as to this, Mr. Baron Parke, in delivering the judgment of the Court, says: "Lord Campbell desires the jury to consider whether, upon the evidence upon both sides, they were of opinion that the defendant had authorized the goods and work to be supplied and done on his credit, and the goods and work had been supplied and done on his credit. Taking that as a detached part of the summing-up, unaffected by what went before, that is unexceptionable; for, no doubt, if the jury disbelieved the facts of the case that made for the defendant, and drew the prima facie inference from the ownership and other facts, there was evidence on which they might find that Thompson was, in fact, master for the defendant; and that being so, we cannot agree with the exceptions that there was no evidence to go to the jury."

I do not think that I am entitled to rely upon this as a decision of the Court of error, that the ownership alone would be evidence from which, whilst unexplained, the jury might draw a prima facie inference that the persons actually in the possession of the ship were employed by the owners; for the Court of error may have proceeded on the other facts set out in the bill of exceptions, though, on examining the statement of the evidence in the bill of exceptions, I find very little more than that Oliver was owner, and was, as such, in possession both before the orders were given and after the work was completed; but I think that I am entitled to rely upon the authority of Mr. Justice Crompton, and the cases he refers to, as not impeached or shaken by the decision in the Court of error. I therefore think that the registry was evidence from which, when unexplained, the jury might properly draw the inference that the owner employed the persons actually in charge of the ship; but that it was only evidence quite capable of being explained or rebutted; and therefore the defendant may, if he so elects within a fortnight, have a new trial. Costs to abide the event. Otherwise I think the rule should be discharged.

My Brother Lush desires me to say that he agrees in this judgment. The rule will, therefore, in conformity with the opinion of the majority, be discharged, unless the defendant elects within a fortnight to take a new trial, costs to abide the event, in which case the rule will be moulded accordingly.

*Rule absolute for a new trial.*¹

Petition of Right—Invention—Letters Patent—Infringement—Rights of the Crown.

CROWN. PATENT.—By letters patent, dated the 26th of November, 1862, the Crown granted to the suppliant special licence, power, sole privilege and authority to use, exercise and vend a certain invention for improvements in the construction of ships, and to “enjoy the whole profit, benefit, commodity and advantage from time to time coming, growing, accruing, and arising by reason of the said invention for and during the term of,” &c. The letters purported to be granted upon the petition of the suppliant, and “of our especial grace, certain knowledge and mere motion”; and they contained a command “to all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, and all other our subjects whatsoever,” that they should not use the invention without the consent, licence and agreement of the suppliant, his executors, &c. on such pains and penalties as could be justly inflicted, and the liability to damages. There was also a clause that the letters should be void if the suppliant, his executors, &c. should “not supply or cause to be supplied for our service all such articles of the said invention, as he or they should be required to supply by the officers or Commissioners of the department of our service for the use of which the same shall be required,” &c. It was further provided, that the letters were to be construed in the most favourable and beneficial sense for the best advantage of the suppliant, his executors, &c.

The Crown having made use of the invention during the currency of the letters patent, a petition of right was preferred by the inventor.

Held, first, that the Crown was not excluded from the use of the invention, Secondly, if the effect of the letters was to exclude the Crown, yet that a petition of right could not be maintained in respect of the infringement of the patent right.

The petitioner, by his petition of right, alleged that he was the inventor of a certain new manufacture, namely, of “improvements in the manufacture of ships, and in rendering ships and boats impervious to shot”; that letters patent for the said invention were granted to him; that a specification, disclaimer and alteration of title had been duly filed; and that the Crown had infringed the patent right, that is to say, in the construction and use of a ship for the service of the Crown, called the Enterprise, to the damage of the suppliant, &c.

The Crown set out the patent, the specification, the disclaimer and the memorandum of alteration, and demurred to the petition of right.

The letters patent were as follows.—“Victoria, by the grace of God, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas Robert Barnard Feather, of Liverpool, merchant, hath by his petition humbly represented unto us that he is in possession of an invention for improvements in the construction of ships [and in rendering ships and boats impervious to shot], which the petitioner believes will be of great public utility; that he is the first and true inventor thereof; and that the same is not in use by any other person or persons, to the best of his knowledge and belief. The petitioner, therefore, most humbly prayed that we would be graciously pleased to grant unto him, his executors, administrators and assigns, our royal letters patent for the sole use, benefit and advantage of his said invention, within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, for the term of fourteen years, pursuant to the statute in that case made and provided; and we, being willing to give encouragement to all arts and inventions which may be for the public good, are graciously pleased to condescend to the petitioner's request.

Knowing, therefore, that we of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, have given and granted, and by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, do give and grant unto the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, our special licence, full power, sole privilege and authority that he, the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, and every of them, by himself and themselves, or by his and their deputy or deputies, servants or agents, or such others as he, the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, shall at any time agree with, and no others, from time to time and at all times hereinafter, during the term of years herein expressed, shall and lawfully may make, use, exercise and vend his said invention within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, in such manner as to him, the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, or any of them, shall in his or their discretion seem meet, and that he, the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators or assigns, shall and lawfully may have and enjoy the whole profit, benefit, commodity and advantage from time to time coming, growing, accruing and arising, by reason of the said invention, for and during the term of years herein mentioned, to have, hold, exercise and enjoy the said licences, powers, privileges and advantages hereinbefore granted or mentioned to be granted unto the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators or assigns, for and during and unto the full end and term of fourteen years from the day of the date of these presents next and immediately ensuing, according to the statute in such case made and provided; and to the end that he, the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, and every of them, may have and enjoy the full benefit and the sole use and exercise of the said invention according to our gracious intention hereinbefore declared, we do by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, require and strictly command all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, and all other our subjects whatsoever, of what estate, quality, degree, name or condition soever they be, within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, that neither they nor any of them, at any time during the continuance of the said term of fourteen years hereby granted, either directly or indirectly do make, use or put in practice the said invention or any part of the same so attained unto by the said Robert Barnard Feather as aforesaid, nor in anywise counterfeit, imitate or resemble the same, nor shall make or cause to be made any addition thereunto, or subtraction from the same, whereby to pretend himself or themselves the inventor or inventors, deviser or devisers thereof, without the consent, licence or agreement of the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators or assigns, in writing, under his or their hands and seals, first had and obtained in that behalf, upon such pains and penalties as can or may be justly inflicted on such offenders for their contempt of this our Royal command, and further to be answerable to the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns according to law, for his and their damages thereby occasioned. And moreover we do by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, will and command all and singular the Justices of the Peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, head-boroughs and all other officers, and ministers whatsoever, of us, our heirs and successors for the time being, that they or any of them do not, nor shall at any time during the said term hereby granted, in anywise molest, trouble or hinder the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators or assigns, or any of them, or his or their deputies, servants, or agents, in or about the due and lawful use or exercise of the aforesaid invention or anything relating thereto. Provided always, and these our letters patent are and shall be upon this condition, that if at any time during the said term hereby granted, it shall be made appear to us, our heirs or successors, or any six or more of our or their Privy Council, that this our grant is contrary to law, or prejudicial or inconvenient to our subjects in general, or that the said invention is not a new invention, as to the public use or exercise thereof within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, or that the said Robert Barnard Feather is not the first and true inventor thereof within this realm as aforesaid, these our letters patent shall forthwith cease, determine and be utterly void to all intents and purposes, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding. Provided also that these our letters patent, or anything herein contained, shall not extend or be construed to extend to give privilege unto the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, or any of them, to use or imitate any invention or work whatsoever which hath heretofore been found out or invented by any of our subjects whatsoever, and publicly used or exercised within our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands or Isle of Man, unto whom our like letters patent or privileges hath been already granted for the sole use, exercise and benefit thereof. It being our will and pleasure that the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, and all and every other person and persons to whom like letters patent or privileges have been already granted as aforesaid, shall distinctly use and practise their several inventions by them invented and found out, according to the true intent and meaning of the same respective letters patent and of these presents. Provided likewise, nevertheless, and these our letters patent are upon this express condition, that if the said Robert Barnard Feather shall not particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the said invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed, by an instrument in writing under his hand and seal, and cause the same to be filed in the Great Seal Patent Office within six calendar months next and immediately after the date of these our letters patent: And also if the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, shall not pay or cause to be paid at the offices of our Commissioners of Patents for Inventors the sums following, that is to say, the sum of 40*l.* and stamp-duty payable in respect of the certificate of such payment, at or before the expiration of three years from the date of these our letters patent, and the sum of 80*l.* and the stamp-duty payable in respect of the certificate of such payment, at or before the expiration of seven years from the date of these our letters patent: And also if the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators or assigns, shall not supply or cause to be supplied for our service all such articles of the said invention as he or they shall be required to supply by the officers or Commissioners administering the department of our service for the use of which the same shall be required, in such manner, at such times and upon such reasonable prices and terms as shall be settled for that purpose by the said officers or Commissioners requiring the same, that then and in any of the said cases these our letters patent and all liberties and advantages whatsoever hereby granted shall utterly cease, determine and become void, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding. Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the granting of licences in such manner and for such considerations as they may by law be granted. And, lastly, we do by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, grant unto the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, that these our letters patent, on the filing thereof, shall be in all things good, valid, sufficient and effectual in the law, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, and shall be taken, construed and adjudged in the most favourable and beneficial sense for the best advantage of the said Robert Barnard Feather, his executors, administrators and assigns, as well in all our Courts of Record as elsewhere, and by all and singular the officers and ministers whatsoever of our heirs and successors in our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, and amongst all and every the subjects of us, our heirs and successors whatsoever and wheresoever, notwithstanding the not full and certain describing the nature and quality of the said invention or of materials thereunto conducting and belonging. In witness whereof we have, &c.

The disclaimer related to the parts of the specification relating to the rendering ships and boats impervious to shot, and which is referred to in the letters patent within brackets.

COCKBURN, C.J. (Jan. 30) stated that judgment would be given for the Crown, and would be delivered shortly.

The judgment of the Court¹ was now (Feb. 23, 1865) delivered by—

COCKBURN, C.J.—On the demurrer to this petition of right two questions present themselves for our determination: first, whether by the effect of the letters patent the Crown is excluded from the use, except with the assent of the patentee, of the invention protected by the patent; secondly, whether, if the foregoing question be answered in the affirmative, a petition of right can be maintained by the suppliant against the Crown for the infringement of his patent right.

As regards the first, it is true that the patent gives to the patentee the sole privilege of making, using, exercising and vending the invention; but, on the other hand, there are no express words to take away from the Crown the right of using the invention. There can be no doubt that, in a grant between subject and subject, as, for instance, in the grant of a licence to use the invention, the words of the patent would be large enough to exclude the grantor; but will they suffice to exclude the Crown?

It is established on the best authority that, in construing grants from the Crown, a different rule of construction prevails from that by which grants from one subject to another are to be construed. In a grant from one subject to another, every intendment is to be made against the grantor, and in favour of the grantee, in order to give full effect to the grant; but in grants from the Crown an opposite rule of construction prevails. Nothing passes except that which is expressed, or which is matter of necessary and unavoidable intendment in order to give effect to the plain and undoubted intention of the grant. And in no species of grant does this rule of construction more especially obtain than in grants which emanate from, and operate in derogation of, the prerogative of the Crown. The rule is nowhere better expressed than in the clear and perspicuous language of Lord Stowell in the case of The Rebeckah (1 Ch. Rob. 227, 230). He there says, "All grants of the Crown are to be strictly construed against the grantee, contrary to the usual policy of the law in the consideration of grants; and upon this just ground, that the prerogatives and rights and emoluments of the Crown being conferred upon it for great purposes and for the public use, it shall not be intended that such prerogatives, rights and emoluments are diminished by any grant, beyond what such grant by necessary and unavoidable construction shall take away." Now, the present is clearly a grant made by virtue of the prerogative. In early times, when the confines between legislative and executive authorities were less carefully defined and ascertained than at present, the Crown, as the guardian of the trade and commerce of the realm, both foreign and domestic, assumed and exercised the right to make regulations and confer privileges relating thereto, and, in the exercise of this authority, took upon itself to grant monopolies in respect of particular articles of trade or manufacture. And though the granting of monopolies has been held by Courts of law and declared by statutes to be illegal, this has been, not because the Crown had not control and authority over such matters, when exercised for the public good, but because the exercise of its authority in granting these exclusive privileges was plainly contrary to the public weal, as being in restraint of trade and industry, and to the prejudice of the subject. The granting of monopolies in respect of inventions was, however, held good at the common law, on the ground that, by tending to promote inventions, it was in the end productive of advantage to the community. The statute of James was, in this respect, only declaratory of the common law; and these grants of monopoly in respect of inventions are not by force of the statute, but by virtue of the prerogative. They are, therefore, subject to the rule of construction applicable to grants of this nature.

This being so, it was contended, on the part of the Crown, that the terms, as well as the intention, of the grant would be satisfied by construing it to confer an exclusive right to the use of the invention as against all the subjects of the Crown; while, according to the established rule of construction, the Crown, not being expressly named, ought not to be taken to have precluded itself from the use of the invention.

Against this view, it was contended, on the part of the patentee, that the patent was based on a species of contract between the patentee and the Crown, in which the patentee, by communicating the secret of his invention to the public, gave a valuable consideration for the grant which he obtained; so that the grant, being based on such a consideration, should receive the more liberal construction which it has been held that royal grants, when proceeding on a valuable consideration from the grantee, ought to receive. It appears to us that the assumption on which this presumption rests, namely, that of a contract between the Crown and the patentee, is altogether fallacious. The grant of the patent is, as has been explained, simply an exercise of the prerogative, in which—the ground on which alone the grant of a monopoly is justifiable being that the invention shall be made available to the public—the Crown annexes as a condition of the grant that the true nature of the invention, and the manner in which it can be used, shall be fully and unreservedly disclosed.

Our view as to the construction to be put on the terms of a grant of this nature becomes materially confirmed by what is clearly settled to be the law in respect of another class of grants emanating from the same branch of the prerogative. By virtue of its authority in matters of trade and commerce, the Crown from a very early period exercised the power of granting to individuals the right of holding fairs and markets, and, as incidental thereto, of taking tolls. Now, it is clear that, however general and universal by the terms of the grant the right to take toll may be as against the rest of the world, the Crown will nevertheless be exempt from toll—2 Inst. 221, and Com. Dig. tit. 'Toll,' (G 1). This appears strong to shew that in granting a privilege, otherwise of universal application, the Crown will not be bound unless it expressly declares its intention to that effect; and that grants of privilege, however general in their terms, can, in the absence of express words to bind the Crown, be taken only as conferring the privilege as against the subject, exclusive of the Crown.

It was, however, urged, on the part of the suppliant, that, however stringent might be the rule of construction with reference to royal grants in general, it was nevertheless apparent from the language of the patent that the Crown had excluded itself from the use of the invention. While it was admitted that the effect of the statement that the grant proceeded on the "certain knowledge and mere motion" of the Crown, which words are said to authorize a more liberal construction of a royal grant, was neutralized by the concomitant statement that it was made on the petition of the grantee, which recital would call for the more rigorous construction, it was insisted that the concluding clause of the letters patent, namely, that such letters patent are "to be taken, construed and adjudged in the most favourable and beneficial sense for the best advantage of the grantee," was strong to shew that the stricter rule of construction usually prevailing with reference to grants from the Crown ought not to be applied to patents for inventions. We, however, think that this clause ought not to have this effect. We think its true purpose and effect is that pointed out by Mr. Hindmarch, in his valuable work on Patents, pp. 72, 73, namely, that of preventing the want of certainty which ordinarily exists in the description of an invention in a patent, prior to the specification, from avoiding the grant for uncertainty. Possibly, the object of the clause may also have been to mitigate, in the event of any proceeding by scire facias to repeal the patent, the rigour of the conditions on which the patent is granted, and on non-performance of which it is to become void, more especially that of the stringent clause as to the specification of the invention, which immediately precedes it.

Another argument arising on the terms of the patent was founded on the clause which provides that the patentee shall supply the patented article, if required, for the service of the Crown, upon reasonable terms, which provision it was contended necessarily implied that the Crown could not itself have manufactured or prepared the article. In answer to this argument, it was suggested, on the part of the Crown, that the purpose of this clause was to enable the Crown, if it was found more convenient to have the patented article supplied by the patentee than to manufacture it, to compel the patentee to supply it; and this may, possibly, be the true purpose and effect of the stipulation. But whether this be so or not we think that to give to this clause by implication the operation for which Mr. Bovill contended would be directly to violate the rule of construction which, according to the authorities, should be applied to grants from the Crown, and which prohibits any effect being given to the grant by implication, to the exclusion of the Crown, beyond what is clearly expressed in the grant.

It appears to us, on the other hand, that there are parts of the letters patent from which it is to be inferred that the Crown was not to be bound. The grant is of "especial licence, full power, sole privilege and authority, &c.," terms which appear referable to a right conferred as against the fellow-subjects of the grantee, rather than as against the Crown. This is followed by a prohibition to "all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, and all other our subjects whatsoever," against making, using or practising the invention, "upon such pains and penalties as can or may be justly inflicted on such offenders for their contempt of this our Royal command"; and such offenders are further to be answerable to the patentee in damages. It is obvious that none of these provisions, by which the exclusive right of the patentee are protected, can be applicable to the Crown; all tend to shew that the privilege was intended to be against fellow-subjects.

Independently, however, of the arguments derived either from the rules of construction applicable to Royal grants or from the language of the letters patent, an argument was urged on the part of the suppliant which is well deserving of notice. It was said that, in the construction of grants, reference should be had to what was settled and understood to be the law at the time the grant was made; and that as, at the time this patent was granted, the general understanding among the officers of state, the law officers advising the Crown in respect of patents, and inventors, was that a patented invention could not be used in the public service except on payment to the patentee, the present patent, in conferring the exclusive privilege of using the invention, must be construed as a grant to the exclusion of the Crown.

It certainly appears that, at the time this patent was granted, a general understanding prevailed, founded on the practice of a long series of years, that if patented inventions were used in any of the departments of the public service, the patentees would be remunerated, by the ministers or officers of the Crown administering such departments, as though the use had been by private individuals. There can be no doubt that in numerous instances payments had been made to patentees for the use of patented inventions in the public service without objection or difficulty; and not only does no question appear to have been raised as to the right of the patentees by the ministers of the Crown, but the legal advisers of the Crown appear also to have considered the right, whether arising from the terms of the patent, or from the existing practice, as so well settled, that we find Sir John Jervis, the then Attorney General, on an application for a renewal of the patent of Pettit Smith, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the year 1852, two years only before the date of this patent, endeavouring to obtain the insertion of a condition that the Crown should have the use of the invention without payment: a course which obviously would have been unnecessary if the Crown had been considered entitled to use the invention without such a provision. That the same view of the matter has prevailed till the present question was raised in this case, and that of Clare v. the Queen (Not reported), which immediately preceded it, is plain, as we find a similar application to that made by the Attorney General in the case of Pettit Smith's Patent, repeated in the subsequent cases of Carpenter's (In 1851) and Lancaster's (for the Lancaster gun) Patent, the application for the renewal of the latter having occurred as late as in the last year.

There can be little doubt that, on the faith of the understanding and practice referred to, many inventors have, at a great expense of time and money, perfected and matured inventions, and taken out patents, in the expectation of deriving a portion of their reward from the adoption of their inventions in the public service; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the suppliant, whose invention relates to ship-building, may have taken out his patent in the hope that his invention would be used in the Royal Navy to his profit and advantage. But these circumstances, though they tend to shew that the case is one of great hardship as regards the suppliant, do not, in our opinion, affect the construction to be put on the terms of this grant.
